"The War Summary"

Almost from the very day the great European war began in August last, the outstanding feature in Canadian journalism covering the conflict has been "The War Summary" daily on pages 1 and 2 of THE GLOBE. In the concisest possible form the writer has given his readers a pen picture of the developments in all parts of the world. While the details of the movements along the extended frontiers have not been overlooked, the readers of THE GLOBE have been enabled to follow intelligently and with confidence the general outlines of the stupendous conflict. "The War Summary" of THE GLOBE is reproduced daily by several papers throughout the Dominion.

The Editorial Page

THE GLOBE on its editorial page has striven to place before the public in proper perspective the broad background of the titanic struggle. This series of articles has attracted the attention not only of the Canadian people, but of leading men and journals in all parts of the world. The causes leading up to the war, the elements entering into its conduct, and the results likely to flow from the cessation of hostilities have been dealt with in that bold and clear-cut form characteristic of THE GLOBE'S editorial page.

News Service

The above features, in addition to a cable and letter service from the front unmatched in Canada, have placed THE GLOBE far in the lead of Canadian papers, and partly explain the phenomenal increase of 33 1-3 per cent. in THE GLOBE'S circulation during recent months.

Other Features

The sporting pages, the financial and commercial pages, the woman's pages, etc., etc., with the additional pages in Wednesday's issue devoted to "Farm and Country Life," are maintained at a high standard of excellence, a standard that has justified THE GLOBE to the title of Canada's National Newspaper, and has given it by many thousands the largest circulation of any morning paper in the Dominion.

Local and City Papers

By all means take your local paper, but in the field of metropolitan newspapers THE GLOBE unquestionably offers you the greatest value to be had in Canada. Order it to-day. 25 cents per month—one dollar for four months—three dollars per year.

P.S.—According to Lord Kitchener, the big war has only begun.

EDITORIAL

The whole Empire will join in a demonstration on Aug. 4th, the anniversary of the entry of Great Britain into the war.

Eight thousand refugees from the Balkan war of 1912 are still in Macedonia, on the verge of death from starvation. Hundreds have already died. They have no money or food.

FIGHTING FOR OURSELVES.

We are often told by public writers and public speakers that it is the duty of Canada to help Great Britain in this war. That is right. But it should not be forgotten that we are not merely fighting for Britain or for the Empire. We are fighting for ourselves, for our country, for our homes and for our women and children. Make no mistake about that. The war may seem far away from us, but its results will come as close to us, be it victory or defeat, as they will come to any of our Allies. "If Britain goes down, we go down with her. The Kaiser wants Canada, and if he defeats and overruns Britain, he will attempt to do the same to Canada.—Hamilton Times.

TEMPERANCE IN THE WEST.

Among the hosts of people outside of Alberta who are delighted with the "dry" victory in that province, one of the most pleased naturally enough, is Mr. N. W. Rowell, who, at present is in British Columbia on a vacation. It must be an added source of satisfaction to him that he did his "bit" to secure the victory in the "foothill" province, Not only was the example of his fight in Ontario admittedly to help to the Alberta workers, but Mr. Rowell also addressed two large meetings during the campaign, one in Edmonton, the other in Calgary, on "The War and the Liquor Traffic" Mr. Rowell, in these addresses, did not discuss the actual details of the bill to be submitted, for he did not want to interfere in other provinces local affairs, but he did point out the patriotic duty of getting rid of any force or any interest interfering with personal and national strength, especially at such a critical time as during the war and the difficult period of readjustment and reconstruction which inevently will follow.

Mr. Rowell must also feel satisfaction in the Saskatchewan situation Hon. Walter Scott has publicly acknowledged that his government and the people of his province had been influenced in their temperance course by the inspiration of Mr. Rowell's courageous fight. The Ontario leader, while thoroughly agreeing with the Saskatchewan plan as far as it has abolished all drinking places, has definitely reserved judgement on the question of its government-owned liquor stores until time will have shown its results.

In Manitoba to-day, both parties are pledged to prohibition. In British Columbia there is a more vigorous organization against the liquor traffic than ever before, and advance may be expected in this province, Alberta and Saskatchewan, at any rate, are definite examples of anti-liquor traffic hopes turned into actual accomplishment. Ontario's progress, when viewed in the light of what these two provinces have done, looks unfortunately small. Here, under the Commission, it is a question of retaining or cutting off individual licenses in specific localities in Alberta and Saskatchewan the axe has been laid to the very roots of the traffic, and the abolition has been done in a wholesale way. Mr. Rowell, as the exponent of the abolition of all drinking places in Ontario, may well expect that the people of his own province will be influenced considerably by the example and iniative of their comrades in the West.

Accident on Bowling Green.

Mamie Reavie, daughter of Mr. and Mrs. John Reavie, had a very narrow escape from being instantly killed on Friday evening. In company with a number of her companions Mamie was watching the bowlers, and when her companions left the green Mamie ran to catch up to them. In the darkness she struck a wire that was attached to a pole to support the lamps on the bowling green. She struck the wire with great force and was apparently struck on the chin and thrown backwards to the ground. When picked up she was unconscious, and remained in that condition until four o'clock the following morning. Dr. Smith who happened to be on the bowling green when the accident took place, gave immediate aid. Towards morning Mamie showed signs of improvement, but it was many hours before she was pronounced to be out of danger. She has now almost fully recovered. but it was a narrow escape from sudden death.—Ripley Express

Prof. Reithdorf Assaulted.

Prof. F. V. Reithdorf of Woodstock College, who addressed a meeting in Walkerton recently, was the victim of an assault by a German sympathizer at the G. T. R. station at London, one night recently. Prof. Reithdorf is a naturalized British subject and a former resident of Germany and has been active during the last few months in addressing meetings throughout Ontario denouncing Prussian Militarism. The Professor was at the London G. T. R. station at midnight on Thursday night waiting for the north bound train and was chatting with some men. The man who attacked him came up on a bicycle and jumping off addressed the Professor saying: "You're a damned spy, why don't you save your face?" Professor Reithdorf tried to get him to come to police headquarters where matters would be cleared up, but he refused and just as they were going out of the station the man turned around and landed on the Professors' chest. A police officer was quickly on the scene and promised to do what he could to secure the assailant who ran off following the assault.

War Spectacle at Exhibition

The mammoth war spectacle, "The March of the Allies" and the "Review of the Fleet," will be the big scenic production in front of the Grand Stand at the Canadian National Exhibition this year, and will be one of the most elaborate ever staged and a fitting climax to each day's entertainment in this 'Patriotic Year.' The background is the ancient city of Calais, saved by the Canadians when they so gallantly stopped the German drive at St. Julien at such enormous cost. Its picturesque chateaus and historic environment adapt themselves admirably to reproduction. On either side beneath frowning cliffs are seen military camps with the soldiers of the allied armies in all the hustle, bustle and action of war time. The brilliant uniforms of the Field Marshals, Generals, etc. add splendor to an impressive scene. Suddenly the fleet appears over the horizon under full steam with the Queen Bess leading the first battle line and the Lion in advance of the others. The Iron Duke majestically appears with Admiral Jellico aboard, and, as she passes between the watch dogs of the Empire lined up in battle array, the Admiral is greeted salvoes of broadsides. It will be a faithful portrayal of the scene just before war was declared last summer when the fleet had been mobolized on the orders of Churchill off the British coast. The cannonading continues as the officers go ashore to review the troops, which swing past the grand Stand in the final tableau. It will be a panorama of Empire greatn striking reality as to awake a veritable hysteria of patriotic fervor among the thousands who will nightly crowd the Grand Stand.

Letter From Dr. Fraser

The following is a letter received by Mr. Arthur Collins from Dr. J.J. Fraser, telling of some of his experiences in France.

Friday
July 2-1915

Dear Atlie:

We are now on the Belgian frontier, part of the units is in France part in Belgium. We had quite a long march coming here, but did the march during the night, resting in the day time.

We had a great day's sports yesterday, the best field we've had yet about five acres and as level as a board Had baseball and football and all sorts of racing jumping contests, etc. They were keenly contested for instance in the half-mile race, the second was about ten yards behind, and made a great sprint and won by about a nose.

We had the band of the Fort Garry Horse and they played great music, staying to play for dinner. There were Canadians and Imperials from all around and altogether was a very successful day. Five clowns helped enliven the proceedings.

It was very funny to see some of the English officers trying to play baseball. Between the umpire and the Canadian slang, they were completely spoofed! One of them says, "When I swing my bat and miss the ball, they shout, 'Ave an eye'. "I sl." he says "what does that mean. I always thought I had two bloody good eyes."

One good competition was for the best groomed and harnessed team of horses. It took two vets and a transport officer from the Brigade Hdqs., a long time to decide. One of the boys dressed a horse up as a clown with pyjamas, etc. When it came on and saw the other horses it kicked up it's heels and ran for dear life.

Don't think I shall bring an auto when I go home, won't have the price, but if I can pinch an aeroplane over you may see me light down on the bowling green some day. It would be fine moving to belong to a flying corps. Great job to be stretcher-bearer on a flying squadron wouldn't it. Open up a dressing station on the northeast corner of that cloud at Bd Hdh 2." You will evacuate your wounded to Casualty Clearing Cloud number 6. Aeroplanes are certainly thick around here.

Are now in the famous Plubist section, have a dressing station right on the edge of the wood. Things have been comparatively quiet at this point for some time. The last two places were pretty hot, and the Canadians lost quite a number. I saw where Fritz Robinson was buried it is in Bervoy. They shelled that place pretty heavily when we were at the sand pit close by.

The weather has been quite cool here yet, no hot weather to speak of. Roy is just around the corner from us here. Am hoping to hear from you soon.

Yours Sincerely
Jim.

The "Princess Pats"

The idea of raising a separate unit of Canadian Soldiers for service in Europe was conceived and carried out by Mayor Hamilton Gault of Montreal He financed his project and the Princess Patricia Light Infantry was the first Canadian unit to enter action. Gallantly led by the late Col. Farquhar who was killed while leading his men, the corps had already established the reputation of Canadians as fighting men when the first Canadian army corps entered the trenches. The corps was a credit to Canada and brought peculiar honor to Montreal with which it was associated from the start. It will be a pity therefore, if the identity of the "Princess Pats" should be lost at this stage of the war and the gallant command should not be permitted to share as a unit in the latter successes as it shared in the early trials. That there was a strong feeling of loyalty to the name of the corps amongst the original members was apparent. They gave their lives so generously that a remnant only remains. Canada and Montreal in particular owes it to them to keep the flag of the regiment flying. We have sent no better men to war than the members of the Princess Patricia Light Infantry. They died for the country and for the regiment, also, and the regiment, like the country, should survive the war

The Heroines

Two French women were bidding good-bye to a soldier. One was his sister the other his wife. They were gay and cheery, evidently an assumed role, for after the man stepped on the motor-bus his sister began to weep. "Don't cry," said the other impulsively "He can still see you." There is something fine in the determination that the One Man in the World must have a continuing vision of a brave and smiling face. Tears long continued and bitter might have free course after the parting, but they never marred the good-bye. A good many Canadian girls have shown in these times of grief a steady heroism. Dire necessity has faced them, but has not crushed their spirit. Trivial sentimentalism has been replaced by a gallant faith that whatever may happen, duty must be done. And as for the outcome, 'Shall not the Judge of all the earth do right?'—Toronto Daily News.

After the Captain's month's leave of absence is up he expects to go on transport duty either in England or Canada, and will not likely go to the front again. He writes however,—like the brave fellow he is— that his desire is to go back to the firing line. If he is sent to Canada Mrs. Musgrove will join him.—Post

A gun placed upon this court, which has several feet of concrete under it, would command the Soulanges canal and an important railway bridge.

Nearly a Drowning Accident.

Little Jessie Rigg, aged 8 years, and daughter of Mr. and Mrs. J. B. Rigg, had a narrow escape from being drowned in the mill race on Tuesday afternoon: Jessie along with some other little girls was bathing in the race and it is presumed that the current carried her beyond her depth. She had gone down the second time when Mr. Wm. McKelvy happened along and at once jumped in and rescued the drowning child. She was taken to their home and suffered from vomiting but soon recovered. This should be a warning to parents to keep their children away from the river.—Tara Leader.

Alberta Goes Dry.

The temperance vote in the Province of Alberta on Wednesday last resulted in a victory for the temperance forces the total majority for the act being 20,000. The result exceeds even the most sanguine estimate of the "drys" who did not count on more than 15,000 in their latest figures just prior to polling day. It is a surprise to the "wets" who expected to make a much better showing Edmonton, with a total of 12,000 has a majority of 3 200 in favor of the act and Calgary with an equal total votes, gives a "dry" majority of 3,000. The other cities of the province —Medicine Hat, Red Deer, Wetaskiwin and Lethbridge, all go "dry" with the exception of the last named, where there is 275 wet majority. It is in the rural districts, that the big vote for prohibition has been polled, Of 53 provincial constituencies only seven up to midnight gave indications of going "wet". They are Rocky Mountain and Pincher Creek in the south and Girouard, Stony Plain, Athabaska, St. Albert and Victoria in the North. On the other hand, Lacombe, Red Deer, Camrose and others have piled up dry majorities of over 3 to 1. The fight was the hardest campaign of the vote. C. A. Windle of Chicago has been touring the province for some weeks assisted by other speakers. For the "drys," Rev. F. W. Patterson of the First Baptist Church Edmonton, took the lead in the campaigning all over the province, and some of those who assisted him were Ben S. Spence, Toronto; Mrs Nellie McClung, late of Winnipeg and now of Edmonton, and Clinton S. Howard of Rochester.

Unsuspected Value

The ladies of the Kincardine Red Cross Society recently made a collection of old magazines, newspapers, etc and had the lot shipped to a dealer in Toronto. They made $66 by the enterprise Here is a source of funds that is little dreamed of. In every town and village there are several hundred weight if not tons of old papers and magazines, which are of no use to the owners. They have been piled away from year to year. They are recognized as a nuisance, but remembering the pleasure they have given, folks do not like to destroy them. Here is an opportunity to turn them to very real use.

A Sad Drowning Accident.

Last Thursday afternoon word was spread around town that Capt. John Munroe, one of Southampton's most esteemed residents had been drowned in Lake Huron, somewhere in the vicinity of the Gas Buoy, and immediately the tugs, sail boats and life boats began to drag the lake for the body, but were unsuccessful in their mission and two men from Toronto were sent for, both members of the Toronto Life Saving Crew, and who are supposed to be experts in dragging for bodies, they spent all day Saturday and Sunday grappling, but the body was not brought to the surface. Capt. Munroe who was an old sailor and who retired from active service, was out in a small sailboat trolling for fish but when last seen by a passing tug he was rowing for the shore, in less than half an hour another tug brought in an empty boat which was found near the Gas Buoy. It is thought that while rowing to shore he stood up to fix the sail, lost his balance and fell in the water and as the wind was off land his boat floated away from him faster than he could swim. The sympathy of the entire community is extended to the bereaved family.—Southampton Beacon.

Don't be Disloyal.

Incredible as it may appear we understand an attempt will be made to repeal local option at the next municipal election in Chesley. It is simply incomprehensible that such a move should be made at such a time and the leaders in this idiotic agitation should be commited to a lunatic asylum. The absurdity of such a movement when the British nation is at war would put every person who signs the petition in the disloyal list and we would have great pleasure in publishing the dishonor roll. Russia and France have put the ban on old booze in the interests of national efficiency; Great Britain has greatly restricted the traffic; some 13 States in the United States are under prohibition; Saskatchewan is a barless province with prospects of Manitoba and Alberta falling in line; whole counties in Ontario are going dry, and with all these object lessons before them there are a few who would take a retrograde step in sobriety and efficiency in this fair town. Never. We have had a clean town for six years and it will be kept clean. The open bar has gone in Chesley never to come back. If local option were repealed in Chesley it would not be of much advantage to the antis for the Canada Temperance Act will likley be voted on before long in Bruce and Grey simultaneously and it would carry in both counties as it has in Huron and Perth. It looks as though this is the best way at present of getting rid of the booze joints in proximity to our town. The ratepayers are warned against signing a petition this fall to repeal local option. If such a movement is begun we believe the patriotic and public-spirited citizens of Chesley will come out so strongly in opposition to it that the promoters will not be able to secure the necessary 25 per cent.—Enterprise.

How's This?

Ask for Business

ONLY one's most intimate friends go to one's home uninvited, and the extent of one's calling list is determined by the number of one's calls.

In business the same facts hold. Every merchant in Walkerton knows scores of families here and in the country round about whose custom he does not possess.

Mutual acquaintance is the first step towards getting these families as customers, and acquaintances can most surely be developed by invitations or calls made through the medium of advertisements in the Weekly TELESCOPE.

FARMERS!
Why Metallic Roofing and Shingles are not as durable as "Brantford Slates"

Brantford Asphalt Slates
For Houses and Barns

We are making colored and plain Asphalt Slates suitable for roofing any class of building, particularly farmers' buildings.

SPECIAL OFFER We are making a special offer to roof the first house or barn in your locality at about cost price and guarantee it's lifetime for ten years against leakage.

Electricians will tell you that Asphalt, from which Brantford Asphalt Shingles are made, is an excellent insulating material, and does not deteriorate when exposed to the elements, being proof against acid, salt, alkali, rust and corrosion.

Galvanized iron is subject to all these agents of destruction, as well as other enemies, viz., rust and moisture from the inside of the barn, produced by the heating of grain, moisture from cattle, etc. It is also open to attacks from the elements without, and both processes are working toward its ruin at the same time. In other words, condensation is causing the destruction of Metal Roofing and Shingles, while Asphalt Slates retain their wearing qualities indefinitely.

Therefore, Asphalt Slates are, in the end, the cheapest roofing material you can buy, and, as they are now made, the most attractive in appearance, as well as being waterproof and practically fireproof.

LOW PRICES We have succeeded in producing them at about the same price as wood shingles. Let us figure with you at once.

There is no reason why the farmers of our country should put up with leaky roofs when we have acres of material we can supply quickly, at moderate prices.

ROOF-LEAK PAINTS (in Red, Green and Black) This splendid material is especially adapted for old Shingles and Metal and Felt Roofing of all kinds. In fact, any material that will take paint, can be made to last years longer by an application. Put up in large open-mouth cans of 1, 2, 3 and 5 gallons.

LLOYD-GEORGE'S BUSY OFFICE.

David Lloyd-George, Minister of Munitions, has proved himself a man of "push and go" in his new office. The bustle that pervades the new department would do credit to an American business man. During the first week of its existence it opened 190 local bureaus for recruiting munitions workers, set up a large central staff; wrote and placed eighty full page newspaper advertisements; issued 2,000,000 posters and leaflets; and organized other plans for pushing munitions work in every section of the country.

The home of the department, in Whitehall Gardens, has been built up around it while at work. Carpenters were still setting up walls and petitions around the officials at the end of the first week, and a number of typewriters and stenographers were temporarily accommodated in a bathroom. Lloyd-George and the members of his personal staff worked sixteen hours a day. Within three days the returns from their nation-wide campaign for munitions laborers was found to be in excess of all expectations.

The munitions courts, which will deal with offences under the new Munitions Act, are to be made up of a chairman, appointed by Lloyd-George, with an equal representation of employers and workmen.

PROFESSIONS HARD HIT.

The learned and artistic professions have been hard hit by the war. During the past six months over 2,000 applications have been filed with Professional Classes' War Relief Council, coming from artists, architects, surveyors, stockbrokers, engineers, musicians, lawyers, schoolmasters, authors, journalists, actors and craftsmen. Many requests related to education, and the Council provided schools for 77 boys and 57 girls. Medical aid, loans, assisted board and employment were among the other appeals. A permanent exhibition for the benefit of the fund has been opened in London. Here the professional artists in china, pottery, jewelry, basket, leather and art needle work expose their work for sale. Portrait painting is a special feature of the exhibition.

GERMAN RAID RESULTS

The Parliamentary Committee, which was appointed after the first German naval raid on the British coast, to investigate and compensate raid sufferers, has thus far distributed $450,000 in indemnities to those who suffered property damage in coast and air raids. Up to June 25th there had been altogether fourteen attacks on Great Britain by hostile aircraft, with total casualties as follows:

Killed: 56, of whom 24 were men, 21 women and 11 children. All the men killed were civilians.

Wounded, so far as ascertained, 138, of whom 86 were men, 35 women and 17 children.

FOUND MAMMOTH'S SKELETON.

The skeleton of a mammoth, one of the largest ever found, is being disinterred near Chatham, in the south of England, by a staff of scientists from the British Museum.

The creature was about thirteen feet high, and the tusks measure nine feet each. Isolated bones of the species have been discovered in England before, but never a complete skeleton.

Great care is exercised in excavating the bones, and as each is uncovered it is cased in plaster of paris and removed to a warehouse. Some of the bones are so heavy that it required four men to lift them on a truck.

LONDON MARRIAGES INCREASE.

A London registrar reports that the number of marriage licenses now being issued is nearly four times the normal. This is borne out in part by statistics which show that during the past three months there have been 1,000 more weddings in London than were held during the same three months last year. The bridegrooms include men home on leave from the trenches, men from the training camps and men about to enlist. The officials make matters easy for them, in deserving cases, by reducing the usual fee.

PREPARING TO USE GAS.

An indication that England is preparing to take up the war by gases and chemicals in earnest is seen in a call issued for men with training in chemistry to enlist for service abroad, presumably in France. They are to be enrolled in the Engineer Corps. Height and chest measurement are waived, and the eyesight test may be taken with glasses. Recruits are promoted to be corporals on enlistment, and will be further promoted to be sergeants on the field.

REFORM BOYS MADE GOOD.

Twenty thousand boys from reformatories and industrial reform schools have served with the British naval and military forces since the beginning of the war. Three of them have won the Victoria Cross, and 56 others have been rewarded with lesser decorations. The "roll of honor" shows that 7,100 of the boys have been killed or wounded.

NOTES.

Twelve men were killed outright and seven injured in a shocking accident on Wednesday week at the Bentinck colliery, Kirkby-in-Ashfield, belonging to the new Hucknall Colliery Co.

At the end of May only 595,100 people were receiving poor relief in England and Wales—a drop of 13.0 per 1,000 compared with 1875.

Mr. and Mrs. C. McCue, of Ridley Villas, Newcastle, who have just celebrated their golden wedding, have had twenty children, several of whom died in infancy.

Leeds Chamber of Commerce passed a resolution recommending that firms engaged on war munitions should be given better facilities for obtaining Government war buttons for their workpeople.

Mr. John Potter, coal merchant, of Alderly Edge, Cheshire's oldest chorister, has received a congratulatory letter from the members of the Marsden Wesleyan Choir on attaining his sixty-fifth anniversary as chorister.

The combined calendar for the Newcastle and Northumberland Assizes on Tuesday only contained nine names, two being on charges of wilful murder.

Edgar Woodthorpe, 28, an engineer, who was tried at the Old Bailey for the wilful murder of Dora Beatrice Carr, to whom he had been engaged to be married, was found guilty but insane at the time, and Mr. Justice Lush ordered him to be detained during His Majesty's pleasure.

At Shropshire Assizes Frederick Blakemore, miner, Snailbeach, was charged with the murder of his daughter. He had had trouble with the woman over her illegitimate child, and shot her, he contended, accidentally. The jury found a verdict of manslaughter, and he was sentenced to eighteen months' imprisonment.

The Rev. Evan Edwards, for three years assistant minister of Oswestry English Congregational Church, has accepted an appointment to the Shirebrook Congregational Church, Chesterfield.

The Rev. William Arthur Baker, vicar of Bourn, Cambridgeshire, has been appointed rector of Hemsworth in succession to the late Rev. J. Mowat, who held the living for over forty years.

Mr. Leonard Atkinson Ryalls, of Endcliffe Crescent, Sheffield, passed away on Wednesday at the age of 74 years.

Lieutenant Eric Fairbairn, the famous Cambridge oarsman, who rowed in the Olympic boat, has been killed at the front.

The death has taken place at Southport of Mr. Charles Nicholson, head of the Cerinthian Steamship Company, Liverpool, at the age of 60.

The death has occurred of Mr. Chas. Robert Hides, managing director and secretary of Messrs. Wheatman and Smith Ltd., saw and machine knife makers, Sheffield, at his residence, 316 Crookesmoor road.

Mr. Edgar L. Probert, son of Principal Lewis Probert, of Bangor, has been appointed chief accountant to the Minister of Munitions.

Mr. George Henry de la Cour, 76, High street, Chatham, jeweller, who died in December, has left £11,512 to bequeath his business premises, all his stock in trade, and business interests to Henry George Allen "in consideration of his more than twenty years' faithful service."

A fire broke out on Saturday week in the Glasgow fruit bazaar next to a building where hundreds of children were attending a demonstration. The officials kept silent about the affair, the organist played a march tune, and the children marched out of the building singing.

A Hull coroner's jury returned a verdict that Mr. Alfred Donison, a manufacturer of Hull, died from heart failure accelerated by shock through being wrongfully arrested by two gunners of the R. G. A.

The rectory of Lamport, Northants, is the headquarters of a scheme of shell making. A hundred amateur lathe workers in different parts of the country are turning shell parts from patterns and drawings supplied by the rector, the Rev. W. M. W. Pitchford, who receives their finished work and sends it in large batches to a munition works.

Mrs. Curtis or Margate, who has just celebrated her hundredth and second birthday, was present at an old folks' tea held at Sandwich, Kent.

"The trouble with this man is that he is making too much money. The other night he lit his pipe with a £1 note rather than give it to his wife and family." This statement was made at Newcastle-on-Tyne by a police superintendent with reference to a riveter named Samuel Gorman, who was fined 10s, with the alternative of seven days' imprisonment, for drunkenness on licensed premises.

Thunderstorms of great violence broke over Norfolk on Monday week. The storms covered nearly the whole county and were accompanied by heavy rains. Two deaths from lightning are reported. Second Lieut. Robt. Barry, Essex Regiment, who lived at Carnarvon road, Romford road, Stratford, was killed in the morning near the railway station at Mundesley. Shortly after 1 p. m. the dead body of Robert Pardill, a gardener, was found lying beneath an oak tree on the Claxton estate, near Loddon.

The village of Southery, Norfolk, is suffering from a plague of flies. Millions of them are to be found everywhere—in the street, the garden, and the house. So numerous are they that in the distance they are frequently mistaken for clouds of dust or smoke. They are small and resemble gnats. The cause of their appearance is said to be the scarcity of swallows and the floods which are still several feet deep in some parts of the district.

The top-hat and frock coat which for years had been worn by the inspectors in the sanitary department of Liverpool have been discarded by a third of the staff in favor of a peaked cap and short uniform jacket.

The Notts miners propose, in conjunction with the Derbyshire miners, to provide a complete motor convoy for war service at a cost of £20,000 and £1,000 a month working expenses. The coal owners in the two counties contemplate supplying similar equipment.

A collection of over 2,000 three penny bits was one of the gifts of Mrs. A. Fownes Somerville, of Dinder, Somerset, to her only daughter, Marjorie, who was married to the Rev. G. L. Porcher, rector of Dinder and a Prebendary of Wells Cathedral.

During his renovation of Wick House, Richmond Hill, Surrey, the supposed residence for several years of Sir Joshua Reynolds, an interesting discovery has been made. The owner of the house, writes a correspondent, noticed in the hall a certain coloring showing through the faded paper. Carefully removing the paper, she found a figure in his design in blue, brown and red. She is of the opinion that the design from its tone, style, and delicacy, may have been painted by Sir Joshua himself.

A DAINTY LINGERIE FROCK

There are numerous allover lace and embroidery patterns shown in the lingerie dresses for midsummer wear. Cream net-top lace very wide, with scalloped border, is used in this dainty gown. A tunic draped over a deep rose satin girdle falls in pannier effect on either hip, exposing the entire width of the girdle at the sides. The bodice in bolero effect, with long sleeves and embroidered collar is a very saucy affair.

LESS BLIND IN OUR COUNTRY

Canada Lightly Afflicted, Compared With Other Lands.

Over Two Million Sightless in the World.

The affliction of blindness is less common in America than in most other countries, reports the U. S. Census Bureau in a bulletin just issued on the blind population of the United States. Furthermore, it has apparently decreased among the youngest classes in the last half century. It appears from the census taken that Indians suffer much more than other races from the affliction, and that blindness is much more prevalent among negroes than among whites, and among men than women. The blind population of the United States in 1910 numbered 57,272, or 62.3 to each 100,000 of population. Trades taught in schools or workshops have prepared 1,500 blind persons for total or partial self-support.

It is estimated that the total number of blind persons in the world is 2,350,000. The total number enumerated at the most recent censuses of the blind in all countries in which such censuses have been taken is 1,194,346. These countries represent nearly all of Australia, nearly all of Europe and North America, and portions of South America, Africa, and Asia, together with certain of the insular possessions of European and American countries. Countries in which the ratios of the blind to total population are lower than that of the United States (62.3 per 100,000) are: Canada, 44.9 in 1911; Belgium, 42.5 in 1910; Germany, 60.9 in 1900; Denmark, 52.7 in 1911; Netherlands, 45.2 in 1909; New South Wales 54.1 in 1911; Western Australia, 50.5 in 1911, and New Zealand, 47.8 in 1911. These figures, in so far as they relate to countries now engaged in the conflict in Europe, are undoubtedly far behind the present-day average, so far, in fact, as to place the present ratio in the realm of conjecture rather than in the field of scientific calculation.

Although blindness may occur at any time of life, it is peculiarly a defect incident to old age. In fact, approximately one-half—49.1 per cent.—of the blind population reported in 1910 were sixty years of age and over, whereas only about one-fifteenth—6.5 per cent.—of the total population reported in 1910 were sixty years of age and over, whereas only about one-fifteenth—6.5 per cent.—of the total population were sixty years of age and over. To make the comparison in another way: The median age of the total population in 1910 was 24.2 years—that is, one-half the population was under that age and the other half had passed it—while the median age of the blind population was 53.6 years, or nearly two and one-half times as great. Among children under five years only 5 in every 100,000 were blind; but among persons eighty-five years of age and over, 2,273 in 100,000 were blind. Comparisons with earlier censuses indicate that there has been a decrease in the prevalence of blindness among the younger classes of the population.

Of the 31,473 blind males ten years of age and over in 1910, only 7,576, or 24.1 per cent., were reported as being gainfully employed, while of the 22,000 blind females ten years of age and over, only 1,315, or 5.6 per cent., were reported as gainfully employed. The corresponding percentages with reference to the total population were 81.2 for males and 23.4 for females. It does not follow, however, that more than 9,000 blind persons were actually self-supporting, since in most cases their earnings were far from sufficient to constitute a livelihood, and often amounted to a mere pittance of less than $100 a year. In this connection it should, of course, be borne in mind that a very considerable proportion of the blind population have already passed the age when retirement from active employment usually occurs, so that the number of blind persons not reporting an occupation does not by any means indicate the number of individuals lost to the working force of the United States by reason of blindness.

Particular interest attaches to the figures for those trades which have been found especially available as a means of employment for the blind, and the reporting of which presumably indicates the receipt of special vocational training after the loss of vision. The most important of these trades are broom-making, piano-tuning, chair-caning, basket-makers, mattress-making, carpet-and-rug-making, weaving, and hammock and net-making.

EARTHQUAKES.

Now, there are two curious points well worth noting about earthquakes which are not generally known.

In the first place, the more overwhelming the consequences of an earthquake may be in a human and material sense, the less interesting is it usually to the seismological expert; in the second place, the range of the shock is in inverse ratio to the amount of destruction which it causes on the earth's surface.

For the scientist who has specialized in the investigation of seismic disturbances will tell you that the really big earthquakes occur most frequently, not in populous countries like Italy and Japan, but in desolate regions far from the familiar centres of civilization or down in the depths of the ocean.

The fact that so many thousands of lives have been lost in an earthquake has less significance for the expert who is concerned with the scientific rather than the human consequences of the convulsion—that the effects which may have been made on the rock formations of the earth are inhabit.

Then the shocks which were visibly less the most violent have been the least rendered by actual waves of earth movement. Take the recent disaster. Although the Avezzano disaster was telling the story on that delicately sensitive instrument known as the seismograph in England long before the news of the latest earthquake had reached the country by cable, the writing on the tablets of the seismograph was less pronounced and definite in character than are many records made by shocks of which you and the rest of the newspaper-reading public have never even heard, since they cause no damage either to life or property.

But the earthquake shock which was felt in 1896 in London, and in many parts of England and Wales, though nowhere so severely as in Herefordshire and Worcestershire—where crockeryware was broken and people were thrown out of their beds—had the extraordinary travelling power of extending over an area of 100,000 square miles.

There are, you must know, such things as earth waves as well as other waves. But while the other waves have, by the genius of a Marconi, been harnessed into the service of mankind, no scientist has yet discovered any uses for earth waves, or even any means of utilizing them.

The shock of a seismic disturbance travels in waves at the rate of two miles a second in the actual vicinity of the disturbance, and this rate rapidly diminishes as the distance travelled by the earth waves increases.

The deeper the originating movement happens to be the farther the shock travels; but the deeper the movement, on the other hand, the less extensive, and usually the less serious from the point of view of loss of life, is the visible effect on the earth's surface.

Thus we have the apparent contradiction of the Herefordshire earthquake of 1896—so called because it is believed to have originated in that border county, if not in the bowels of the Black Mountains of Wales—was, from a scientific point of view, a bigger affair than the Avezzano or even Messina.

The largest recorded displacement of land surface was that consequent upon the Indian earthquake in 1897, when an area as big as the whole of Yorkshire was turned, so to speak, completely upside down.

Yet who can give a name to that earthquake to-day, though every schoolboy has heard of buried Pompeii, or the Lisbon and San Francisco earthquakes?—London Answers.

A LIGHT SUMMER SUIT.

Khakikool for summer wear is light and practical. The suit illustrated is featured in this material, and while it is severe, it is appropriate for this type of outfit. The plain circular skirt is topped by a rather severe long-sleeved jacket. Embroidered batiste collar softens the effect at the throat and an oriental girdle lends an interesting color note. Button boots and a black and white hat and parasol are details that complete the outfit.

To Change Umbrella Handles.

Sometimes a person would like to change an expensive umbrella handle to another umbrella and fasten it on solid. This can be done by cleaning out the hole left in the handle from the old rod and filling the whole with powdered sulphur. Place the handle in a solid upright position and after heating the umbrella's rod red hot push the rod down into the hole containing the sulphur. The hot rod fuses the sulphur, and when cool it will hold the rod solid. This method may be applied to fastening rods into stone, iron or wood.—Popular Mechanics.

Man never realizes the total depravity of mankind in general until some one steals from him the umbrella he stole from some other man.—Cincinnati Enquirer.

Was Constantly Troubled With Boils.

HAD NINE ON HIS ARMS AT ONCE.

Boils are caused by bad blood, and until the blood is made pure you cannot expect to get rid of them.

Ointments and salves will do you no good. You must get at the seat of the trouble by using a good internal blood purifying medicine such as that grand old remedy Burdock Blood Bitters.

Mr. Samuel Buckler, Tatamagouche, N.S., writes: "Last summer I was constantly troubled with boils. I had nine on my arms at once. I thought it was caused from bad blood so I got two bottles of Burdock Blood Bitters, and before the first bottle was done I began to feel a great deal better, and before the second one was finished I did not have a boil, nor have I had one since. I cannot recommend B.B.B. too highly."

Chats With the Doctor

BY A PHYSICIAN

CLOTHING FOR THE SEASON.

In certain districts of China where the sun is powerful by day and the cold severe at night the coolie laborers who work in the field begin their toil in the early morning clad in some twenty layers of clothing. As the sun rises in the sky they cast off one of these garments from time to time, until eventually they are dressed, or nearly so, exactly in nature's fashion, as when they first came into the world. Then as the sun declines in the horizon the process is reversed.

This is a wise and wholesome custom; and we, who are compelled by civilization to wear often many more clothes than we want, and pretty well always some that we should be physically better and more comfortable without—would do well to take note of it. We are not allowed to dispense entirely with covering; but at the same time we can study how judiciously to vary it with the changing seasons, and never to carry about more than is wholesome and easy at the moment. When the temperature varies considerably within a few hours, for example, it is always best to rely upon an overcoat or over-garment of some sort, that can be readily cast off at will, rather than to be clad in complicated vests, shirts, or other underwear which cannot be so adjusted to passing needs.

So much in our lives depends upon burdensome and irrational custom that it is the duty of every man or woman seeking health to study such matters largely for themselves, and not to be implicitly led by the example or the dogmas of others, who may be of very different temperament and constitution. No two of us are built exactly alike. Everybody differs in very numerous physical (to say nothing of mental) respects from every other, and also from himself or herself at a different period of life. So hard and fast rules applicable all round can never be laid down by the wisest doctor alive. Each must study his or her own health conditions independently.

Lord Dunraven tells a story of fishing in Nova Scotia, or some such country, where the ice was very thick (had to be broken for the sport), and the temperature ran far below zero. He and his friends wore thick furs; their Indian guide had only a single blanket. When this was remarked on he said, "I am all face." The story tends to indicate the influence of habit and custom in producing sensitiveness to cold, and vice versa.

As the warm weather is approaching it may be well to remark that numerous persons then make themselves ill by continuing to wear the heavy wrappings necessary in winter, and by having too many blankets at night. Nothing is gained, but much the reverse, by a rank fear of chills and draughts, which leads Germans and other strange people to shut out every breath of fresh air from bedrooms and railway carriages and sometimes to overburden themselves with clothing to a most unwholesome extent. In such matters a middle course is usually the safest and most prudent; and we do well to remember the anecdote above of the Chinese coolie.

ECZEMA.

Genuine eczema is one of the commonest of skin diseases; and, in most cases, is due to bad habits with neglect of healthy cleanliness. You stop up the pores of the skin—either by accumulated dirt or by continually wearing woolly under-garments saturated with perspiration; and nature only punishes you for the sin against her just laws.

In a patch of true eczema you find little orifices, the mouths of the sudoriparous duct glands, which "weep," i.e., exude a tiny drop of fluid. The latter congeals and forms a crust or scab. There is always itching and discomfort, even when the patches are not acutely inflamed, as they may be.

Towards cure glycerine in some form or other is the sheet anchor. As a rule, zinc ointment well mixed with glycerine, should be smeared on night and morning. If there is inflammation, it is sometimes better to put the glycerine in a bottle of lead lotion—an ounce of the former to a pint of the latter (you must get the lotion made up by a chemist), and dab on plenty with a sponge.

No soap should be used, and no water should directly touch the patch of eczema. But withal every precaution should be taken to maintain the entire skin in a cleanly and wholesome state, cotton or linen, not woollen undergarments should always be worn next the skin.

Sometimes there is a gouty disposition, and then that must be counteracted by a diet of little or no meat, plenty of fruit and vegetables, no salted meats or fish, no alcohol.

Dandriff, or dandruff, is a word of rather uncertain significance. Sometimes it denotes merely a scurfy condition of the scalp, a rather exaggerated secretion by the sebaceous glands which are connected with the hair-follicles. The best plan is to wash the scalp once or twice a week with the yolk of an egg—used as soap, and well kneaded throughout the possibly luxuriant tresses—then washed out again with warm water.

Sometimes the word is applied to a branny desquamation of the skin in other parts of the body—which the doctors technically term "Pityriasis." Here soap must always be religiously avoided; and the lead lotion with glycerine, above recommended for some forms of eczema, dabbed on with a sponge three or four times a day—being allowed to dry on.

EYRSIPELAS

Is a form of septic inflammation which may attack any wound, cut or prick in an unhealthy atmosphere—as once upon a time were the crowded wards of the old unreformed hospitals—or exposed to foul water or dirt. The first sine qua non of prevention is cleanliness all round.

A really severe attack of erysipelas needs the instant service of a skilled doctor, with internal and external measures of treatment. A mild one should be met with the local application of tincture of iodine by a camel's hair brush once a day. The painting should extend for a third of an inch beyond the edge of the actually inflamed skin. That must be kept as cool as possible, and no hot application suffered.

Sometimes one finds attacks of swelling in the face, under the eyes, styled erysipelas. Some people are subject to them. Unless there be organic disease, you find the cause to be a decayed tooth or tooth-stump—the stumps of the upper canine teeth are most liable to offend in this way—and that should be extracted.

LICHEN

Is a form of skin disease, characterized by an eruption of tiny red pimples. In the hot weather people find these between their fingers. That is the "prickly heat," which is such a burden in the tropics—technically "lichen tropicus."

Place two teaspoonfuls of of liquor plumbi subacetatis which you procure at the chemist's in a pint of rose water, and use frequently as a lotion with a sponge.

HAD CHOLERA INFANTUM.

Doctor Said He was In a Very Dangerous Condition.

Mothers cannot watch their children too closely for signs of cholera infantum, as this disease carries off thousands of infants during the hot summer months.

Mrs. Geo. W. Garland, Prosser Brook, N.B., writes: "Last summer my boy Joe, then a year old, was taken sick with cholera infantum. He was so bad the waste matter from the bowels looked as if it had come from a broken boil. I sent word to the doctor who was at a neighbor's, about a mile distant, and he said my boy was in a very dangerous condition. He sent me some tablets which made the child vomit, and when he learned that they caused vomiting he sent me more tablets to stop it. In the meantime I had been giving Dr. Fowler's Extract of Wild Strawberry which I continued using, and when the bottle was all used my baby was cured. I though it only fair to let you know about it."

Dr. Fowler's Extract of Wild Strawberry has been on the market for the past 70 years, and is known from one end of Canada to the other as a positive cure for all bowel complaints.

When you ask for "Dr. Fowler's" be sure you get what you ask for as there are many rank imitations on the market.

PAINLESS WOUNDS.

Almost a Pleasure to be Shot in Modern Warfare.

The soldier of to-day may be literally riddled with bullet wounds and yet he may be a sound man, fighting his country's battles again, within a few weeks.

Strange as it may seem, the modern small calibre bullet, which leaves the rifle with a velocity of a mile in two seconds, with a pressure behind it of 40,000 pounds per square inch, and has a range of three miles or more, is far less deadly than the old-time bullet which could be laughed at if it came from a distance over a quarter of a mile.

Indeed, a man may be wounded again and again and yet may fight for hours, scarcely conscious that he has been hit. Thus a doctor who accompanied the French forces in Abyssinia says:

"Several of the suite of Menelik told me that when a bullet had gone right through them, their men lost none of their dash. If the bullet did not kill at once—and nine times out of ten it did not—they did not even know they were wounded."

"Painless death or almost certain painless recovery from the wounds," says another doctor, who was in the present war, "is the alternative fate of the soldier stricken down by the modern small calibre bullet. "If he is not killed outright, his wounds almost invariably heal. Of nearly 1,400 wounded men who passed under my hands, only three died of their wounds."

And no less remarkable than its humanity are the antics played by the modern bullet, as has been illustrated hundreds of times in the present war. Thus we read of one bullet which, after striking the ground, entered a soldier's left cheek. Passing downward and inward it caused a compound fracture of the hard palate. It then entered the mouth, was stopped by the lower teeth of the opposite side, and was taken out of the mouth by the man himself.

In another case the bullet entered the forehead of a man, when stooping, passed through his brain and came out at the back of his neck. Re-entering a few inches further down, it emerged finally at his right shoulder-blade. And yet, in spite of these terrible wounds, the man was fighting again within six weeks!

An equally singular case was that of a French sergeant, who, while firing at the enemy in a recumbent position, was struck by a bullet which passed through his right cheek, plowed its way through his shoulder and the lower part of his body, re-entered at the calf and finally came to rest in the heel of his foot, from which it was recovered.

In other words, his body was perforated four times by the same bullet, with so little damage that five weeks later the man won the medaille d'honneur.

Another army surgeon tells us of one man who was shot through from side to side, with both lungs traversed, but without any symptom, even of bleeding.

"There was," he says, "just a small red spot where the bullet went in, and a small red spot where it came out. If his leg had not been cracked by another shot he would not have been in the hospital."

There are, also, many cases on record in which men shot through the heart have survived to fight again. In such cases, we are told:

"We must suppose that the bullet struck the heart just as it was drawn hard together in its closest contraction."—Pearson's Weekly.

FARM AND GARDEN

MUSKMELON CULTURE.

The Farmer's Cyclopedia of Agriculture says, contrary to the usual belief, the muskmelon does not cross with cucumber, squashes, etc., and the quality of fruit is not injured when they are planted with or near those crops. The term cantaloupe is frequently but incorrectly applied to the whole group of muskmelons. It is properly applied to only one group, which is characterized by a hard, scaly and often deeply furrowed rind, having a warty appearance like a Hubbard squash. The cantaloupe is little grown in this country, but it is prized in Europe.

The continual thought, care and labor bestowed upon the growing of a crop will not avail us much unless the same thorough methods are maintained throughout the harvesting and marketing of it. Regarding no one crop is this more true than it is with muskmelons. First, because the muskmelon must remain on the vine until it is fully developed or else we sacrifice that characteristic lusciousness so essential in maintaining the demand, and, secondly, because as soon as picked all haste possible must be made in placing it before the consumer or it will soon be over-ripe. Joseph Harton says in muskmelon picking an experienced eye is almost an essential and consequently good hands must be used. For shipping purposes, either local or long distance, the melon should be picked as soon as the stem can be peeled out by using a moderate amount of force. By peeling out, it does not mean broken out, but a natural peeling out, which leaves a juicy excretion around the hole where the stem came from. Not until the stem will do this has a muskmelon obtained its full amount of flavor, in other words, is not at its best. As soon as picked they should be hurried into a refrigerator car, or, if shipping in a local way and not using ice, sent to their destination as soon as possible. A field should be picked at least once every day, and in hot weather twice during the 24 hours. This frequent picking not only saves actual loss of over-ripe fruit, but, what is a more important consideration, it secures a better condition of the melons shipped, a more uniform article. An article that the dealer can depend upon as being the same from day to day, and insures him against loss in handling.

In packing, of course every locality has its individual form of package, and that is immaterial, but the important point is in the care of sorting, to discard every melon that is imperfect in any way or out of condition at all. This will of necessity make considerable waste. Of course, if the market will warrant it, some of this inferior fruit can be shipped as seconds, but maintain the standard of the prime package at any cost, and gain that hold on the trade that will secure the top price. This invariably pays in the long run. The above methods apply in a greater or less degree to all truck crops. The importance of thorough, frequent picking is often underestimated.

FARM NEWS AND VIEWS.

It has been asserted by some dairymen that the feeding of crushed oats to cows will improve the flavor of the milk. To ascertain the correctness of this theory a series of experiments was made by the Bureau of Animal Industry of the United States Department of Agriculture, at the experimental dairy farm at Beltsville, Md. Six cows were used in experiment; three were fed a grain ration of cornmeal, bran and cottonseed meal; the other two were fed a grain mixture of five parts crushed oats and one part cottonseed meal. A number of samples of milk from the cows fed these rations were submitted to various persons in the dairy division, and they were asked to indicate their preference. In all fifty opinions were passed on various samples. Of these, 16 showed a preference for the milk from cows fed on crushed oats, 25 preferred that from the bran and corn ration, while nine expressed no choice. The results show that in these rations, not only was there no marked difference in favor of the crushed oats as a feed to improve flavor, but, if anything, the ration containing bran and corn was more successful in producing a fine-flavored milk than was the oats.

It sometimes happens that farmers are in possession of extra good cows, but not realizing the amount of feed required by cows giving a large yield, they are soon allowed to shrink in milk because the food given does not provide sufficient nutriment. While cows in good condition can, for a time, give more milk than the feed provides, by drawing upon the fat stored in the body, yet if the grain is not gradually increased as the cows lose in body weight, there will soon follow an abnormal shrinkage in milk flow and also a decrease in the quality of milk yielded.

A remedy which is recommended by the Iowa Station as a preventative of worms and which is to be kept before the hogs at all times, is made of three parts each of glauber's salts, salsoda, copperas, common salt, and one part of flowers of sulphur. This mixture must be kept covered from rain and can be made up in large quantities at home, as it is easily prepared and is cheap in cost of materials.

Lime stimulates the decay of organic matter and hastens plant growth. It is an indirect fertilizer, a soil stimulant and an antidote for soil acidity. It is necessary to the successful growth of clover, alfalfa, beans, peas and other leguminous crops on acid soils.

Sheep have many good points to recommend them as farm animals of over the soil surface. and the wool is very rich and evenly distributed profit. They are prolific, the manure and flesh will always command a good price in the market, not to mention other favorable qualities.

One pound of hay and one pound of grain for every hundred pounds of the horse's weight under normal conditions is a good feed. For extra heavy work or long hours increase the grain portion. Too much hay especially clover, will overload the stomach and crowd lung action; hence the old saying, "Clover hay brings on the heaves."

It is a good idea to teach the foal to eat out of the same box as her dam, and it is astonishing how little tuition even with very young colts is necessary when the food is placed within easy reach.

A veterinarian gives this advice to the shoeing of young horses: Don't allow young horses to wear a set of shoes more than a month. Have them removed, the hoofs levelled and the shoes reset if they are worth it.

It has been definitely proved that mouldy corn will produce blind staggers in horses, and if feeding of mouldy corn does not result in bringing on this disease it will tend to injure the physical condition of the animal.

The silo increases the live stock capacity of every farm, and it means better methods of feeding, which means greater profit to the silo owner.

Look after the old neglected fruit trees. Remove all dead branches and water-sprouts, and then cut the top so as to let in plenty of air and sunshine. Scrape off the old dead bark on the trunk and apply a strong solution of soap suds and lye.

Garden crops should be rotated just as well as field crops, especially cabbage and Irish potatoes. Soil on which these crops are grown one year after another is pretty sure to become infested with diseases that cut down both yield and quality.

You might as well expect to grow good corn without cultivating as to grow good fruit without spraying. A good barrel spraying outfit can be had for about $15. Get one and use it if you would have more fruit and better fruit—size, color and quality.

There are two ways of testing seed corn. One way is to test a few grains from each seed ear in damp sawdust, soil, or cloth, before planting. The other way is to put the seed in the ground without any knowledge of its germinating quality. Either way you find out whether or not the seed is good, but the field method of testing is often mighty expensive, because if the seed isn't good the fact is discovered too late to profit by it.

THE POULTRY WORLD

HOME PRESERVING OF EGGS.

(By W. A. Brown, B. S. A.)

Eggs are a perishable food product, and while their production is distributed throughout the year with much greater uniformity than many other food products, yet it is a fact that new-laid eggs are usually scarce and high in price between the months of October and February, and plentiful and comparatively low in price in the spring and early summer months.

The cost of preserving eggs by artificial refrigeration is considerable, and while it is not believed that any liquid preservatives will give better results than those obtained in well-built and carefully managed cold storages, yet it is conceded that there are times when those consumers, who will go to the trouble and take the necessary precautions, will find it to their advantage to preserve a reasonable quantity for home use.

As the result of much technical investigation and years of practical test it has been found that the best results can be obtained from the use of water-glass and limewater. While the limewater method is undoubtedly less expensive and just as efficacious, yet popular opinion seems to be constantly growing in favor of water-glass.

Water glass is a solution of silicate of soda, and may be obtained from practically all druggists. A 10 per cent. solution is generally used, that is one part of water-glass is mixed with nine parts of water.

The water should first be boiled in order to destroy all vegetable and animal substance contained therein. The two substances are then thoroughly mixed, and the solution allowed to stand until it becomes quite cold before using.

Previous to the advent of artificial refrigeration, lime-water was used commercially to a large extent. Some large dealers still use it to supplement cold storage, and many people use it as a home preservative. Although authorities differ somewhat as to the relative amounts of lime and water to be used, the proportions of two pounds of lime to five gallons of water are generally recommended. It is important, however, that the water take into solution as much lime as it is capable of holding. A quantity of fine salt in proportions of about one pint to the above is also frequently added. The mixture should be kept well stirred for a few hours, and then allowed to settle. The supernatant liquid is then drawn off, and poured over the eggs. In order that the solution may be kept saturated and of uniform strength throughout it is customary to add a little lime from time to time, or better, to keep a cloth covered with lime just touching the surface.

Any receptacle that is impervious to, and does not corrode in, water is suitable for holding the eggs. Glazed earthenware crocks, galvanized tubs or buckets, or wooden tubs or kegs are most frequently used. In the case of wooden receptacles it is desirable to let them stand filled with water for several days, and then to scald them and cleanse them thoroughly before using. For home consumption it is best to have a number of small containers holding not more than five or six dozen each. Covers should be placed over all containers, and these, when filled, should be stored in a cool, dry place in the cellar.

Best results are obtained from eggs which are put down in April and May. At this time eggs are not only abundant and cheaper in price than later, but they are also fuller, stronger bodied and of all-round better quality than those available during the hot weather. An important and safe precaution is to candle all eggs. This is not a difficult or complicated process, for fortunately an egg is semi-transparent when held before a light in a darkened room and permits, if carefully rotated, of even minor defects being seen.

NOTES.

The early hatched fowls will be the winners at the fall fairs and also fill the egg basket in early winter. The July hatched chick has its place, but not as a winter egg producer or winner at the early shows.

Strange what a cry goes up when milk or eggs, two important items in the food line, go up in price. It is but natural that the consumer wishes to obtain everything in the food line as cheap as possible, but what of the producer, the one who makes life possible. He, too, must live, but cannot when prices are forced so low as to allow no profit. There is not much give and take when the consumer and and producer get together.

Cold storage products should be labeled as such, especially poultry and eggs, and not palmed off on the public as fresh. There will always be cold storage poultry and egg, and it is fit for any one to eat if properly kept, but it is not fresh killed poultry or eggs, and it is not just as good and should go to the consumer under the proper name.

Dog days will soon be here, and this means that the poultry must have extra attention that the hot days and nights. Well-ventilated poultry buildings are essentials toward healthy poultry. Plenty of fresh air and roomy quarters will do much toward making the flock more profitable.

This is a safe and sane poultry year. No great boom on, but a steady improvement shown in both stock and equipment. Not so many madcap schemes are in the public eye as in former years when the $6.41 net profit per hen peer year commercially speaking, was floated, misleading many beginners in the belief that all could earn $6.41 on each and every hen. It can't be done commercially—and is more than should really be expected. But then the poultry fancier finds many ways to count profits.

Why Soldiers Need Teeth.

That recruit who on being rejected on account of his teeth said he did not know he had to bite the enemy had evidently not realized the possibilities of an army biscuit. Its ingredients are meal, salt and water, kneaded by machinery into a thick paste and baked—hard; but, though it requires "some" teeth to tackle it, yet it has good points. It is highly nutritious; a pound of bread is equal to but three-quarters of biscuit. It does not easily turn bad or get stale, and it can be packed into the knapsack, mixing on equal terms with the heterogeneous collection of articles that it always contains, and it emerges triumphantly as a biscuit and not a heap of crumbs.—London Mail.

THE FLY DANGER

Canadian Department of Agriculture's Circular On the Pest.

House flies are now recognized as most serious carriers of the germs of certain diseases, such as typhoid fever, tuberculosis, infantile diarrhoea, etc.

They infect themselves in filth and decaying substances, and by carrying the germs on their legs and bodies and in their intestines they pollute food, especially milk, with the germs of the above and other diseases and of decay.

Every fly carries germs. A single fly may carry as many as 500 million germs upon and inside its body.

The best method is to prevent their breeding. House flies breed in decaying or decomposing vegetable and animal matter and in excrement. They breed chiefly in stable refuse. In cities this should be stored in dark fly-proof chambers or receptacles, and it should be regularly removed within six days in summer. Farm-yard manure should be regularly removed within the same time and either spread on the fields or stored at a distance of not less than a quarter of a mile, the further the better, from a house or dwelling.

Manure piles may be treated with borax, using six-tenths of a pound to every eight bushels or ten cubic feet of manure. Scatter the dry borax principally around the sides and edges of the pile and wash in with water.

House flies breed in such decaying and fermenting matter as kitchen refuse and garbage. Garbage receptacles should be kept tightly covered.

All such refuse should be burnt or buried within a few days, but at once if possible. No refuse should be left exposed. If it cannot be disposed of at once, it should be sprinkled with borax, as above, or with chloride of lime.

Flies in Houses.—Windows and doors should be properly screened, especially those of the dining-room and kitchen. Milk and other food should be screened in the summer by covering it with muslin; fruit should be covered also.

Where they are used, especially in public places, as hotels, etc., spittoons should be kept clean, as there is very grave danger of flies carrying the germs of consumption from unclean spittoons.

Flies should not be allowed to have access to the sick room, especially in the case of infectious diseases.

To Kill Flies in Houses.—Mix two tablespoonfuls (one ounce) of 40 per cent. formalin (a solution which may be obtained from any drug store at about 40 cents per pound bottle), with one pint (sixteen ounces) of equal parts of milk and water. This mixture should be exposed in shallow plates, and a piece of bread placed in the middle of each plate will enable the flies to alight and feed. All dead flies should be swept up and burnt. The burning of pyrethrum in a room, preferably at night, is sometimes effective; the flies should be swept up and burnt, as many are only stupefied by this substance.

House flies indicate the presence of filth in the neighborhood or insanitary conditions.

LIGHTNING RODS

Prof. Day, of O. A. C., Sends Out a Warning.

Prof. Wm. H. Day, of the department of physics, Ontario Agricultural College, Guelph, has sent out another warning against inferior lightning rods. He says:

One of the same companies that bunco'd the farmers with iron-centred rods last year is reported to be selling the same rod again this year. Watch out for them.

There is no difficulty in spotting these rods. The outside covering is a thin sheet of copper. Inside of the copper is a strip of galvanized steel or iron one-half inch wide and two galvanized steel or iron wires about No. 10. The copper sheath is twisted round the strip and wires, giving the rod a corrugated appearance. The steel or iron will rust out in from five to ten years. For photograph of what happened to a rod of this kind in less than eight years see figure 34, bulletin 220, which may be had by writing the Department of Agriculture, Toronto.

An Illinois firm is circularizing the trade and others, advocating the "Mast" lightning rod system. They declare that twisted cables are positively dangerous, claiming that they act like "choke-coils," that tubes only should be used, that insulators must be used, etc. For concentrated essence of error these circulars surpass anything else I have seen.

Beware of the man with the iron-centred rod and the man who claims that twisted cables are dangerous. This department will be glad to be informed regarding the operations of either

CROOKED WORK ON GALLIPOLI

How German Guile is Hampering the Australians.

But it Usually Brings Its Own Penalty.

The London Morning Post on June 25th published a letter from an Australian trooper in the Eastern Mediterranean, showing to what an extent the allied troops in Gallipoli are confronted by German method and system. This letter shows that many features of warfare are now being practised in the Mediterranean which the Germans gave prominence to in the Western Theatre. In reverting to the game used in Gallipoli, the writer of the letter states:

The shades of night naturally lend themselves to the guileful scheme, and it is under this protection that ruses are usually essayed. A sound knowledge of English and, strange to say, a painstaking study of bush slang seems to be part of the mental equipment of the German officers. No little confusion was caused at first owing to these men, whose knowledge of our units and their commanders was astonishing, and no doubt the result of secret service at Cairo, penetrating our lines and assuming the role of colonial officers. It must be understood that this did not signify the guilelessness on our part, or confusion in our ranks. We must not lose sight of the fact that owing to the desperate nature of the conflict, the great mortality among our commanders and the rapid transference of intermingled troops from one point to another, the various units were welded into one fighting whole. Nothing was easier than for a daring man to pass orders along the line, having previously clothed himself in the garments of one of our dead officers, and learned his name from the identity disc worn around the corpse's neck. I will enumerate, for instance, various orders that I passed along, perfectly satisfied at the time of their good faith. "Indian scouts returning on our left; right flank fire rapid to protect them." Immediately turbaned figures appeared, and before we realized the position they got a Maxim into position and poured in a hot fire. They had collected the uniforms of dead Sikhs, (once bit, twice shy). A Sikh was at once posted here and there along the line. Soon the same trick was attempted at another point. A German, in front this time, called: "Don't fire; we are Indians." A Sikh shouted a few words. No reply. Perhaps three of the thirty odd masqueraders got back, and without their machine gun. Another order came along: "French advancing on our left and English on our right, only fire in centre." From mouth to mouth we passed it along. In five minutes heavy counter-attacking parties got right up to our trenches, before the position was realized, and the bayonet had to be resorted to. Steps were taken as soon as possible to prevent these daring Germans fooling us again like this. No order was permitted to be passed along, save in writing. This served as a safeguard against another danger as well. It became evident that keen-eared scouts would creep up in the scrub and listen to orders being passed along, and gain much that was of use to their side. If "Ammunition running short" was called too loudly it was more than an even chance; if an attack was on the way towards our line then, the trench short would bear the brunt of it. Of course when at the earliest possible moment the units were reorganized, much of the danger mentioned above was eliminated. An authenticated story is told of a German, who, one moonlight night, succeeded in worming his way through the scrub unobserved (that was before our engineers had put down the fire entanglements) and sauntered along in front of our lines, exhorting our fellows to "Keep your pecker up." A voice queried from the trench, "Where from, matey?" "Broken Hill," was the reply. "Who runs the big two-up joint?" No answer. Bang! Yes; the lads get shrewder every day, and they were not Simple Simons when they arrived.

In the matter of mines, too, the Prussian tried his hand, but with indifferent success. We had a good sprinkling of old soldiers among us, who "fought shy" of comfortably constructed crossings and newly turned earth. We have been told that both the beach encampment and the larger one further back were mined in various places. The disturbance of the troops' rest at night is another phase of Germany's influence on Turkish ideas of war. All night long an extravagant expenditure of ammunition goes on, serving no other purpose than to keep those manning the trenches alert. The general character of the night attacks is reminiscent of what we read of the doings on other fronts. The enemy advances frequently in close formation, making all manner of weird noises on their bugles and with their lungs. Our men, when they hear the shouting call out "Taala mena" ("Come here" in Egyptian Arabic.) An incident which caused the entrenched line to meet one attack in mirthful spirit was when "Come to the cook house" was blown frantically for the approaching foe, apparently in mistake for the "Retire." Ottoman buglers made nerve-racking slaughter of our calls, and all to no purpose. The old Prussian Guard scheme of advancing in two or more lines in close formation, with machine guns carried in the rear, was nearly, but not quite, successful. On the occasion when the Turks tried their luck with it the front line lay flat just as one of our battalions was preparing to leave the trenches to which the [illegible]. As it happened, our men were ordered back, and our machine guns played havoc with that party before it could do any damage.

In the use of dummy guns or figures, the Turk or German does his best, but rarely deceives the navy or artillery. Without doubt the German military autocracy in Turkey has [illegible] the efficiency of the army the allies have to fight. How long their bludgeoning career will endure, the future will tell.

HAVE YOUR JELLIES EVER REFUSED TO SET?

Though only best fruit is used, and every precaution taken in cooking and placing in jars, jellies sometimes unaccountably refuse to set.

Many cooks don't know that the SUGAR may be the cause, as if it contains organic matter, fermentation sets in and jelly will not set. Be on the safe side—Buy

A solution of ammonia, applied 3 or 4 times to a cold sore, will remove it, if done when first felt.

To sharpen a knife, fold a piece of emery paper in the centre and draw the knife rapidly back and forth several times.

A useful idea in porch furniture is to have a shelf inside the porch rail, about one foot wide and one foot from the porch. The men will find an excellent foot rest; the women a shelf for workbaskets or books, and just what the children want to sit on.

If cold coffee is used in mixing stove blacking, the stove will keep bright much longer.

Two drams of sal-ammoniac in an ounce of German cologne is said to cure freckles. The solution should be added to a pint of soft water before using. Apply three times daily, with a sponge.

To clean a bottle or decanter, fill it with sea salt and shake it till all stains are removed.

If a strong brine of salt and water is thrown over the coals less soot will collect in the flues and chimneys. The fire, too, will burn clear and bright.

An easy way to skin a beet without bleeding it and causing it to lose color is to put it in cold water as soon as it is cooked. Then draw the hand gently down each one and the skin will drop off without trouble.

To nourish a fern, put a couple of raw oysters under the dirt, close to the roots, and the fern will grow like magic.

Use lemon juice and salt to remove iron rust on white goods.

FOOD, FINGERS, FLIES.

Three of the Factors Most Active in Spreading Disease.

There are three principal ways in which disease germs are carried from person to person, and these ways may be easily remembered by three catch words—food, fingers and flies.

The most important foods which carry disease are those which are eaten raw, since thorough cooking destroys disease germs and most cooked foods are only dangerous when they have been infected in the kitchen after cooking. Among raw foods, too, many, like oranges, are safe because they are peeled before eating.

Of all foods the most dangerous are water and milk, because they are often polluted by sewage in the case of water, by human contact in the case of milk), because they are drunk promptly without time for the disease germs to die out and because, usually in the case of water and often in the case of milk, they are not cooked.

The second way in which disease germs are commonly spread is by means of contact between people themselves. Fingers, in the catch phrase, which all who value their health, should try to bear in mind, stands not only for the fingers themselves, but for all sorts of ways in which disease germs may be exchanged.

In measles and whooping cough and scarlet fever and diphtheria and tuberculosis and many other diseases the germs are present in the nose and throat and are spread from person to person by the fingers, which go too often to the mouth and nose, by drinking cups and spoons and other things which too often are used in common and by the fine spray thrown out from the mouth in coughing and sneezing. In typhoid fever and diarrhoea and similar diseases the germs are found in the intestinal discharges and here, too, soiled fingers play an important part in the transmission of the disease.

The third common way in which disease germs are spread is by means of insects. Flies are perhaps the most important insect germ carriers in most states. They often pick up infected material on their legs and bodies and carry it to food, and where there is no good system of sewage disposal they may play a part in the spread of such diseases as typhoid fever. A certain kind of mosquito carries malaria, and this, too, is important in certain districts. In tropical countries a whole host of diseases is carried by insects.—New York American.

COSTS OF A FUNERAL SOAR UP.

The following is quoted from an unusual article by Lewis Edwin Theiss, entitled "The High Cost of Dying Problem" in Pictorial Review for August, 1915.

Even burial costs have kept pace with other costs in these days of soaring prices. From the books of an undertaker who has been many years in business I have copied three funeral bills for the years 1868, 1881 and 1909 respectively, for eighty-four dollars, one hundred and sixteen dollars and two hundred and eight dollars and fifty cents. In the first period of twenty-eight years, the cost rose forty per cent., while the increase from one hundred and sixteen dollars to two hundred and eight dollars and fifty cents shows a jump into the second twenty-eight year period of eighty per cent.

In addition to a necessary increase in funeral prices which, by the way, is consequent upon the greater cost of supplies, the fashion of elaborateness—for fashion governs even our funerals—adds tremendously to the final cost. Very elaborate crapes at the door, mourning costumes, that have previously been hired by dozens of other people who wanted to make a show of "respectability," and other items of a similar nature are rented by undertakers at so much apiece—if the deceased is friendless, the undertaker will gladly supply pall-bearers—at so much per pall-bearer. In fact the undertaker will supply his customer with anything whatsoever needed to make a funeral "respectable."

Demand cheaper funerals and you will get them. Throw off the shackles of a foolish custom. Refuse to burden the living uselessly for the dead. Fashion alone—the fashion of ostentation—leads to most of the unnecessary expenditure in time of death. Help to pave the way for simplicity by practising simplicity yourself. If you do that, you will help to straighten many bent backs and to smooth many care-worn brows.

The Age of Genius.

At the age of 18 David is said to have written his first psalm. Shelley wrote "Queen Mab" and Mendelssohn composed his music for "A Midsummer Nights Dream."

At 19 Bryant wrote "Thanatopsis."

At 21 Disraeli wrote "Vivian Grey."

At 24 Horace is said to have written his first odes, Heine published his first songs and Schiller's "The Robbers" had made him famous.

At 24 Shakespeare wrote his first play.

At 26 Sheridan wrote "The School for Scandal."

At 30 Confucius began his religious works.

At 31 Pliny finished his "German War."

At 34 Luther wrote his 95 theses; Baxter wrote "Saints Everlasting Rest" and Thomas a Kempis wrote "Imitation of Christ."

At 35 Mohammed began the Koran and Poe wrote "The Raven."

At 36 Thackeray's "Vanity Fair" had appeared.

At 50 Bunyan finished "A Pilgrim's Progress."

At 51 Dante finished his "Divina Commedia."

At 60 Homer is said to have composed the Iliad.

Values in Men's Suits

of the Better Grade

There are three outstanding features in the get up of our suits that make for the best "Suit Satisfaction"—they're particularly well made, tailored to fit perfectly and 'All-wool Quality". These suits are of the seasons most popular colorings, greys, blues and dark browns in neat small checks.

These models are cut in styles to suit the young man and the fuller figure for men. The linings is best serge quality. Trousers have belt loops. Special values at $12.50, $14.50 and $15.00.

MEN'S NEGLIGEE SHIRTS

In White, Cream, Tan and Blue. Algerian Silk and fine corded repps with soft collar and tie to match. Have soft double cuffs, seams double sewn. Sizes 14 to 16½. Special at $1.50.

CHILDREN'S WHITE & COLORED DRESSES—WASHABLE

Pretty plaid ginghams and fancy striped linnenettes in good wash shades of pink, blues, tans, etc. White all-over embroidery and white lawn, embroidery trimmed. All nicely made and well finished: Square and V shaped necks and short sleeves. Sizes to fit the ages of 4 to 12 years. Marked to sell at 50c, 75c, 95c. and $1.15.

EXQUISITE MID-SUMMER WASH GOODS

These are dainty voiles in white, pink and blue shades, the new seed voile and rice voile, crystallines and white repps with woven floral spot in pink, blue and green combination. All these lines are the newest in wash goods for mid-summer wear. Per yard 35c, 45c. and 50c

THE CAMPFIRE AND MILITARY MIDDY

Two delightful styles in these popular middy blouses, distinct and new. The one is pleated, has belt at back and lace strings, and comes in all white. The other has high Military collar in all white, or trimmed with blue and red. Collar will button up or fold down. Prices $1.50 and $1.75.

ENGLISH TAPESTRY FLOOR RUGS

These rugs are of the best grade English Tapestry, imported direct by us and are splendid buying values. Colors green, reds, fawn, brown and grey in pretty designs. Sizes 2½ x 3, 3 x 3, 3 x 3½, 3 x 4, and 3½ x 4. Prices $7.75, $8.50, $9.50, $10.00 and $11.50.

TWO EXTRA VALUES IN MEN'S NAVY BLUE SERGE SUITS

We call these extra values because we know that they cannot be beaten anywhere. The serge is of extra fine All-wool quality, soft in finish. Not that hard finish that will wear to a shiny gloss. Six months ago we placed a large order for these lines, and in future while we may be able to give you serge suits at these prices, it is very doubtful whether the grade of wool will be as good. They're splendidly tailored and finished. Perfect fitting. Sizes 33 to 46. Very special at $15.00 & $18.00.

Letter From France.

very sorry to say, are both out of the firing line. One is in the hospital here and the other who is only 21, is in England suffering from gas to such an extent that he has to wear glasses and is kept awake always with a terrible cough. He was in our second battalion, my old battalion in which I served in India. It was on our left on Whitsun, Monday, when we were attacked by gas at 2:30 in the morning. We now have ample means to cope with it by using our gas helmets and respirators.

We have been in our present position for 30 days and are never further than a mile from the trenches. I shall be glad when we are released so that we can see a civilian.

Ypres is now almost to the ground, either shelled or burned, as there is a continuous fire there night and day. I have a few post cards of the streets and Cloth Hall before and after the bombardments of all places that I have been to and stayed.

There is a rosary at home which I received as a gift from a Belgian who gave it to me after another chap and I assisted him from his house when it was being shelled. I have sent many other small things home including a bolt from a German rifle which we took like this:—There was a German sniper in a small house who had been doing a lot of damage while we were at La Basse, so six of us lay in wait over night close by and when daylight came, detected his whereabouts so when he exposed himself to our view we all fired together so there would be no chance of missing him and am glad to say he sniped no more. When we advanced a little later we went to the spot and there he lay and of course we took souvenirs before we buried him. I secured the bolt of his rifle which I sent home. Another article is there which I secured when I had a very narrow escape. A big Jack Johnston shell had just exploded about 50 yards in front of us so I said if they put their range up they would drop in our dugouts and advised that we move to the right. Three of us went, the others remaining and when we had been away fifteen minutes over came a Jack Johnston and exploded right in the dugout, killing all who had remained except one and he is now discharged from the service with his left side shattered. We went back at night to dig for our comrades but found the remains of only two. In a haversack of one was a tin of Capstan Tobacco, which I have sent home in rememberance of him. It had never been opened but was bent almost flat as you can see.

There are many, many tales to tell, both amusing and sad, and I only wish I could get leave to go home a few days, but I'm afraid I won't be granted that. I shall be glad to get the five days in London, however, as it will be a great relief to get away from the continuous banging of guns and be able to walk about knowing that you are safe.

Now about Walkerton, daresay things are very quiet there. I do hope and trust that I will be spared to return again. I suppose the farms and gardens are by now in lovely condition. I have a great many tales to tell but will save them for when I return which I hope will be soon.

Thank you for your kind offers to send me anything I like and would be pleased to receive something to smoke.

Give my regards to all my friends in Walkerton.

Yours truly,
G. J. GRIFFIN.

The British losses in the war thus far including both her military and naval forces total 330,995.

The Dominion immigration officials are deluged with requests for farm labourers, but the supply of experienced men is practically exhausted.

Kitchener's Army.

A despatch to the New York Tribune announced that a new British Army is in France, making the total British forces there about two million men. The despatch hints that there will be something doing about August 1st. Previous to this the number of British soldiers in France, was less than half a million. The portion of the line defended by British soldiers was only 33 miles in length but it was the "bloody section" of the line.

The Finest Crop in History.

Taking the West as a whole from the eastern boundary of Manitoba to the Rockies, the promise is for the finest crop in the history of the country. Over this vast area, one thousand miles long by one to four hundred wide, grain is in head and presents a strong, healthy growth. This season has once more proved wheat a cool weather plant, as corn is a hot weather plant. The danger of crop failure is over now, and with good ripening harvesting weather the 12,500,000 acres in wheat should yield 250,000,000 to 312,000,000 bushels. At 20 bushels to the acre the yield would be 250,000,000.

Five Horses Burned to Death.

Five fine horses, averaging in worth over $150, were burned to death shortly before two o'clock Wednesday morning when the livery stable of Drs. James and M. H. Moore, across from the Queen's hotel on Wallace street, were destroyed by fire, of unknown origin to the general public. The blaze was promptly discovered but the combustible nature of the building's contents made it impossible to save more than two of the seven beasts in the livery which, though they were too unmanageable to handle. The two saved included a valuable grey horse.—Listowel Banner.

Got Insulted

In England it is quite common instead of saying "Hello" when using the telephone to ask, "Are you there?" An American who heard it for the first time, thinking some one was endeavouring to have some fun at his expense, replied "No," and hung up the receiver.—Exchange.

Edwin Pacey has left the Walkerton House of Refuge and is now staying with his son Albert. He speaks highly of the superintendent and thinks it a fine place for a person who wishes not to be a burden on relatives to the end of their days. The average cost per patient for board last year was $1 60 per week. Mr. Pacey paid $2.00 per week.—Lion's Head News.

Smut on Oats.

Ontario farmers who omitted to inoculate their seed grain against smut are losing heavily this year. The annual loss due to this fungus disease averages 4 per cent. This year, according to the Agricultural Department, a 15 per cent. loss is common, and in some places it is as much as 25 per cent. Oats are the principal crop to suffer, wheat being not nearly so bad. The interesting thing is the fields of grain, the seed of which we treated with formalin, are practically clean and coming along in fine style.

Operated On

Mr. D. Mason of Galt, was operated on in a Toronto hospital last week for the removal of a tumor in the abdomen from which he had been suffering for some months. Mr. Mason was in a very precarious condition following the operation, but his friends here will be pleased to know that he is now recovering.

Fracas on Main St.

Late Monday night a fracas occurred on Main street, of a nature which tends to give any town a black eye and a bad name. Among the participants in the fracas which could almost be said to have been a free-for-all fight, were several prominent men and possibly for this reason no police court cases have resulted.

Knox Church

Rev. Wesley Baker, of Richmond, Va., occupied the pulpit of Knox church on Sunday and very favorably impressed the congregation with his eloquent sermons. At the morning service Miss Zeta Black of Paisley and Miss Reed of Toronto rendered solos, while in the evening Mrs. W. Baker rendered a solo in her usual excellent voice.

Charged with Being Insane

Hugh Kearney who has been an inmate of the House of Refuge for the past four years was arrested on Tuesday by Chief Ferguson on a charge of being insane. Kearney is subject to epileptic fits and on Monday while suffering from one, threatened to take the life of one who was near. He was examined on Wednesday by two doctors, but as we go to press, the result of the examination has not been announced.

Charged With Assault.

Mr. Elliott Thomas an employee of the power house at Maple Hill, laid information last week against Harvey Disney who works near Hanover charging him with assault. The trial was set for two o'clock Tuesday afternoon, but Disney settled the case, pleading guilty before Magistrate Richardson on Monday. It appears that there had been bad blood, between the two men for a long time and on learning the circumstances, the magistrate allowed Disney to go, on paying all costs.

Youngster Nearly Drowned

The Saugeen river nearly claimed another victim on Friday evening when Fritz Irwin, who lives with his mother at the Hartley House, was taken with cramps while swimming near the west end bridge. Fritz, who is a good swimmer attempted to swim the river, but had managed to get but half way across when he was siezed with a cramp. He called for help and Earl Olbrecht who was on the bank went to his assistance reaching him as he was about to go down for the third time. Earl managed to grasp the struggling lad and pulled him to terra firma, where, after a few minutes he felt none the worse for his narrow escape.

Ordered to Replay Game.

The Secretary of the local baseball club received a letter from Mr. Ramsey of Owen Sound, secretary of the Northern League on Saturday dealing with the controversy between the Teeswater and Walkerton teams. The officials have ordered that the game in Teeswater be played to decide the district an umpire from each town to officiate. The date of the game has not yet been arranged but it will probably be played this week if the Teeswater club will accept the terms offered by the locals.

New Dundee Protests.

The New Dundee Football Club has entered a protest with the W.F.A. against Mildmay being awarded the second round of the semi-finals against them in which they were defeated by one goal on the round. The grounds on which the protest has been made is that Mildmay is playing professionals, the two men they refer to being Armond Whitehead and Walter Schnurr of Walkerton. Although the W.F.A. officials do some funny things, the Mildmay club feels quite safe with regard to the protest and expect that it will come to naught.

Standing Crop Damaged

The heavy rain and wind storm on Monday and Tuesday, which was prevalent in all parts of Western Ontario did inestimable damage to the standing field crops. In most places the grain has been flattened to the earth, which will make it decidely difficult to cut and the ripening process will be very slow. Besides this the incessant rains have done a great deal of damage to the wheat crop which in most places is still standing in the stook. What is now needed is a full week of genuine summer weather.

Arranging for Tournament.

A meeting of the members of the Walkerton Bowling Club was held at the armory on Friday evening to make arrangements for the annual tournament which will be held on Labor Day, September 6th and following days. It was decided to enter at least nine local rinks in the competition and to have three events, trophy, association and consolation. The several committees were appointed including one to purchase suitable prizes. Every indication points to a successful tournament and the club officials are counting on a greater attendance than in former years.

The Teeswater View

The following paragraph appeared in last week's Teeswater News and is the view taken by the people of Teeswater of Walkerton, since the baseball controversy arose:—

"We have noticed in the Walkerton papers about the poor sports of Teeswater. That would be a good column for Jack Canuck but when it is looked into seriously by sport loving people it is comedy. Walkerton with a population of 3000, the County town compared to a place like Teeswater of 700 and then going to Cargill to get their real players, we will leave it to unbiased people to judge. 'Nuff said."

Spoiled by Rain

The patriotic picnic on Monday was somewhat spoiled by the heavy downpour of rain which started shortly after the afternoon's events commenced and continued for the remainder of the day. The lacrosse match was played in the rain and resulted in a win for the "Would Be's" by a score of 0-3. As the weather showed no signs of improvement, the baseball match and races were postponed until Saturday next at 3 o'clock. Financially, however, the lady promoters of the picnic did very well, the total receipts amounting to $250.00 of which $18.00 cleared, goes to the Red Cross. Miss Marion Robertson, was awarded first prize for the best decorated car in the parade.

DIED

FOLEY—In Walkerton, at his residence opposite the biscuit factory, on Saturday, July 31st, Mr. Timothy Foley, aged 73 years. The funeral took place on Tuesday morning to the R. C. church, thence to the North Brant cemetery for interment.

CARD OF THANKS.

Mrs. Jos. Bergmann, is desirous of expressing her heartfelt thanks to her friends and neighbors for the many kindnesses shown her during her recent bereavement in the death of her husband. She also extends special thanks to the members of the local C. O. F. lodge for their kindness and assistance.

Died in Toronto.

The Toronto papers of Thursday last, contained the death notice of Miss E. Jean Elliot, who died at the home of her mother at 233 Davenport Road on July 28th. The deceased at one time lived in Walkerton, being the daughter of the late Thos. Elliot, who was at one time book-keeper for R. Truax & Son.

Pte. John McGarrity, who has been training at Kingston, spent a few days of last week with his parents, Mr. and Mrs. Patrick McGarrity in Brant. Private McGarrity, is a member of the 38th battalion which has been training at Kingston. This battalion embarked at Montreal on Tuesday of this week, en route to Bermuda, where it will relieve the Royal Canadian Regiment which has been doing garrison duty since the war commenced. While doing duty in Bermuda, the 38th will receive a further training and will later proceed to the firing line in France. Dan another son of Mr. McGarrity's, who has been in the west has enlisted with the Mounted Rifles and is training in Calgary.

House Broken Into.

During Wednesday night some miscreant, at present unknown to the police gained access to the residence of Mr. Chas Addley in the west ward and after rifling several drawers, ransacked a trunk the property of Mrs. Richard Addley and took therefrom some forty dollars which she saved from the money sent to her by the government, being part of the wages of Mr. Addley who is with the third contingent at London. The burglar was apparently familiar with the household, gaining access to the house through an open lower window, and after securing the key which was hidden and opening the trunk, made a clean getaway with the cash. The police have suspicions as to whom the guilty party is, but whether sufficient evidence can be secured to make an arrest remains to be seen.

Death of Mrs E Truax.

Death at any time and in any home brings sadness and mourning, but on Thursday last a pall of gloom was cast over the whole community when it became known that Mrs. Everett Truax, a bride of but one month, had passed away at the Bruce County Hospital. The deceased whose maiden name was Miss Laura Kearney, daughter of Mr. and Mrs. M. Kearney, was married to Mr. Truax on June 30th. and had lived in her new home on Colborne st., but five days when stricken with an attack of appendicitis. She was subsequently removed to the hospital, where a successful operation was performed, but while convalescing she contracted pneumonia and after hovering on the brink of eternity for several days, the spark of life finally fled on Thursday morning. That the grim reaper should claim a young wife of but twenty summers as his victim is extremely sad, and expressions of regret could be heard on every side. The deceased has lived in Walkerton all her life and was well known, the many beautiful floral tributes which adorned her casket, bearing testimony of the esteem in which she was held. Besides her sorrowing husband and father and heart-broken mother whose cup of sorrow has been filled to overflowing, she is survived by two small sisters and a brother. The funeral which was largely attended took place to the Walkerton cemetery on Sunday afternoon at three o'clock from the home which was to be here for a happy lifetime. Rev. D. A. Walker conducted the services.

COMMUNICATION

Walkerton, Aug. 4th, 1915.

The Editor of the Telescope,

Dear Sir:

I think any one reading the newspapers and the reports of speeches of the Rev. Mr. Gordon, (Ralph Connor) and others can have no doubt that Great Britain and her allies are very much in need of munitions of war.

I have felt for some time that although the ladies in Walkerton and the surrounding country are doing their duty but the men are not doing what they should, at all events in comparison with other places no better off. I have just returned from the Pacific Coast and made it my business to inquire what other places no larger than Walkerton were doing in contributing towards the cost of the war and I have felt ashamed for my own town when I compared the small amount we contributed with what other places of no greater population or wealth are doing. By yesterday's paper I see that the small village of Leamington and surrounding townships are arranging to contribute five machine guns. I have asked the Mayor to call a Public meeting to consider this question, which he no doubt will do and I ask every loyal citizen in Walkerton and the neighborhood to attend so that when victory does come, as we are sure it will, we may be able to feel that we have to a material extent contributed towards it.

Yours truly,
David Robertson.

Passed Entrance to Faculty

The results of the Upper School examination for Entrance into the Faculties of Education at the University of Toronto and Queen's University, Kingston were published in the daily papers of Saturday. Four pupils of the Walkerton High School tried these exams and all four candidates, W. G. Borho, W. W. Tanner, W. R. Hermeston, and Hazel M. Tranter were successful, the latter passing with honors. That all candidates passed should be very gratifying to principal Morgan and his staff and speaks well for the Walkerton High School as an educational institution. Two ex-pupils of the W. H. S., in accordance with the scheme for teachers, were successful:—Marion B. Hogg Part A., with honors, Nelson E. Dahms, Part B.

War in Progress One Year

Yesterday, August 4th, was the first Anniversary of the declaration of war against Germany by Britain and the titanic struggle of the nations has been in progress a full year. When war broke out, even the most pessimistic asserted that such a conflict could not continue for more than a few months at the longest. But what a revelation has come to the peoples of the earth! In one year hundreds of thousands of lives have been sacrificed, great stretches of country have been laid waste, priceless treasures of art and historic cathedrals have been destroyed or damaged beyond replacement, countries have been put almost into a state of bankruptcy or compelled to shoulder a debt which will require a decade to remove and millions of innocent people have been plunged into sorrow or made homeless and destitute. All this has come upon the world, merely because German militarists considered that "the day" had come and they must conquer Europe. If the end was now at hand the outlook for the future would not be so fearful to the world, but as it is, peace seems to be as far away as ever and every indication points to a long-drawn-out war, the worst stage of which, has not yet been reached. How many more lives will have to be sacrificed and how many more homes plunged into sorrow, before the advance of the Huns is stemmed and they are compelled to retreat to their own country, with their spirit of militarism subdued, is a difficult question to answer. The preparedness of Germany for this war has astounded the world, and her preparedness has resulted in at least the partial success of her campaign, but for what territory she has conquered she has paid a terrible price in men and munitions. However, her resources are becoming exhausted and before the second anniversary of the war comes, she will be suing for peace.

Death of John A Rittinger

The funeral took place on Saturday morning from the G.T.R. depot to the Walkerton cemetery of a former well-known citizen of Walkerton in the person of Mr. John A. Rittinger who died at his home in Berlin on Thursday morning, July 29th in his 61st. year. The services at the grave were conducted by Rev. Hosig of Walkerton and Rev. Twietmeyer of Hanover, a former pastor of the deceased. The pall-bearers were:—Messrs C. A. Fox, Judge A. B. Klein, Jno. O'Malley of Walkerton and Messrs Andrew Schumacher, W. Butler and F. Pollakowski of Berlin, formerly of this town. The following obituary appeared in the Berlin News Record of Thursday.

The many friends of Mr. John A. Rittinger, one of the proprietors of the Berliner Journal, which is conducted under the firm name of Rittinger and Motz, will be pained to learn that his death occurred at one o'clock at his residence at 132 North Queen street, after a lingering illness from an injury to his right hip. Mr. Rittinger was born at Berlin, February 14th 1855. He was educated at the public schools of Berlin and later took a course at St. Jerome's College, from which institution he graduated in the early seventies. He learned the printing trade at the office where he later became a partner, having spent some time at his trade in Guelph, Toronto, Buffalo and Chicago.

In 1875 he acquired an interest in the "Ontario Glocke" which was published at Walkerton. He conducted this paper for 19 years, becoming widely known throughout the province as the "Glockeman."

In July, 1901, the "Ontario Glocke" was combined with the Berliner Journal, and Mr. Rittinger joined the firm of Rittinger and Motz of Berlin.

He was married January 22nd, 1877 to Miss Mary Rogerson, who survives him. Their only son, Frederick, died in 1895. He is survived by a brother William of this city, and a sister, Mrs. J. Radke, of Brantford. His aged mother also survives him, living on the old property opposite the Public Library.

Mr. Rittinger was one of the well-known German journalists in Canada. He became widely known as the author of the "Joe Klotzkopf" letters, which enjoyed great popularity.

Deceased was also President of the St. Jerome's Alumni Association, during the year 1890 to 1893.

FOR HER HAPPINESS

The "pity the tired salesgirls -- shop early" cry had aroused Bennett to a sense of his great responsibility. He could think of no greater task than to select a gift for the little woman who had become his wife just six months before. All good husbands no doubt remember distinctly their own feelings at such a time, so will sympathize with him. During the three years he courted Miss Evelyn E. Thompson, he sent her each Christmas the very gift she had been wanting for years--she had told him. And he certainly did not want to blunder now in these early months of their happiness. How terrible to choose something she did not want! He, therefore, began to listen for some modest hint of some "dear" thing she had seen that was perfectly lovely."

It came in the morning just two days after the young husband had been listening. He had finished his prunes, oatmeal, bacon and coffee and was folding his newspaper, preparatory to a dash for a car when an idea struck him.

"These Christmas ads. sure do hammer home the early approach of the holidays," he ventured. "I don't want 'my little girl' to tire herself out shopping, so why don't you try to get it out of the way early before the rush comes on and the wild crowds mob the stores? I notice the Quaker Jewelry shop announces a fine list of gifts this morning. All the latest styles, too. Why don't you drop in and see them?"

"Oh, you dear! How kind you are to think of me in that way," exclaimed the bride. "I shall make every effort to follow your advice and will go downtown this forenoon. But it won't be necessary for me to take in the Quaker Shop's display, as I saw their first announcement a week ago, and the very same day I spent an hour there. Really, Stewart, dear, I never saw such pretty pendants in my life. There were two patterns Mr. Quaker especially wanted me to see, and they are perfectly lovely. In the one a cluster of small pearls surround an opal, while in the other there was a brilliant little diamond in the centre. The one set with the diamond is priced fifty-five dollars, and the other is but twenty-five. There was but one with the diamond setting and two of the other style. Either kind is simply great."

"All right, dear, I'm glad you have been down there, for now you will have more time to spend in the other stores and there are loads of special announcements in the department store advertisements to-day you will want to look up. But it is almost 8.30, so I must be off. Good-bye, dearest, and don't forget to take care of my 'little girl' for me to-day."

A hurried hug and a kiss, and then Bennett dashed to the street, and, by a beautiful flying tackle, managed to connect himself with a car as it was making full speed near the centre of the block. When the car reached the business section the young man called at the Quaker Shop and left a five dollar deposit on a pendant set with a large opal and several small pearls, before he went to the bank. Neither of the two Mrs. Bennett had seen were sold and the one with the diamond setting was there also. He felt that he would have liked to buy it, but, since it was necessary to use extreme care to make his meagre salary as a bank teller meet his necessary expenses, he could not figure out a way that would make it possible for him to save the fifty dollars necessary before Christmas eve. Of course the young wife had spoken of both, so that he might choose the one he could best afford, for she was a sensible girl.

"Oh, Elsie, before we go to the busy department stores you must come with me to the Quaker Shop. I want to show you what Stewart is going to give me for Christmas," smiled Mrs. Bennett, when the two women had finished some hot chocolate, and were ready for shop-seeing.

Sure enough. Just as she had expected. One of the three pendants was gone. The one with the diamond setting remained in the tray. Therefore, she told Mrs. Haggerty that her gift was to be like the other one. And Elsie assured her that the opal setting was by far the prettiest of the two.

The busy shopping season passed rapidly, but Bennett was preparing for its end. Each Saturday night he placed a crisp five-dollar note under his collar case in a bureau drawer, and when the last Saturday before Christmas was gone his heart was very light. All was well now, and Evelyn would have the very gift she had wanted so much. Then he turned to a little calendar by the side of his bed where he kept his daily memos, and checked off December 24. It had been a difficult task to save five dollars each week from his small spending fund, so he was exceedingly happy and the next three days were joyous indeed.

When he arose on the fourth day and looked at the calendar, the young man took the four bills from their hiding place, folded them neatly and tucked them in his vest pocket. At luncheon time he would run over to the Quaker shop and get the gift.

Just as he left the house and was waving a farewell to Evelyn, Mr. Haggerty stepped down off his porch and the two men started downtown together. Something told Stewart that his companion was worried. He was sorry for him, for never had he spent such a happy morning, and he always wanted to see others happy at the gay Christmas time. He handed Haggerty a perfecto habana, but it did no good. Yes, surely there was something distressing Joe, for never before had one of those cigars failed to win a broad smile of appreciation. Bennett could stand it no longer.

"Say, Haggerty, old man, for the love of Mike, what has happened to chase away your ever cheerful smile?" he questioned. "Is there anything I can do for you?"

"Well, yes. I-I-I'm in hard luck, Stewart," the neighbor stammered. "We received word last night that the brother-in-law is very ill at his home in Monroestown, and I'm so badly 'broken' that I can't make ends meet until I get my pay envelope this afternoon, if Elsie starts away to see him this forenoon, as she desires. Since you have offered to assist me, I trust you will not be offended if I request a loan of $20 or $25 until this afternoon. As soon as I receive my salary you can count on me dropping into the bank and returning the money. If you will do this for me, it will greatly relieve my anxiety, and I can then get a gift I had selected several days ago for Elsie before she leaves town. I'll follow to Monroestown on the early morning train so we can be together for Christmas."

It was the first time Haggerty had ever made such a request, so Bennett had no reason to doubt his promise. He reached into his pocket, for a moment hesitated as his fingers touched the bills, and then handed them over and told Joe he was glad to help him out.

Haggerty thanked him several times, and then the two men parted, and Bennett began to whistle as he walked toward the bank. He was happy because he had made Haggerty happy, and because as soon as the doors of the bank were closed he would go to see Mr. Quaker and get the prized pendant.

But, his joy was short lived, for upon his return from luncheon Stewart found a brief note on his desk from Haggerty that drove him into a fit of despair. It read:

"Just a line to tell you that Mrs. Haggerty insists that I go with her to Monroestown. On my way to the train I am writing this note to tell you that, as I couldn't get back to the office for my salary, I'll have to postpone returning that little loan until Dec. 26, when we will return. You sure did me a good turn, old chap, and I wish you as merry a Christmas as you have made mine. Sincerely,

"Haggerty."

For a moment the young teller stared at the note and then at the pad on his desk, where he read the notation:

"Get gift at Quaker's."

"'Merry Christmas' the blazes!" he blurted to himself. "Fine chance I have for a 'Merry Christmas' now. What in the Sam Hill can I do? This humanitarian game is O K in some cases; but never again will I play it so near to Christmas."

During the afternoon scores of depositors with drew gold pieces for gifts and stacks of currency to use on their last shopping expeditions. And while Stewart counted out thousands of dollars and added up long columns of figures, many of his friends, with their arms full of bundles, shouted a "Merry Christmas" to him as they hurried away with their fat rolls. Although he tried to be agreeable and return the season's greeting, it was with great effort that he smiled even faintly, and frequently he failed to hear the words of cheer called to him through the barred window. His thoughts were with that dear little woman who seemed so happy when he left her, when he knew was planning to make his Christmas happy by presenting him with a house coat she had made with her own pretty hands.

"What in the world will she say or think?" he asked himself as the hands of the clock neared the hour of 1 and the last rush of depositors crowded into the bank.

Several time he was tempted to ask some of his friends to help him, but he could not think of borrowing money to pay for Evelyn's gift, and, besides, it was a rule of the bank officials that none of the employees should either borrow money or carry charge accounts with any of the merchants in the town. He had never broken this rule, and, although he and Evelyn had only a small sum left of Bennett's savings after their house had been furnished, they managed to scratch along, and, by care, make their money reach from week to week, always living in anticipation of the days to come when Stewart's honesty, careful work and courteous service would be rewarded with a position that would make saving possible.

After the depositors had gone the bank doors were closed, cash was struck and all the coin and stacks of bills were in the vault, Mr. Clark, the cashier, wished Bennett a jolly Christmas, the clerks filed out in to the holiday crowds, and the young teller threw himself into a chair and buried his head in his hands. On the steps he could hear the janitor whistling an old love song as he swept away the day's accumulation of paper and dirt. The merry music of sleigh bells drifted through the transom. But all the joy sounds filled the young man with great despair.

Finally he arose and walked over to set the time lock and to close the heavy doors. Never had they seemed so heavy before. Never had such a stack of green backs seemed so large before nor did money seem to have such a great value. Stewart would have cut off his right hand for 20 of those crisp one-dollar bills. He had swung one of the big doors into place and was just about to close the other, when a thought struck him.

Yes, sure, this was his last chance. Cold drops of perspiration formed on his forehead. For a moment he leaned against the steel door, his head hanging down, his heart thumping and his hands so tightly clenched that the nails sank deeply into the flesh.

Suddenly he threw back his head, looked toward the outside door, scanned all the corners of the building and then grasped the knob of the partly-closed door and moaned. He hesitated for a moment and then began to laugh. But the sound of his laughter seemed to mock him. So he became silent once more, but quickly stepped into the dark corridor behind the doors.

Thousands of gold and silver dollars were on either side of him. The sickening smell of the paper money was anything but pleasant. Reams of it filled the upper drawers of the vault. With a single grab he could have picked up ten thousand dollars. For a second he hesitated, his hand resting on a drawer holding a good-sized fortune, and looked through the door into the dimly-lighted counting room. From the vault Bennett could see his desk, and, as his eyes wandered around the room, they lingered for a moment on a little motto she had sent him the Christmas before:

"Honesty and Courtesy Always Win Rewards."

His head dropped and his thoughts drifted back to the day he had received that card, and he remembered how happy he had been because Evelyn had always been so confident of his honesty.

"No! No! for a minute will I betray that confidence!" he exclaimed to himself ;and then he left the vault and closed the heavy door with a bang.

He was happy for the moment as he heard the time lock snap and all that temptation was shut out forever. Again he threw his tired body into his chair, and, with his head resting on his hands, stared at the motto. The telephone bell aroused him, and, on lifting the receiver, he was surprised to hear his wife's voice.

"Hello, Stewart, dear! What has been keeping you?" she asked. "It is almost 5 o'clock!"

"Oh, I've been busy, girlie," he replied, "but I'll be up at once. Don't worry, dear." And he drew a deep sigh as he turned from the 'phone.

A second later he was surprised to hear a rap on the door, and peeping outside under the drawn blinds, he saw one of the customers waiting with a bank book filled with bills. It was not unusual on Saturday afternoons, or on afternoons previous to holidays for depositors to leave with the bank a forgotten deposit for the sake of safety, so Bennett went to the door and took the book inside. After throwing the bills into the cash drawer with the deposit slip, he credited the amount in the book, and handed it back. Then he hurried into his coat and started to go out. He must not keep Evelyn waiting longer.

As he passed the cash drawer an idea suddenly came to him. Why not? He could take $20 from the late deposit, and, as he usually received a gift of $25 from President Newcomb by mail on Christmas, he could return it when the bank reopened early the morning after Christmas. He was now in a hurry to get home, so, without thinking long, he put four five-dollar bills into his pocket and left the bank.

Not wanting to keep Evelyn waiting longer, for it was now after 5 o'clock, he went to his home, planning to go to the Quaker shop for the pendant after dinner. It was evident that something had displeased the young wife. She seemed distressed and talked but little while the meal was in progress, and Bennett thought he could see a faint stain of recent tears on her cheeks.

After they had finished eating and he told her that he was going downtown, but would return in an hour, she leaned against the door sill and asked if Mr. Haggerty had told him that he was going away. Upon being told that he had, she sighed and then said: "Dear Bennett:

"Before they left Mrs. Haggerty came in to show me the Christmas gift Joe had bought her. It was one of Quaker's opal-set pendants I told you about." Then she sighed again, and Stewart understood why she seemed sad.

When he had started down the street he began to think of the terrible chances he was taking and what a dishonest thing it was. And to think that Mrs. Haggerty had been mean enough to make Evelyn unhappy by having her husband select the only pendant in the town that was a duplicate of the one he had bought. Well, maybe he could select another pattern himself that Evelyn would like, and she could yet be happy. But somehow he could not persuade himself that he was not doing a great wrong, and, while he would be sure to repay the money and no person would be the wiser, he continued to argue against stealing the bills. If he should be suddenly taken ill and be unable to get to the bank the morning after Christmas, what would Mr. Clark and the other fellows think when they discovered the shortage in the deposit? he asked himself. And suppose he should die and the bank would ask Evelyn to make good the shortage, what sadness it would give her all the rest of her life to think that her honest Stewart had stolen from the bank! Of course, it was not stealing. It was only a loan, and he could and would repay it. But then there remained a chance that he could not do so.

"Never!" "Never!" he exclaimed, as he reached the crowded entrance to the Quaker Shop. And then he crossed the street, and, with his head bending low, he entered the bank. Old George, the colored watchman, gave him a cordial greeting as he opened the door and admitted him. And he probably continues to wonder what ailed Mister Bennett, for he received not a word in reply.

Stewart dropped the bills into the cash drawer the second he stepped behind the counter, and at the same instant was startled by a noise in the directors' room behind the vault.

"Hey, Bennie, is that you in there?" came a voice that was none other than President Newcomb's.

Stewart was struck dumb with fright, and for several seconds was unable to utter a sound. As he walked back toward the room, Not until he had opened the door and stood in the bright glare of the electric lights was he able to speak. Then he saw that Mr. Newcomb was not angry, and had not noticed the shortage in the drawer as he had feared.

"Sit down, boy," urged the old man in a kindly tone, as he pointed to a chair by his side. "You look all tired out and not a bit happy, and this the night before Christmas, too. You've always been a good, honest boy, Stewart (the young man's lips quivered as he heard these words) and you have worked hard. It's a shame to think that you had to come down here to work on Christmas eve. But I'm glad you came to-night, boy, for I have good news for you. I think that you will agree when I tell you that Mr. Clark is giving up his position as cashier at the end of the month, and you shall fill his place and receive his salary of three thousand dollars a year."

Bennett tried to express his thanks, but he got no further than "If you know—" when the aged president laid his hand on the young man's head and said

"Never mind that now, Stewart. You've earned the place and we need you more than ever before. Here's a little gift I was just going to mail you." And he handed Stewart a fifty-dollar note.

Never had the trolley run so slow as it did a half-hour later while the young husband was hurrying to the side of his bride. When he arrived and Evelyn laughed and cried with joy, she leaned on his arm and whispered:

"Any how I don't care a little bit if Elsie Haggerty does have a pendant like mine."

But the next morning when she opened the little plush case Stewart handed her, she gave a happy shout of surprise, and, pasting a sweet little kiss on the young man's lips, exclaimed:

"Ain't you the dear, honest boy?"

Reversing a Phonograph Record.

A remarkably curious experiment may be performed with any ordinary phonograph. The sound box is reversed so that the needle slopes the other way, enabling the disc to be turned backward by the finger being placed near the centre. The effect produced is extremely astonishing. You hear the human voice singing songs backward; you hear the harmony of Wagner backward, while English sounds like a Chinese language. The most remarkable effect is perhaps to play a record of bells in this reversed manner. The sound swells up and up, but there is never a single stroke or clash of a bell. The stroke in the ear is reversed and is nothing but a sharp "cessation of sound."—Strand Magazine.

Evangelist Who Was an Actor.

George Whitefield qualified as a boy for greatness in more than one direction. The future evangelist enjoyed play acting and performed in girl's clothes before the mayor and corporation of Gloucester, while by the time he was fifteen he had become an expert ale drawer in the family public house. These pursuits, when in the pulpit, appear, however, to have been converted into aids to evangelism. The youthful love of the stage, says the London Chronicle, no doubt helped to develop the tremendous histrionic gift which made Lord Chesterfield on hearing Whitefield describe a blind beggar's fall over a precipice spring from his seat and exclaim, "Good heavens, he's gone!"

Our Moral Codes.

Our moral codes were invented not to prepare men for heaven or for Utopia. They were invented by men who were none too good theselves to protect themselves from people who were not much worse. There are great differences in human beings as to the amount of knowledge and wisdom which they possess, but there is small difference in regard to the amount of goodness or rascality that they manifest.—Mowry Saben in Forum.

PLUNKED ON EGGS.

A Pretty Good Reason Why the Fowl Wouldn't Lay Any.

Young Adolphus de Milyuns was out driving his own car. He was a scorcher and believed in going straight ahead.

Suddenly a terrific clucking under the wheels told him some accident had happened. He pulled up and glanced back. Two fowls lay dead in his track, while another two were fleeing, screeching, back to home and safety.

"That'll be 14 shillings, please," remarked a burly man in corduroys, who appeared on the scene promptly. "That's three and six apiece for the four."

"Four!" gasped Adolphus. "But I only killed two!"

"That's right," agreed the fowls owner, "but them other two will never lay a blessed egg after this."

"I'm sorry," said the motorist, as he handed over the money. "Due to the fright, I suppose."

"Partly fright," he agreed, slowly, "but mostly, I reckon, it's because they ain't hens!"—London Answers.

Human Levers.

All man made machinery runs with wheels. Yet there is not a single wheel in the human body. And the human body is the most perfect piece of mechanism in the world. It seems strange that man had developed mechanics along lines but those with which his own body works. Practically every motion we make is performed by the direct operations of levers, and living creatures are the only machines so built. Almost all these human levers are of one kind, that commonly called the third. There are three kinds of levers: (1) that in which the fulcrum is between the power and the weight, or resistance, as in a pair of scissors; (2) that in which the weight or resistance is between the fulcrum and the power, as in an oar; (3) that in which the power is between the fulcrum and the weight, as in a pair of grass clippers. It is true that each of these forms of levers is used in mechanics, but no great machine has ever been built on the purely level principle.—New York World.

Japan's Hokey Pokey Men.

Japanese children are amused by the rice jelly molder, or amezaikuya, as American children are by the hokey pokey ice cream itinerant. Beating a drum, he goes up and down city streets with small box on his bamboo pole or on a small cart, paper flags of various colors decorating his outfit. Ame is a kind of jelly made from rice, of which all Japanese children are extremely fond. The ame seller stops when the children round him, and he amuses them by molding all kinds of shapes, from a fish to a bird, which he sticks on a piece of bamboo and sells to his audience for a mere nothing. He can blow up the ame like a glass blower, making a globe "or a large size!" animal or fish, as he wills, and each child chooses the object he most fancies. Each object created is painted with a vegetable coloring in life-like colors, and with each purchase he gives away a paper flag. He is a picturesque feature at all temple festivals.—Bulletin of Japan Society.

How to Live One Hundred Years.

Lo, and behold, a physician comes forward with the announcement that it is as easy as falling off a log to live to be a hundred years old. He says all you have to do is to avoid alcoholic or malt liquors, don't smoke, go to bed at 10 p.m. and get up at 6 a.m., sleep soundly, don't worry about making money (we don't—we worry about not making it), do nothing to excess (don't marry to excess, of course—Mark Twain said that), the simple life all the time, don't get excited (we don't over anything except elections or prizefights), eat only when you feel inclined (or have the price—this has no reference to newspaper men, who never eat a regular meal). With the exception of the parentheses this is really serious advice, and you would do well to heed it if you wish to make the century mark in life's little Marathon. However, as for us, we wouldn't swap one hour of golden, glittering time on pay day in Joyous Jacksonville for a whole century of such simple and uneventful existence anywhere else.—Phil H. Armstrong, in Florida Times-Union.

WEAK, TIRED, DEPRESSED

That is the Usual Condition of Persons Afflicted With Anaemia.

Anaemia is the medical term for poor, watery blood. It may arise from a variety of causes, such as lack of exercise, hard study, improperly ventilated rooms or workshops, poor digestion, etc. The chief symptoms are extreme pallor of the face and gums, rapid breathing and palpitation of the heart after slight exertion, headaches, dizziness and a tendency to hysteria, swelling of the feet and limbs and a distaste for food. All these symptoms may not be present, but any of them indicate anaemia, which should be promptly treated with Dr. Williams' Pink Pills. These Pills make new, rich blood, which stimulates and strengthens every organ and every part of the body. Dr. Williams' Pink Pills have made thousands of anaemic people bright, active and strong. The following is one of the many cures. Mrs. Phillips, wife of Rev. W. E. Phillips, Princeton, Ont., says, "Some years ago, while living with my parents in England I fell a victim of anaemia. The usual complications set in and soon I became but a shadow of my former self. My mother, who had been a former nurse of many years' experience, tried all that her knowledge suggested; tonics and various kinds were tried, and three doctors did their best for me, but without avail, and a continued gradual decline and death were looked for.

"Later my parents decided to join my brothers in Canada, and it was confidently expected that the ocean voyage, new climate and new conditions would cure me. For a time I did experience temporary benefit, but was soon as ill again as ever. I was literally bloodless, and the extreme pallor and generally hopeless appearance of my condition called forth many expressions of sympathy from friends whom we made in our new home in Acton, Ont. Later a friend urged me to try Dr. Williams' Pink Pills, and, although in a condition where life seemed to have little to hope for, I decided to do so. After using three boxes I decided to mend. Continuing, I began to enjoy my food, slept almost normally, and began to have a fresh interest in life as I felt new blood once more running in my veins. Dr. Williams' Pink Pills brought about a complete cure and I am to-day in robust health. My husband is rector of this parish, and I have recommended the use of the Pills to a great number of people with whom we have come into contact in the course of my husband's ministry, for we both know what Dr. Williams' Pink Pills can do."

These Pills may be had from any dealer in medicine, or by mail at 50 cents a box or six boxes for $2.50 from The Dr. Williams' Medicine Co., Brockville, Ont.

"Dreary Stuff," Said Gissing.

G. B. Burgin in the Bookman contributes a personal recollection of George Gissing, whom he met many years ago at a garden party in St. John's Wood.

"He was curiously and I should think unconsciously picturesque," writes Mr. Burgin, "his loose, easy clothes and slouch hat seeming a part of his own personality more than a studied pose, and looking rather at variance with the smart 'getup' of the London crowd which filled the little garden." During conversation Gissing alluded to the fact that many authors wrote with ease and facility, "but," he added, "I grind it out with infinite pain and labor." When Mr. Burgin hinted that most of his material was saddening, "Yes," he said thoughtfully, "it's dreary stuff—dreary stuff!"

The Seven Wise Men of Greece.

The seven wise men of Greece were Thales of Miletus, Periander of Corinth, Cleobulus of Lindus, Chilon of Lacedaemon, Solon of Athens, Bias of Priene and Pittacus of Mitylene. Some fishermen of Miletus sold a draft of fishes to a bystander. When the net was drawn in it contained a golden tripod, and the purchaser claimed it was his, while the fishermen contended that they sold only the fish that might be in the net. The dispute was referred to the oracle of Delphi, who awarded the tripod to the wisest man in Greece. Thereupon it was taken to Thales, who declined it and suggested that it be given to Bias. He in turn refused to accept it, and thus it was successively declined by all the seven, and they were thereafter known as the seven wise men of Greece.

Forks.

Neither the Greeks nor the Romans possessed forks. It was, according to that curious book of travels, "Coryat's Crudities," published in 1611, left to Italy to invent them, because, as the author quaintly observes, "the Italian cannot by any means endure to have his dish touched with hands, seeing that all men's fingers are not alike clean."

THE KAISER AND PEACE.

Unless Germany is completely smashed and crushed in this war before peace is made, another war will follow, if we are to believe the Kaiser. With this fact in view, the allies would make a fearful mistake if they were to agree to a peace which would be merely a preliminary to another war. The Paris Matin publishes a letter, written by the Emperor to a friend, in which he says:

"Consider it as certain, and announce it loudly to every one, that the Germanic armies will emerge victorious from the trial. Not in vain has God placed a spotless sword in our hands. Nor is it in vain that He has, for nearly half a century, united all the German States in the most powerful confederation the world has ever witnessed. . . . Certainly our losses are heavy. . . . I feel a special gratitude to the Bavarians who by their valiance have contributed largely to the only end which we have in view; a peace fruitful to the German States. This peace might be made sooner than is expected. If incomplete in its results it would at any rate serve to prepare for the future. It could be signed to-morrow, if I were willing. When my august grandfather established the empire on its present basis he did not pretend to have realized a complete work. The empire is always capable of expansion. What cannot be accomplished to-day can be brought about later."

The Kaiser, it will be noticed, again claims the Almighty as a partner in his frightfulness. We doubt his ability as a prophet. But when he says peace could be signed to-morrow if he were willing, he is not speaking the truth—unless he is willing to accept the terms laid down by the allies. When this letter was written the Kaiser had evidently not got enough of fighting. But it is just possible that his own people—the Socialists, for instance—will not be so keen in starting another war after this one is over, no matter what the terms of peace may be.

WHAT OF HOLLAND?

It is said that Germany is fortifying her frontier facing Holland, in case of an attack from that quarter. People have been asking as to the whereabouts of Kitchener's army, and rumors have been current in the newspapers that it may be kept in reserve for an attack on Germany by way of Holland. Capt. T. G. Delamere, of Toronto, just home from the front, is reported as saying that "England is alive with men in training and some fine morning they will walk across Holland, and then the fighting will commence. I think that Holland has the day already set for her entrance into the war on the side of the allies." We do not know what reason the Captain has for making these assertions. They may just be mere conjecture and gossip.

In an interview with a representative of a Dutch newspaper, Winston Churchill is represented as saying that "A free Holland cannot exist beside a German Antwerp." He also stated no attempt would be made by the allies to force Holland to depart from her attitude of neutrality. This would mean that if British troops were to pass through Holland it would be with the consent of the Hollanders.

Although Holland sees the predicament she would be in were Germany to win in this war, her people are not unanimous. In fact, led by the King, who is a German Prince, there is quite a strong section of the people who favor the Germans. Evidently they would be quite content to be gobbled up by the Germans. The other and larger section of the people view with alarm the prospect of Belgium becoming Germanized, rightly believing that this would be followed by the annexation of Holland.

Mr. P. C. Samuel, of Winnipeg, a Hollander, in a newspaper article, speaking of Dutch feeling and preparations for defence, says:

In less than forty-eight hours, the Dutch army of 400,000 trained and fully equipped men was in the field, and ready for any emergency. And ready they have remained ever since. Belgian wounded and Belgian refugees began to pour into Holland in great numbers, and were given treatment and food, shelter and clothing. Feeling in Holland ran high against the Germans, because the common people, in the face of what happened in Belgium, understood. However, all the Dutch could do then, and what they have been doing ever since, may be expressed as "watchful waiting."

Mr. Samuel tells when Holland will enter the war in the following passage:

With the approach of the final blow, the tension in Holland will reach the breaking point. More than ever the Dutch will be haunted by the German atrocities in Belgium. The destruction of the Lusitania, the torpedoing of Dutch merchantmen will prey on their minds. As always, the match to bring about the explosion will be lighted, I am afraid. The Germans have rebuilt the Antwerp fortifications, their fleet is still powerful. But what is the use of possessing Antwerp without the mouth of the River Scheldt. No doubt Germany's aim is to use Antwerp for a naval base for her fleet. And the mouth of the river is within Dutch territory, defended by powerful forts. Should Germany attempt to force an entrance, the die is cast. This is the moment that Holland will come into the war. A well-trained army of 400,000 men, fully equipped, will give Germany a warm reception. The Dutch are working overtime in the manufacture of ammunition.

If that ever happens the German princeling who is the consort of the Queen will have to fly for protection to his beloved Germany.

It is becoming more and more evident that Canada will have to do her utmost to help win the war.

The drowning of a thousand people by the upsetting of a Chicago excursion steamer is a calamity that must be thoroughly investigated, and the guilty parties, if any, brought to justice. If we except the sinking of the Lusitania, nothing like it has happened since the Gen. Slocum tragedy. This Chicago horror should not be lost on Canadian boat-owners—there is a lesson in it for all.

Among recent war orders reaching British Columbia is one from the British Admiralty for 10,000,000 feet of lumber. Shipping to move this cut has already been provided so that the transaction can be rounded out expeditiously. It is said that this is practically the first instance in which British Columbia lumbermen in dealing with the British Government have not been compelled to compete as to prices with lumber interests on the American side.

PATRIOTS.

(Detroit Free Press)

"There are two sorts of patriots, my boy."

"Yes, pa."

"One believes in getting his country out of trouble, and the other believes first in keeping it out of trouble."

THE Changeling

In the meantime, on her face old Hagar lay, moaning bitterly. "My sin has found me out, found me out; and just when I thought it never need be known. For myself, I do not care; but Maggie, Maggie, how can I tell her that she is bone of my bone, flesh of my flesh—and me, old Hagar Warren!"

It would be impossible to describe the scorn and intense loathing concentrated in the tones of Hagar's voice as she uttered these last words, "and me, old Hagar Warren!" Had she indeed been the veriest wretch on earth, she could not have hated herself more than she did in that hour of her humiliation, when, with a loud voice, she cried, "Let me die; oh, let me die, and it will never be known!" Then, as she reflected upon the terrible consequence which would ensue were she to die and make no sign, she wrung her hands despairingly, crying, "Life, life, yes, give me life to tell her of my guilt; and then it will be a blessed rest to die. Oh, Margaret, my precious child, I'd give my heart's blood, drop by drop, to save you; but it can't be; you must not wed your father's son; oh, Maggie, Maggie, Maggie!"

Fainter and fainter grew each succeeding word, and when the last was spoken, she fell again upon her face, unconscious and forgetful of her woe. Higher and higher in the heavens rose the morning sun, stealing across the window-sill and shining aslant the floor, where Hagar still lay in a deep, deathlike swoon. An hour passed on, and then the wretched woman came slowly back to life, her eyes lighting up with joy as she whispered, "It was a dream—thank heaven, 'twas a dream;" and then growing dim with tears, as the dread reality came over her. The first fearful burst of grief was passed, for Hagar now could weep and tears did her good, quelling the feverish agony at her heart. Not for herself did she suffer so much as for Mag, trembling for the effect the telling of the secret would have on her. For it must be told. She knew that full well, and as the sun fast neared the western horizon, she murmured, "Oh, will she come to-night, will she come to-night?"

Yes, Hagar, she will. Even now her feet, which, when they backward turn, will tread less joyously, are treading the woodland path. The half-way rock is reached—nearer and nearer she comes—her shadow falls across the floor—her hand is on your arm—her voice is in your ear—Maggie Miller is at your side—heaven help you both!

"Hagar! Hagar!" exclaimed Mag, playfully bounding to her side, and laying her hand upon her arm. "What aileth thee, Hagar?"

The words were meet, for never Hagar in the desert, thirsting for the gushing fountain, suffered more than did she who sat with covered face and made no word of answer. Maggie was unusually happy that day, for but a few hours before she had received Henry's letter, making her free—free to love Arthur Carrollton, who she well knew only waited a favorable opportunity to tell her his love; so with a heart full of happiness she had stolen away to visit Hagar, reproaching herself as she came for having neglected her so long. "But I'll make amends by telling her what I'm sure she must have guessed," she thought, as she entered the cottage, where, to her surprise, she found her weeping. Thinking the old woman's distress might possibly be occasioned by her neglect, she spoke again: "Are you crying for me, Hagar?"

"Yes, Maggie Miller, for you—for you!" answered Hagar, lifting up a face so ghastly white that Maggie started back in some alarm.

"Poor Hagar, you are ill," she said, and advancing nearer, she wound her arms around the trembling form, and pillowing the snowy head upon her bosom, continued soothingly: "I did not mean to stay away so long. I will not do it again, but I am so happy, Hagar, so happy that I half forgot myself."

For a moment Hagar let her head repose upon the bosom of her child, then murmuring softly, "It will never lie there again," she arose and, confronting Maggie, said: "Is it love which makes you so happy?"

"And is your intention to marry the man you love?" continued Hagar, thinking only of Henry Warner, while Margaret, thinking only of Arthur Carrollton, replied, "If he will marry me, I shall most surely marry him."

"It is enough. I must tell her," whispered Hagar; while Maggie asked, "Tell me what?"

For a moment the wild eyes fastened themselves upon her with a look of yearning anguish, and then Hagar answered slowly: "Tell you what you've often wished to know—my secret!" the last word dropping from her lips more like a warning hiss than like a human sound. It was long since Mag had teased for the secret, so absorbed had she been in other matters, but now that there was a prospect of knowing it, her curiosity was reawakened, and while her eyes glistened with expectation, she said: "Yes, tell it to me, Hagar, and then I'll tell you mine;" and all over her beautiful face there shone a joyous light as she thought how Hagar, who had once pronounced Henry Warner unworthy, would rejoice in her new love.

"Not here, Maggie—not here in this room can I tell you," said old Hagar; "but out in the open air, where my breath will come more freely;" and leading the way, she hobbled to the mossy banks where Mag had sat with Arthur Carrollton on the morning of his departure for Montreal.

Here she sat down, while Maggie threw herself upon the damp ground at her feet, her face lighted with eager curiosity, and her lustrous eyes as bright as stars with the excitement. For a moment Hagar bent forward, and folding her hands one above the other, laid them upon the head of the young girl as if to gather strength for what she was to say. But all in vain; for when she essayed to speak, her tongue clave to the roof of her mouth, and her lips gave forth unmeaning sounds.

"It must be something terrible to affect her so," thought Mag, and taking the bony hands between her own, she said, "I would not tell it, Hagar; I do not wish to hear."

The voice aroused the half-fainting woman, and withdrawing her hand from Maggie's grasp, she replied, "Turn away your face, Margaret Miller, so I cannot see the hatred settling over it, when I tell you what I must."

"Certainly; my back if you prefer it," answered Mag, half playfully; and turning around, she leaned her head against the feeble knees of Hagar.

"Maggie, Maggie," began the poor old woman, lingering long and lovingly over that dear name, "nineteen years ago, next December, I took upon my soul the secret sin which has worn my life away, but I did it for the love I had for you. Oh, Margaret, believe it, for the love I had for you, more than for my own ambition;" and the long fingers slid nervously over the bands of shining hair just within her reach.

At the touch of those fingers Mag shuddered involuntarily. There was a vague, undefined terror stealing over her, and impatient to know the worst, she said, "Go on. Tell me what you did."

"I can't—I can't—and yet I must," cried Hagar. "You were a beautiful baby, Mag, and the other one was sickly, pinched and blue. I had you both in my room the night after Hester died; and the devil—Maggie, do you know how the devil will creep into the heart and whisper, whisper till the brain is all on fire? This thing he did to me, Maggie, nineteen years ago; he whispered—whispered dreadful things, and his whisperings were of you."

"Horrible! Hagar," exclaimed Maggie. "Leave the devil, and tell me of yourself."

"That's it," answered Hagar. "If I had but left him then, this hour would never have come to me; but I listened, and when he told me that a handsome, healthy child would be more acceptable to the Conways than a weakly, fretful one,—when he said that Hagar Warren's grandchild had far better be a lady than a drudge—that no one would ever know it, for none had noticed either—I did it, Maggie Miller; I took you from the pine board cradle where you lay—I dressed you in the other baby's clothes—I laid you on her pillow—I wrapped her in your coarse white frock — I said that she was mine, and Margaret—oh, Heaven! can't you see it? Don't you know that I, the shrivelled, skinny hag, who tells you this, am your own grandmother!"

There was no need for Maggie Miller to answer that appeal. The words had burned into her soul—scorching her very life-blood and maddening her brain. It was a fearful blow—crushing her at once. She saw it all, understood it all, and knew there was no hope. The family pride, at which she had often laughed, was strong within her and could not at once be rooted out. All the fond household memories, though desecrated and trampled down, were not so soon to be forgotten. She could not own that half-crazed woman for her grandmother! As Hagar talked, she had risen to her feet, and now, tall and erect as the mountain ash which grew on her native hills, she stood before her, every vestige of color faded from her face, her eyes dark as midnight and glowing like coals of living fire, while her hands, locked despairingly together, moved slowly toward Hagar, as if to thrust her aside.

"Oh, speak again," she said, "but not the dreadful words you said to me just now. Tell me they are false—say that my father perished in the storm, that my mother was she who held me on her bosom when she died—that I—oh, Hagar, I am not—I will not be the creature you say I am. Speak to me," she continued; "tell me, is it true?" and in her voice there was not the olden sound.

Hoarse—hollow—full of reproachful anguish it seemed, and bowing her head in very shame, old Hagar made her answer: "Would to Heaven 'twere not true—but 'tis—it is! Kill me, Maggie," she continued; "strike me dead, if you will, but take your eyes away. You must not look thus at me, a heartbroken wretch."

But not of Hagar Warren was Maggie thinking then. The past, the present, and the future were all embodied in her thoughts. She had been an intruder all her life; had ruled with a high hand people on whom she had no claim, and who, had they known her parentage, would have spurned her from them. Theo, whom she had held in her arms so oft, calling her sister and loving her as such, was hers no longer; nor yet the fond woman who had cherished her so tenderly —neither was hers; and in fancy she saw the look of scorn upon that woman's face when she should hear the tale, for it must be told, and she must tell it, too. She would not be an impostor; and then there flashed upon her the agonizing thought, before which all else seemed as naught—in the proud heart of Arthur Carrollton was there a place for Hagar Warren's grandchild? "No, no, no!" she moaned; and the next moment she lay at Hagar's feet, white, rigid and insensible.

"She's dead!" cried Hagar; and for one brief instant she hoped that it was so.

But not then and there was Margaret to die; and slowly she came back to life, shrinking from the touch of Hagar's hand when she felt it on her brow.

"There may be some mistake," she whispered; but Hagar answered, "There is none;" at the same time relating so minutely the particulars of the deception that Maggie was convinced, and covering her face with her hands, sobbed aloud, while Hagar, sitting by in silence, was nerving herself to tell the rest.

The sun had set, and the twilight shadows were stealing down upon them, when, creeping abjectly upon her knees toward the wretched girl, she said: "There is more, Maggie, more—I have not told you all."

But Maggie had heard enough, and exerting all her strength, she sprang to her feet, while Hagar clutched eagerly at her dress, which was wrested from her grasp, as Maggie fled away—away—she knew not, cared not whither, so that she were beyond the reach of the trembling voice which called after her to return. Alone in the deep woods, with the darkness falling around her, she gave way to the mighty sorrow which had come so suddenly upon her. She could not doubt what she had heard. She knew that it was true, and as proof after proof crowded upon her until the chain of evidence was complete, she laid her head upon the rain-wet grass, and shudderingly stopped her ears, to shut out, if possible, the memory of the dreadful words, "I, the shriveled, skinny hag who tells you this, am your grandmother." For a long time she lay there thus, weeping till the fountain of her tears seemed dry; then weary, faint and sick, she started for her home. Opening very cautiously the outer door, she was gliding up the stairs, when Madam Conway, entering the hall with a lamp, discovered her, and uttered an exclamation of surprise at the strangeness of her appearance. Her dress, bedraggled and wet, was torn in several places by the briery bushes she had passed; her hair, loosened from its confinement, hung down her back, while her face was so white and ghastly that Madam Conway, in much alarm, followed her up the stairs, asking her what had happened.

"Something dreadful came to me in the woods," said Maggie, "but I can't tell you to-night. To-morrow I shall be better—or dead—oh, I wish I could be dead—before you hate me so; dear grand— No, I didn't mean that—you ain't; forgive me, do," and sinking to the floor, she kissed the very hem of Madam Conway's dress.

Unable to understand what she meant, Madam Conway divested her of her damp clothing, and placing her in bed, sat down beside her, saying gently, "Can you tell me now what frightened you?"

A faint cry was Maggie's only answer, and taking the lady's hand, she laid it upon her forehead, where the drops of perspiration were standing thickly. All night long Madam Conway sat by her, going once to communicate with Arthur Carrollton, who, anxious and alarmed, came often to the door, asking if she slept. She did sleep at last—a fitful feverish sleep; but ever at the sound of Mr. Carrollton's voice a spasm of pain distorted her features, and a low moan came from her lips. Maggie had been terribly excited, and when next morning she awoke, she was parched with burning fever, while her mind at intervals seemed wandering; and ere two days were passed, she was raving with delirium brought on, the physician said, by some sudden shock, the nature of which no one could ever guess.

For three weeks she hovered between life and death, whispering oft of the "horrid shape which had met her in the woods, robbing her of happiness and life." Winding her feeble arms around Madam Conway's neck, she would beg of her most piteously "not to cast her off—not to send her away from the only home she had ever known for I couldn't help it," she would say, "I didn't know it, and I've loved you all so much—so much! Say, grandma, may I call you grandma all the same? Will you love poor Maggie a little?" and Madam Conway, listening to words whose meaning she could not fathom, would answer by laying the aching head upon her bosom, and trying to soothe the excited girl. Theo, too, was summoned home, but at her Maggie at first refused to look, and covering her eyes with her hand she whispered mournfully, "pinched and blue, and pale, that's the very look. I couldn't see it when I called you sister."

Then her mood would change, and motioning Theo to her side, she would say to her: "Kiss me once, Theo, just as you used to do when I was Maggie Miller."

Toward Arthur Carrollton she from the first manifested fear, shuddering whenever he approached her, and still exhibiting signs of uneasiness if he left her sight. "He hated her," she said, "hated her for what she could not help;" and when, as he often did, he came to her bedside, speaking to her words of love, she would answer mournfully, "Don't, Mr. Carrollton; your pride is stronger than your love. You will hate me when you know it all."

Thus two weeks went by, and then with the first May-day, reason returned again, bringing life and strength to the invalid, and joy to those who had so anxiously watched over her. Almost her first rational question was for Hagar, and if she had been there.

"She is confined to her bed with inflammatory rheumatism," answered Madam Conway, "but she inquires for you every day, they say; and once when told you could not live, she started to crawl on her hands and knees to see you, but fainted near the gate and was carried back."

"Poor old woman!" murmured Maggie, the tears rolling down her cheeks as she thought how strong must be the love that half-crazed creature bore her, and how little it was returned, for every feeling of her nature revolted from claiming a near relationship with one whom she had hitherto regarded as a servant. The secret, too, seemed harder to divulge, and day by day she put it off, saying to them when they asked what had so much affected her, that "she could not tell them yet—she must wait till she was stronger."

So Theo went back to Worcester as mystified as ever, and Maggie was left much alone with Arthur Carrollton, who strove in various ways to win her from the melancholy into which she had fallen. All day long she would sit by the open window, seemingly immovable, her large eyes, now intensely black, fixed upon vacancy, and her white face giving no sign of the fierce struggle within, save when Madam Conway, coming to her side, would lay her hand caressingly on her in token of sympathy. Then, indeed, her lips would quiver, and turning her head away, she would say, "Don't touch me—don't."

To Arthur Carrollton she would listen with apparent composure though often as he talked, her long, sharp nails left their impress in her flesh, so hard she strove to seem indifferent. Once when they were left together alone he drew her to his side, and, bending very low, so that his lips almost touched her marble cheek, he told her of his love, and how full of anguish was his heart when he thought that she would die.

"But God kindly gave you back to me," he said; "and now, my precious Margaret, will you be my wife? Will you go with me to my English home, from which I've tarried now too long, because I would not leave you? Will Maggie answer me?" and he folded her lovingly in his arms.

A Kind Wish for Mother.

"Have you a pain, muvver?" he asked sympathetically. When she nodded he thought a minute and then exclaimed:

"I wish a fairy would come and turn your pain into a piece of cake." Then the small boy asserted himself over the angel child, adding, "And I would eat it."—New York Sun.

SUNDAY SCHOOL LESSON

Lesson VI. August [illegible], 1915.

The Kingdom Torn Asunder.—I Kings 12: 1-24. Print 12:6-16.

Commentary. I. Israel's plea (vs. 1-5). Rehoboam was the only son of Solomon, as far as we can ascertain from the records, and at his father's death proceeded to take the throne. In order to do this he must have the consent or approval of the people. Solomon had exacted large service from the people in the great building operations he had carried forward, and some of the tribes had become disaffected toward his administration. Rehoboam knew that there might be difficulty in bringing them to his support, and he went to Shechem to secure the allegiance of the northern tribes, as this place was central for them. It was between Mount Ebal and Mount Gerizim (Deut. 27: 11-13; Josh. 8: 30-35), and was historic because of the relation of Abraham, Jacob, Joseph and Joshua to it. The people presented to Rehoboam the plea that he make their burdens lighter than those imposed upon them by Solomon. If he would be considerate and just, they would accept him as king and serve him. They had as a counsellor Jeroboam, who had been Solomon's servant, and whom the prophet Ahijah had approached with the message that he was to become king over ten of the tribes of Israel (I Kings 11: 28-40). Rehoboam desired three days to consider the people's request before giving an answer. This delay indicated that he was not altogether willing to accede to their wishes.

II. Rehoboam taking counsel (vs. 6-11). 6. Consulted with the old men—It was proper for an inexperienced man, who was entering upon a great work, to consult with those of mature years and judgment, yet Rehoboam could not have done better than to have granted the people's request at once. The next best course was to consult with the old men who had been his father's advisers. 7. If thou wilt be a servant—The duty of a king is to have regard for the desires and needs of his subjects. He should serve them by doing for them what would make them better and happier. The haughty Rehoboam could scarcely bear the thought of sacrificing his own selfish purposes for the welfare of his people. Speak good words—Words that would show that he had affection for them and desired their highest welfare. The servant-character—a little effort on the king's part, which to him might seem like humiliation, would have brought the opposing factions together, and secured to him a stable and united kingdom.

8. Forsook the counsel of the old men—Rehoboam was seeking after the kind of advice he desired, and when he did not receive it from the old men, he went elsewhere in search for it. He could not consent to the demands of his subjects. He had no idea of being their servant. Young men—These were his companions in the royal court, and had the same haughty spirit that possessed him. They had little or no sympathy with the common people. They thought only of power and the wealth and authority which they believed necessarily went with royalty. 9. What counsel give ye—Rehoboam expected an answer from them different from the advice he had received from the old men. The young men knew him well enough to understand what course he desired to take and, without of that course, advised him to take it. Make the yoke ... lighter—If Solomon had retained in his latter life the humility and devotion that characterized his earlier years there would have been no occasion for the people to make this request. His pride and ambition led him to impose grievous burdens on his people. 10. My little finger shall be thicker than my father's loins—The young men advised Rehoboam against yielding to the people's desire for relief. The burdens imposed by Solomon would be to those which Rehoboam would impose as the thickness of the little finger is to the thickness of the loins. These advisers flattered him and encouraged him in his vanity. 11. A heavy yoke—A yoke implies submission and service. The people did not object to either, but there was a limit to the burdens they could carry. Whips... scorpions—The people were to be the king's abject servants, and were to be treated as slaves. The whip was the instrument used by the slave-driver upon the slaves. The scorpion was a whip in which there were pieces of metal twisted into the lash.

III. Rehoboam's answer (vs. 12-15). 12. Jeroboam—He was the son of Nebat, of the tribe of Ephraim, and a man of great ability. He was present at Shechem as the natural leader of the ten tribes. 13. Answered the people roughly — Added to the harsh words of his answer was the unkind manner which he employed. Rehoboam displayed neither piety, wisdom nor good taste. 14. Counsel of the young men—He heeded not the wise words of age nor experience, nor did he ask counsel of God. His mind was filled with the thought of his own importance and of kingly power. 15. Hearkened not—He did not heed the reasonable request of his people. He missed his opportunity. A large and wealthy domain was his by inheritance, and a prosperous reign was before him if he would show himself generous and wise. The cause was from the Lord—The failure of Solomon to obey the Lord had prepared the way for the punishment of the nation, and God permitted the evil dispositions of men to accomplish His designs. His saying—The prophecy is given in 1 King. 11: 29-39.

IV. The Revolt (vs. 16-24). 16. Israel saw—When Rehoboam's answer came, the people saw that there was no relief to be hoped for from his administration. Their condition would be worse than under Solomon's rule, and they were ready to decide to cast in their lot with Jeroboam. Rehoboam's course was marked by selfishness, greed and folly. Thirsting for imperial power, he lost at least two-thirds of what he might have had. What portion ... in David—Since no help came from Rehoboam, they felt themselves under no obligation to him. David is mentioned as indicating the royal family. This was a signal for revolt. To your tents. This is a call to war. 17-21. The ten tribes made Jeroboam king over them, and the disruption of the kingdom was complete. Rehoboam returned to Jerusalem and ruled as King of Judah and Benjamin. He commenced to prepare for war to bring back the ten tribes, but the Lord sent his prophet Shemaiah to forbid him.

Questions.—What was the length of Solomon's reign? Who was Rehoboam? What request did the people make of him? What burdens had Solomon laid upon the people? To whom did Rehoboam go for counsel? What two kinds of counsel did he receive? Tell which was better, giving reasons. What wrongs did Rehoboam commit? What tribes remained faithful to Rehoboam? Who reigned over the others?

PRACTICAL SURVEY.

Topic.—The result of sin.

I. Israel's King incapacitated.

II. National disunion.

I. Israel's king incapacitated. In this lesson we see Rehoboam, a young prince, heir to one of the greatest empires of antiquity, with all the advantages which the greatness of his father could give him, sacrificing a position, which has had few parallels, for the lack of a few conciliatory words. Though possessed of natural advantages, he had not sufficient wisdom to weigh the value of advice when it was given. Rehoboam, the son of Solomon, began his reign with wrong standards. He assumed that the throne was his by right of succession and ignored the ratification of the people. A variety of circumstances prepared the way for a national crisis. First of all was Solomon's turning away from the Lord in permitting idolatry in his household, and in the oppression which he brought upon the people by his life of luxury. God had expressly declared that he would order future events on the king's obedience or disobedience to the divine law. It was because of Solomon's foreign wives and the idolatries which, with his sanction, they practised, that his empire was to be torn from his son, the child of an unregenerate Ammonitess. Rehoboam could hardly have been ignorant of the conditions which God had placed upon his father, but to the son of an idolater the words of Jehovah had little depth of meaning. By his hesitation at such a time and under such circumstances to listen to the grievances of the people, they saw that he was a tyrant. The people made no dispute about Rehoboam's accession to the throne. They had suffered real hardships and carried heavy burdens during Solomon's reign. They asked for relief from excess of taxation. There was yet no determination to rebel. The [illegible] rested with the prospective king, it was to bear the stamp of his mind as well as theirs. The people promised to honor Rehoboam. Their presentation was not unreasonable. A more foolish step than that which Rehoboam took could scarcely be imagined.

II. National disunion. Idolatry had undermined the deepest foundation of the nation's unity and loyalty to Jehovah. It was to represent God, to fulfill his purposes and to preserve his truth that the kingdom of Israel existed. It had seemed to be one of the chief purposes of God to make Israel a great nation, yet the chosen instrument, essential to the carrying out of God's purpose in giving a revelation and establishing his kingdom in the world, was threatened with destruction. Solomon's tyranny, Rehoboam's folly, the indifference of the people to the unity of the nation, worked out of the catastrophe which was a political effect produced by political causes, and at the same time it was a divine judgment. The divine resolve to shatter the kingdom was due to the thwarting of the divine purpose in establishing it. God varies his methods, but leaves his purposes unchanged. Rehoboam's act precipitated God's wrath and effected his purpose. Evil as the events were, God worked out through them his own allwise purpose. The weak Rehoboam and the ambitious Jeroboam were alike his agents. Israel's spiritual hold on Jehovah had relaxed. There was no conscious dependence upon him. Rehoboam's lost opportunity never came to him again. He was forbidden to recover by force what he had sacrificed by folly. He suffered the shame of rejection and defeat. He was defeated in his assertion of authority. He was forced to escape for his own life. The crisis proved him to be lacking in the qualifications of a king. He was even more than usually deficient in common prudence and in capacity for government. Under the leadership of Jeroboam, the rival claimant for the throne, and who promised the desired reforms, the ten tribes revolted. When the word of God came through Shemaiah, forbidding war, Rehoboam was powerless. It was a part of the divine plan that Jeroboam should take possession of the ten tribes. He had been so instructed, but he departed from God and failed to carry out the divine plan. As a consequence in the two kingdoms, failure followed upon disobedience to the divine leadership. Neither of the rival kings was true to his convictions of right. Neither was upheld by the Lord.

A TIME FOR REFORMATION.

(Philadelphia Ledger)

A British officer inspecting sentries [illegible] in Flanders came [illegible] a raw-looking private.

"What are you here for?" he asked.

"To report anything unusual, sir."

"What would you call unusual?"

"I dunno exactly, sir?"

"What would you do if you saw five battalions steaming across that field yonder?"

"Sign the pledge."

Could Not Bend Down On Account of Backache.

Mr. J. A. Lubiniecki, Dauphin, Man., writes: "It is my pleasure to write you in regard to Doan's Kidney Pills which I have been using for some time for kidney trouble, which used to affect my back so that at times I could not bend down, nor could I walk straight. I learned about your pills from your Almanac, and I bless the happy hour I thought of buying this medicine. One time a druggist persuaded me to buy ——'s Kidney Pills, saying they were just as good, in fact he guaranteed they were. I yielded to his advice, and what was the result? I had bearing down pains in my back for two days, so I took the balance of the pills unused to the druggist, and told him to give me Doan's Kidney Pills as they would stop the pain in 12 hours at the outside. He told me he was sorry I did not use more of the pills, and lengthen the time to await results. I told him there is no need of waiting with Doan's Pills, they go right to the spot. No substitute for me."

Doan's Kidney Pills are 50c. a box, 3 boxes for $1.25 at all dealers or mailed direct on receipt of price by The T. Milburn Co., Limited, Toronto, Ont.

When ordering direct specify "Doan's."

"The War Summary"

Almost from the very day the great European war began in August last, the outstanding feature in Canadian journalism covering the conflict has been "The War Summary" daily on pages 1 and 2 of THE GLOBE. In the concisest possible form the writer has given the readers a pen picture of the developments in all parts of the world. While the details of the movements along the extended frontiers have not been overlooked, the readers of THE GLOBE have been enabled to follow intelligently and with confidence the general outlines of the stupendous conflict. "The War Summary" of THE GLOBE is reproduced daily by several papers throughout the Dominion.

The Editorial Page

THE GLOBE on its editorial page has striven to place before the public in proper perspective the broad background of the titanic struggle. This series of articles has attracted the attention not only of the Canadian people, but of leading men and journals in all parts of the world. The causes leading up to the war, the elements entering into its conduct, and the results likely to flow from the cessation of hostilities have been dealt with in that bold and clear-cut form characteristic of THE GLOBE'S editorial page.

News Service

The above features, in addition to a cable and letter service from the front unmatched in Canada, have placed THE GLOBE far in the lead of Canadian papers, and partly explain the phenomenal increase of 33 1-3 per cent. in THE GLOBE'S circulation during recent months.

Other Features

The sporting pages, the financial and commercial pages, the woman's pages, etc., etc., with the additional pages in Wednesday's issue devoted to "Farm and Country Life," are maintained at a high standard of excellence, a standard that has justified THE GLOBE in its title of Canada's National Newspaper, and has given it by many thousands the largest circulation of any morning paper in the Dominion.

Local and City Papers

By all means take your local paper, but in the field of metropolitan newspapers THE GLOBE unquestionably offers you the greatest value to be had in Canada. Order it to-day. 25 cents per month—one dollar for four months—three dollars per year.

P.S.—According to Lord Kitchener, the big war has only begun.

French liquor dealers are alarmed at the progress of the anti-alcoholic movement and have organized to fight it.

Canada's big railroads are sending nearly 100,000 box cars West now in order to be able to move the crop in reasonable order.

Buying Canadian made goods is not a fad. It's organized common sense. Only foreigners can afford to ignore a policy that means our national prosperity.

From the way the Italians are pounding the Austrians with their heavy guns, the Allies might get some pointers on how to blast the Huns out of France and Flanders.

The Kaiser has promised to punish any German caught working in American munitions factories, but there are precious few of them can secure a job in an American munitions factory these days.

War is forcing the Turk to build railways—something he undertook very seldom in time of peace. They will come in handy after the Turk's lease is cancelled and he goes back to the interior of Asia Minor.

Hamilton ladies have an ambulance corps, and intend eventually to take over all the duties of the Home Guard. The war has upset establishment and lingering notions regarding woman's sphere.

Only one member of the late Roblin Govt. has the nerve to face the electors of Manitoba in the provincial election on August 6th. The rest have slunk out of public life before the electors get a chance at them.

When the Maine was sunk the U. S. Govt. couldn't get at the throat of Spain too quickly, but when hundreds of her citizens go down on the Lusitania, it takes a couple of months for Americans to get their dander up.

Be cautious before accusing your fellow citizen of being unpatriotic. Remember that you can make few accusations more serious. To be true to the empire and have another accuse you of disloyalty, is enough to make a man wish himself in another country.

SHOULD HELP SOME

Succession duties to the extent of about half a million from the estate of the late E. C. Walker, president of the big whiskey company in Walkerville, will be used by the Ontario Govt. to purchase machine guns. Mr. Walker left an estate of over four millions. If the machine guns mow down men as fast as his whiskey has done, they will perform great execution. — Chesley Enterprise.

BECKER PAYS PENALTY

Police Lieutenant Chas. Becker, who was found guilty of the murder of the gambler Herman Rosenthal in New York in 1912, paid the penalty of his crime in Sing Sing prison on Friday morning going to the electric chair at 5.55. Becker protested his innocence to the last.

Previously the former Police Lieutenant at 4 a.m. had issued "My dying statement." Becker walked unassisted from his cell to the death chamber. His nerve was unshaken even as the guards stepped forward and adjusted the electrodes. The last statement of Charles Becker made public at 4 a.m. follows:—

"Gentlemen: I stand before you in my full senses, knowing that no power on earth can save me from the grave that is to receive me. In the face of that, in the teeth of those who condemn me, and in the presence of your God, I proclaim my absolute innocence of the foul crime for which I must die. You are now about to witness my destruction by the State, which is organized to protect the lives of the innocent. May almighty God pardon everyone who has contributed in any degree to my untimely death and now on the brink of my grave, I declare to the world that I am proud to have been the husband of the purest, noblest woman that ever lived, Helen Becker. This acknowledgement is the only legacy I can leave her. I bid you all good-bye. Father, I am ready to go. Amen.
(Signed) Charles Becker."

Preparing for Long War.

Plans are being prepared at divisonal headquarters in London, Ont., for the construction of a large number of huts which will be utilized as winter quarters for troops in training in London next winter. The department is proceeding with all arrangements on the assumption that the war will continue for a long time, and as it is the intention of maintaining a large camp in London for the duration of the war, it is deemed advisable to have buildings for winter use on Carling's Heights.

Young Lady Meets Death.

We regret to learn of the sad accident on Tuesday afternoon, which resulted in the death of Miss Mary Ramage, daughter of Mr. and Mrs. Wm. Ramage, of Egremont. The deceased was a bright, cheerful young woman, about 25 years of age, and from her seeamiable and cheerful disposition, was a constant comfort to her parents and a bright, lovable companion of all her associates. On Tuesday afternoon the unfortunate young women was engaged in hanging pictures and while doing so was standing on a chair. In some way, she lost her balance, falling across the back of the chair and causing internal injuries. Medical aid was summoned and Dr. Groves of Fergus sent for, but nothing could be done towards saving her life. Arrangements for burial have not been made at time of writing and interment may be delayed, awaiting the arrival of a brother from the west.—Durham Chronicle.

The Late Mrs. McNally.

Mrs. George McNally passed away at the residence of Mr. E. W. Schneider on July 8th. Her name was Mary Carter. She was born in Rutlandshire, England, and came to Canada when quite a young girl with her parents. She was one of a family of nine, four of whom survive her, namely, Mrs. Thos. Hickling of Carrick Tp., H. R. Carter, Chesley, Samuel of Kateida, Man., and Benjamin of Manitou, Man. Deceased lived for a time in Chesley when Mr. Carter first started in the hardware business. Afterwards she was married to the late John Armstrong of Brant Tp., who predeceased her about twenty-seven years ago. She then moved to Hanover where she lived for about ten years when she returned to Chesley where she was married to the late Geo. McNally who died about eight years ago. Mrs. McNally had been ailing since January when she took a slight stroke. This along with throat trouble was the cause of her death. The funeral service was conducted by her pastor Rev. J. A. Hills assited by Rev. Mr. Hauch of the Evangelical Association. Her funeral was attended by friends and relatives from Arthur, Walkerton, Hanover, Brant and Carrick.—Chesley Enterprise.

The smallest attendance of any one day at the Canadian National Exhibition was 21,900; the largest 135,000.

Reports from Germany declare that much of Germany's expected large crop has been blighted by drought and the only good crop is that of potatoes.

Another fine of one million dollars has been imposed on the city of Brussels by the German authorities in consequence of the destruction of the Zeppelin dirigible balloon at Essen by aviators of the entente allies.

Sunny Weather Wanted.

The crops everywhere look splendid. Never did nature smile more kindly on the farmer. What is desired now is suitable weather for ripening and harvesting what promises to be a record crop, giving abundance for man and beast.

Mother Refuses Consent.

Pte. Alex. Grosz was home from Niagara Camp this week visiting his wife and family. He looks well in uniform and with his close-clipped moustache. The other Hanover boy, Wilfred Burns, who enlisted with him has given up soldiering as his mother would not give her consent.—Hanover Post.

Another Bowling Cup.

The Hurlber House, Wiarton, and the Patterson House, Owen Sound, have presented a Cup for competition among the bowlers of Grey and Bruce counties. The playing must begin here, so Wiarton will have the honour of being the first defenders. Those competing for the cup must bring two rinks. The cup is a beauty, and if it is here and there, and allover like the Bowman Trophy it will be in many places.

One Examination Now

A change in the regulations for recruits for overseas service has been approved by the Militia Council and Cabinet and officially announced by Senator Lougheed, acting Minister of Militia. It stipulates that there will be but one medical examination. Previously there has been two examinations one when a man first joined and second when he reached camp. The first examination was often rather lax and men who were accepted, resigned positions and were farewelled' by friends were rejected when they reached camp Now the first examination which will be more rigorous, will be final: men will not be subjected to the humiliation of returning home after being once accepted.

Ever branch of war activity to be seen in Europe to-day will be vividly portrayed at the Canadian National Exhibition, Toronto. Aeroplanes will land at the Military Camp after taking observations in mid-air; minature battle ships will be blown up in the lake; there will be bridge and sheltered trench building, armoured cars, hospital autos, field ambulances with stretcher bearer sections, field dressing stations field bakeries and cookeries ammunition columns, bomb throwers, signal corpse, observation masts, etc The Camp is occupied by several hundred officers and men now training for overseas service at Niagara and other camps for the infantry', cavalry and artillery units.

Women's Institutes of Ontario

Nearly 25,000 women in 843 branches make up the membership of the Women's Institutes of Ontario, the annual report of which for 1914 has just been issued. Articles in this report, cover nearly every line of feminine endeavor The efforts described or proposed relate to activities in institutions, the church and community life, to Red Cross and other forms of patriotic helpfulness and to agriculture, more especially to fruit-growing, poultry raising, and bee keeping for women. The report gives very full consideration to the home nearly every range of domestic economy receiving attention. The study of child life is given a large place, and two addresses deal with "Children's Rights," and "Education for the Backward" "Electricity as it Relates to Women on the Farm" is the title of a practical talk by Sir Adam Beck Considerable space is given to health topics, both of a public and an individual nature.

Yesterday morning Lieut. Harold C. Young, of Hanover, and twenty-nine men left by the early C. P. R. on their way to Camp Niagara to begin their course of training there in the Canadian overseas forces. This is the latest quota from Grey county and makes upwards of four hundred and fifty who have gone into the ranks to fight for king and country. There was no demonstration at the send off to the men, they simply marched down to the station and went aboard the train and pulled out for their training camp. The men are a good looking body, and Lieut. Young is to be congratulated on the appearance of the quota which he leads away. Up to the last couple of days it looked as if he were going to leave somewhat short of the required number, thirty having been called for and only about fifteen having enlisted up to the last few days. But during the last three or four days Lieut. Young had taken a trip around Grey county to the different recruiting stations and as a result had come back with enough to make the number up to twenty-nine in all, only three short of the requirement. — Owen Sound Times.

Stomach Trouble and Rheumatism Relieved By "Fruit-a-tives"

MR. L. LABRIE
591 Champlain St., Montreal.

"I have been restored to health by taking 'Fruit-a-tives'. For two years, I was a miserable sufferer from Rheumatism and Stomach Trouble. I became very weak, had frequent dizzy spells and when I took food, felt wretched and sleepy. I suffered from Rheumatism dreadfully, with pains in my back and joints and my hands swollen.

A friend advised me to try 'Fruit-a-tives' and from the outset, they did me good. After I had started the second box, I felt I was getting well and I persevered in the treatment. I can truthfully say that 'Fruit-a-tives' is the only medicine that helped me.
LOUIS LABRIE.

REDUCED RAILWAY RATES FROM ALL POINTS

There is talk of a vote being brought on in January next, to repeal local option in Chesley.

Mr. Will Kerr of London and Miss Jean O'Bright of Walkerton spent Friday afternoon with their friend, Miss Edith Switzer at Crystal Farm.—Hanover Post.

The new post-card issue is of the two-cent variety, and saves the trouble of adding a war stamp. If the regular letter stamp was changed to three cents, it would be a further convenience that many would appreciate.

More Bruce Boys Enlist.

Neil and John C. McGillivray, son of Mrs. D. McGillivray 12th Bruce, are two more Bruce boy who have responded to the bugle call. They have joined the 47th Regiment, D.C.O.R., of Vancouver, and are now training at Vernon, B.C. with about 1,000 young men preparing for the front.—Paisley Advocate.

Summer Resorts Well Patronized.

In spite of the cool weather the various summer resorts are being well patronized this season. At the Sauble and Red Bay there are more tourists than heretofore, but at Oliphant the number is not yet normal. However during August this will probably change, and there will be as many at this Lake Huron spot as ever.—Wiarton Echo.

Stick by Your Home Merchant.

A travelling accident insurance agent struck town last week and claimed that he secured quite a number of risks notwithstanding that there are probably six in that business in town. Possibly some look upon it as being courteous to a stranger by giving him some business, but it is about as good a way to knock the props from under our whole business life as can be well imagined. It does not matter whether it is insurance, dry goods or printing patronize the home man every time.

Committed for Trial.

William Troy, hostler at the Dominion Hotel at Ayton, was committed for trial on Saturday afternoon, by Justices of the Peace Edwin Ryan and R. H. Fortune on a charge of having indecently assaulted Miss Henrietta Croft, aged 16, on the farm of George Frank, by whom she was employed as a domestic. Bail was fixed in the sum of $2,000, and the accused man will be tried at the next county assizes at Owen Sound. Crown Attorney Dyer of Owen Sound was present, and Troy was represented by Otto E. Klein. The affair has caused a sensation in the district.

The Wiarton Record has again suspended publication. This is the second time in less than a year.

Clarence Kramer Enlists.

Clarence Kramer, youngest son of Postmaster Kramer of Mildmay, who has been working at Hamilton since spring, has enlisted with the Queen's Own Artillery Regiment at Toronto and has commenced training. This is another of Mildmay's brave sons to take his stand in defence of the empire.—Gazette.

A raw boy without a dollar, present or prospective, sparking a girl regular and talking about marrying is a spectacle for God and men. He should be reasoned with, and if he will not quit it until he is able to support a wife, and to know whom he loves, and the difference between love and chicken pox he should be quarantined or put in a convent erected purposely for such cases. Nine-tenths of the unhappy marriages are the result of green human calves being allowed to run at large in the society pasture without any yokes on them.

Worse than Rocking the Boat

"Overcrowding" as the Youth's put it, is one of the worst forms of rocking the boat. The loss of over 100 lives at Queenston a few weeks ago through the overcrowding of an electric car, is still fresh in the public memory. Now we have the loss of over 1200 lives through the capsizing of a pleasure steamer in Chicago manifestly because too many people were allowed on the boat. Regulations are made in regard to these matters and officials and companies permitting the thoughtless people to transgress should be held to strict account.

Young Women Raise $150,00

On Saturday the young ladies constituting the auxiliary to the local branch of the Patriotic fund turned over to the local treasurer the contributions secured by them from the big crowd here on Dominion Day. It will be remembered they bought about 1200 roses and sold them all. Along with this money was added some weekly collections which the girls gather from a number of the men of the town weekly. The total amount to $150. This will be forwarded to the national fund at Ottawa, from which treasury it is disbursed to the soldiers' families all over the Dominion.—Port Elgin Times.

Prefers Sword to Pen.

Mr. J. C. Little who for a year has been proprietor and editor of The Teeswater News has disposed of the business to Miss M Fairbairn who took charge of the office on Monday of this week. We understand that Miss Fairbairn will herself take charge as editor and business manager. It was a Mr. Fairbairn an uncle of the new proprietor, who founded the News away back about 1874. Mr. Little is literally laying down the pen to take up the sword. Some time ago he qualified for enlistment with the Canadian forces, and will now take a course in one of the military colleges, with a view of to qualify as an officer. Evidently the ex-editor expects the war to last for some months, and also has become firmly convinced that as applied to such thick skulls as envelop the German brain the sword is a more effective weapon than the pen.

Deafness Cannot be Cured

by local applications, as they cannot reach the diseased portion of the ear. There is only one way to cure deafness, and that is by constitutional remedies. Deafness is caused by an inflamed condition of the mucous lining of the Eustachian Tube. When this tube is inflamed you have a rumbling sound or imperfect hearing, and when it is entirely closed, Deafness is the result, and unless the inflammation can be taken out and this tube restored to its normal condition, hearing will be destroyed forever; nine cases out of ten are caused by Catarrh, which is nothing but an inflamed condition of the mucous surfaces.

We will give One Hundred Dollars for any case of Deafness (caused by catarrh) that cannot be cured by Hall's Catarrh Cure. Send for circulars, free.

Securing Recruits.

Lieutenant Young of Hanover, now with the third contingent, was in town Monday night and secured the names of six recruits, who left yesterday morning for Owen Sound, to undergo examination.—Durham Chronicle.

Bitten by a Cat.

Mr. John McLeod, of Ripley, had a fierce fight with a cat early Monday morning, when he caught hold of Miss Pussy by the hind legs and attempted to throw the pet from the house. The cat fastened it's teeth on John's wrist, inflicting several deep wounds. As a last resort he chocked the animal until it released its hold, and settled the fight by firing a bullet into the cat's head.—Ripley Express.

Rod and Gun.

The August issue of Rod and Gun in Canada published at Woodstock, Ont., by W. J. Taylor Limited, and now on the news stands, makes good reading for the sportsman. It's stories of hunting and fishing and "been there" descriptions of various outings in Canadian woods or on Canadian waters are in line with the vacation season and the magazine is one well worth while tucking into the club or dunnage bag when setting out on the annual summer vacation.

Giddy Girls at the Movies.

Nothing is more uninspiring and annoying than to sit behind: or before, girls who talk continually at a moving picture show. The theme of there conversation is of course, the picture being presented. They criticize indiscriminately, and tell what they would do in the heroine's case; go in raptures over the hero, and fore tell how the end would work out, according to their seperate ideas. In one case in point these giddy young things never let up for two straight hours and during that time there was not one sensible word spoken, says an exchange.

Potatoes Rotting

A rot among potatoes has already appeared in many places this year. It is not the rot that comes through blighting of the leaf by a fingers growth, which goes downwards to the potato, but it starts from affected tubers which become soft and pulpy and the stems die. The moist weather has favored the disease this season. The soft rot is a bacterial disease, and is nearly always due to diseased seed having been used for planting. Spraying is of no direct use. The crop should be carefully inspected and every plant that is found to be rotting should be dug out and either burned or buried in quick lime. When harvesting tubers that shows signs of the disease should be placed on one side and not stored with the pile. If any of these affected tubers get into the seed pile to be used the following year, they will either rot during storage and cause them around them to rot also if they are not kept dry, and, if they are kept dry, the disease will be checked until they are planted, when they will rot and destroy the plant that springs from them

The Spinster's Hint

A maiden well advanced in years used to wait every morning for the postman, a bachelor of about her age and ask him if there were not a letter for her. Several weeks passed thus, but the anxiously expected letter did not arrive. Finally one morning the postman said to her:

"Well, tomorrow you shall get your letter if I have to write it myself."

"That's right do it," replied the maiden. "I shall be delighted to accept it."

"Well," said the postman, smiling "what do you want me to write— a business letter or a love letter?"

"If you mean business, please write a love letter!" was her blushing reply.

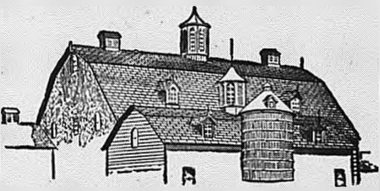
FARMERS!

Why Metallic Roofing and Shingles are not as durable as "Brantford Slates"



Brantford Asphalt Slates
For Houses and Barns

We are making colored and plain Asphalt Slates suitable for roofing any class of building, particularly farmers' buildings.

SPECIAL OFFER We are making a special offer to roof the first house or barn in your locality at about cost price and guarantee it's lifetime for ten years against leakage.

Electricians will tell you that Asphalt, from which Brantford Asphalt Shingles are made, is an excellent insulating material and does not deteriorate when exposed to the elements, being proof against acid, salt, alkali, rust and corrosion.

Galvanized iron is subject to all these agents of destruction, as well as other enemies, viz., rust and moisture from the inside of the barn, produced by the heating of grain, moisture from cattle, etc. It is also open to attacks from the elements without, and both processes are working toward its ruin at the same time. In other words, condensation is causing the destruction of Metal Roofing and Shingles, while Asphalt Slates retain their wearing qualities indefinitely.

Therefore, Asphalt Slates are, in the end, the cheapest roofing material you can buy, and, as they are now made, the most attractive in appearance, as well as being waterproof and practically fireproof.

LOW PRICES We have succeeded in producing them at about the same price as wood shingles. Let us figure with you at once.

There is no reason why the farmers of our country should put up with leaky roofs when we have acres of material we can supply quickly at moderate prices.

ROOF-LEAK PAINTS (in Red, Green and Black) This splendid material is especially adapted for old Shingles and Metal and Felt Roofing of all kinds. In fact, any material that will take paint, can be made to last years longer by an application. Put up in large open-mouth cans of 1, 2, 3 and 5 gallons.

Ask for Business

ONLY one's most intimate friends go to one's home uninvited, and the extent of one's calling list is determined by the number of one's calls.

In business the same facts hold. Every merchant in Walkerton knows scores of families here and in the country round about whose custom he does not possess.

Mutual acquaintance is the first step towards getting these families as customers, and acquaintances can most surely be developed by invitations or calls made through the medium of advertisements in the Weekly TELESCOPE.

To the Merchants of Walkerton

Show your desire for business by asking for it. A merchant who does not ask for business is supposed not to want business very keenly.

Old Country News

FARM WORK FOR WOMEN.

Farm work for women has become fashionable. College girls from Newnham, Oxford and almost the entire enrolment from Sheffield University are among the volunteers for war work in the fields, and girls who had previously devoted all their energies to sport and fashion are making a fad of it.

A special costume for women farmers has been designed and exhibited at a women's farm work show given by Lady Cowdray at her London home. The suit is made of tough brown linen fashioned into a long coat buttoned down the front. Knickerbockers of the same material are worn underneath, buttoning below the knee. This costume is not only cheap, but allows as much freedom of movement as man's dress. Because of the knickers the women farmers can climb trees for pruning or picking fruit. At Lady Cowdray's exhibition every branch of farm work was represented, dairying, gardening, orchard work and work in the fields.

Some prejudice is encountered on the part of the old fashioned farmers. When they receive an application for work from a girl who looks like the dairymaid of a comic opera, they are inclined to give a refusal on the spot. Most of the applicants have little idea of what real farmwork is like. They think of a rose-covered cottage, with tea served in the garden among the flowers, and an arcadian existence. But they are willing to learn about pigs, chickens and stock, and generally do well at fruit picking and hay raking.

SALVATION ARMY'S WAR WORK.

The Salvation Army is making an appeal for $750,000, an increase of $500,000 over a year ago, to finance its social work connected with the war. Out of this money the Salvationists expect to allot $50,000 for work among the soldiers and sailors, and $55,000 is set apart for the relief of the army's sick and wounded, as 20,000 members are now serving with the British forces, exclusive of the Canadian, Australian and other colonial divisions.

Other sums allotted are $75,000 for work among the homeless, $100,000 for the training of Salvationist officers, $130,000 for the maintenance of work in India and $75,000 in Japan, Korea, Java, Africa and the West Indies. The rest is used in other charities and religious works.

During the past twelve months the Salvationists supplied more than thirteen million meals and eight million night's lodgings to the poor.

Every military camp or place frequented by soldiers has some kind of Salvationist work going on. But the recreation and social huts are maintained by the Young Men's Christian Association.

THIRD LONDON TERRITORIAL V. C.

The third London Territorial V. C. is Lance-Corp. Leonard James Keyworth, 24th (County of London) Battalion, the London Regiment, popularly known as the Queen's. A collector's clerk when the war broke out, Keyworth has been at the front since April.

The "most conspicuous bravery" which the official account credits him with was shown in the all-night fighting at Givenchy on May 25-26. As an example of indomitable pluck and coolness his deed has no superior in the records of the war. For two hours he was a target for German bullets while he hurled 150 bombs into an enemy position. The official account says:

After the successful assault on the German position by the 24th Battalion, efforts were made by that unit to follow up their success by a bomb attack, during the progress of which 58 men out of 75 became casualties.

During this very fierce encounter Lance-Corp. Keyworth stood fully exposed for two hours on the top of the enemy's parapet and threw 150 bombs among the Germans, who were only a few yards away.

AN IRISH ARMY.

Some of the new branches of Kitchener's army in training now in a camp south of London, is an Irish army commanded by an Irish general. This is the first time in British history that such a force has been assembled. There have always been Irish troops in the British army, and sometimes they have even been in the majority, but hitherto the largest purely British unit has been the regiment. This is the first time that an entire division of Irish troops has been made up.

The "Irish Division," as it is technically known, received its first training on the soil of its native isle, and has only recently been brought to England. Soon after its arrival it was inspected by the King and Lord Kitchener, and the latter set his seal of approval by declaring it "one of the finest divisions in the new army."

RABBIT BREEDING FOR FOOD.

A leaflet on rabbit-breeding has been issued by the Board of Agriculture with a view to helping out the meat shortage. In normal times, nearly $3,500,000 worth of rabbit flesh is imported into Great Britain annually, mostly from Australia. Double this quantity, it is pointed out, could easily be raised in the kingdom by feeding the rabbits on potato peelings and other vegetable waste.

WOMAN MANAGES BIG PLANT.

Lady Mackworth, who was one of the survivors of the Lusitania disaster, has taken over the management of the Cambrian Coal Combine, aggregating $100,000,000 a year, during her father's absence in America on war work for the government. Her father, D. A. Thomas, is the head of the combine. His general manager, Leonard Llewellyn, has also been detached from the company's office on war work.

KILLED AS A SPY.

Two young soldiers at Galway have been sentenced to a year's imprisonment each for killing a man whom they took to be a German spy. The evidence showed that the soldiers arrested the man while he was in a train, took him to a lonely railroad station and beat him so severely that he died. The man proved to be a former British soldier of long service, and upon his estate have been given

All the workpeople employed by Lord Ashton at his Lancaster mills half-penny per hour increase of wages. No announcement preceded the advance, and no application by the employees had been made.

That neither black horses nor black carriages were to be used at his funeral was an institution left by Mr. C. Childs, of Lewisham.

Mr. W. Nichol Reid, one of the proprietors of the Western Daily Press, Bristol, died on Tuesday week.

The death has occurred at Newcastle of Mr. Dixon Cowie, for the last eighteen years general treasurer of the Northumberland Colliery Mechanics' Association.

Mr. Cuthbert Redhand Morris, of North Curry, near Taunton, one of the best known engineers and land agents in the west of England, has died, aged 85. He was agent for many of the principal families in the west.

Jacob John Astley, aged thirty-two, described as brother of Lord Hastings, who pleaded guilty to charges of forgery, was at the [illegible] yesterday sentenced to eighteen months' imprisonment.

Sergeant-Major Frederick Barter, V. C., Royal Welsh Fusiliers, was given a hearty welcome upon his return home on leave to Cardiff. He was received at the railway station by the Lord Mayor and members of the City Corporation and a procession, headed by a band, paraded through the main streets of the town, which was lined by thousands of cheering people. After addressing a recruiting meeting Sergeant-Major Barter was taken home in a motor-car decorated with flags.

Accidental death was the verdict at Hartlepool on Monday on John William Horsley, aged 21, a son of a fisherman, who died in hospital from gunshot wound. While shots from a miniature rifle were being fired at gulls and sparrows, Horsley, it was stated, went out to pick up a bird and was accidentally hit.

A verdict of manslaughter was returned by a Mansfield jury against Harry Scarlett, of Mansfield, in connection with the death of Corporal John Richardson, whose skull was fractured by being knocked down by a motor-car. Corporal Richardson stepped off the footpath to allow a woman to pass and was knocked down by the motor-car, driven, as a military witness said, at forty miles an hour.

Including 33,000 who witnessed the closing scenes on Saturday, the Royal Show at Nottingham attracted 81,000 visitors this year. The jumping competition for mares and geldings was won by Messrs. T. and E. Ewart, of Harrowgate. In the butter and milk yielding tests the King won the first, second and third prizes with three Dexters from the Sandringham herd.

As dawn was breaking on Sunday week Private Thomas Isherwood, of the National Reserve, who was on sentry duty at Nottingham, challenged a man whom he saw approaching. There was no response. The challenge, says an eye-witness of the scene, was repeated twice, and failing to get a reply, the sentry fired, killing the man instantly. The dead man was William Pickard, retired publican, aged sixty, who, it is suggested, suffered from partial deafness.

Alderman George Senior, one of the most characteristic figures in Sheffield public life, died on Sunday week at the age of seventy-seven. He started working when eight years old, by producing 1,000 nails a day for fourpence. He was Lord Mayor in 1901. On the site on which he made nails he built four almshouses.

[illegible] andra on Monday week unveiled a statue of King Edward in a corner of the altar screen at Southwark Cathedral. The Bishop of Southwark, in his sermon, recalled Her Majesty's last visit on July 3rd, 1905, when, accompanied by the late King, she attended the cathedral inauguration service.

THE FIRST TEACUPS.

They Had No Handles, and Saucers Were Used as Covers.

In the middle of the seventeenth century tea was introduced into England, and with it came the Chinese or "china" teacup. Strangely enough, the men who imported it from the orient did not themselves understand the method of its use.

The Chinese put a pinch of tea into a large cup without a handle, filled it with boiling water and then inverted a saucer over the receptacle, within whose rim it closely fitted. The object was partly to retain the heat, but chiefly to prevent the escape of the fragrance of the herb, which the Chinese found most delicious. The infusion was permitted to stand for five minutes, when it was decanted into a second cup without a saucer and daintily sipped.

John Bull, however, emphatically declined to take his tea in Chinese fashion. He liked the appearance of the ornamental ware upon his table, but he insisted on placing the cup in the saucer, like a miniature flowerpot, and used it exclusively to drink from, preparing the beverage in a common instead of an individual receptacle.

In course of time England began the manufacture of cups and saucers, and pictures which have been preserved from the days of the Stuarts show big, flaring cups, four inches across the top, with saucers less than three inches in diameter. By degrees one dwindled and the other expanded, until in the middle of the nineteenth century the opposite extreme was reached, and fashionable tea services had cups only an inch and a half in diameter, accompanied by five-inch saucers.

The handle of the teacup came from Mediterranean lands. Originally it was made of thick and strong earthenware and applied to heavy jars and lamps. Its decorative possibilities popularized it with Greek and Roman potters, who extended its use to small amphorae and flagons; but, as the word "amphora" indicates, the handle was double. Single handles crept into use by slow degrees, and were probably applied to drinking cups about the time that coffee came into vogue in Southern Europe, the beverage being taken almost at the boiling point, so that some device for lifting the cup without burning the fingers was found desirable.—London Tatler.

Holland's Abode of Peace.

Zeist, in Holland, is best known as the abode of peace. The religious community of Moravians has been settled there for over a century and a half. Its gray, sober looking buildings stand in its own well cultivated grounds, within which the members lead a life of Quaker-like simplicity. There is little display even of the goods they make, particularly their flowers, which are sold in small rooms that have no likeness to shops except for the plain counter that runs across them.—London Chronicle.

Simple Exercise To Develop the Bust and Throat

MORE BREATHING EXERCISES, IF PERSISTED IN, WILL GIVE NEARLY ANY WOMAN A FINE BUST AND THROAT.

(By Irene McGlone Gibson.)

Many women write and ask: "How shall I develop my throat and bust?"

There is one very simple exercise that, taken together with deep breathing, will, if persisted in, give any woman who is not in delicate health a fine throat and bust.

Miss Irene Hough kindly consented to pose with her hands in first position.

Stand on the balls of your feet, throw your head and chin up. This will pull up your abdomen and chest. Take a long, deep breath and while your lungs are full, bring your hands tightly closed up to your chest. Then push them straight up into the air with a jerk. Hold them there while you empty your filled lungs. Bring your hands down to first position, fill lungs again, push hands right out in front of you as though you were beating something back, empty your filled lungs.

Now raise your hands over your head, lightly touching the tips of your fingers, then put them back of your neck, the palms.

Now comes the part of this exercise that will probably make your friends think you have suddenly gone insane. Start and sing at the top of your voice and high notes of the scale, holding in your abdomen and keeping your chest high.

[illegible] women have finer throats and finer busts than singers.

THE QUEER PAPUANS.

They Are Cannibals, Yet They Are as Simple as Children.

Papua, the British New Guinea of recent times and [illegible] savagery, is still a peculiar country, [illegible] human, and the [illegible] difficulty [illegible] attention by the following story.

"An experience of a magistrate [illegible] illustrates [illegible] the [illegible] simplicity of the native [illegible] of mind toward [illegible] information [illegible] the administration of the law. [illegible] had nothing to do with the matter. [illegible]

"It seems that the natives of the [illegible] imagined themselves that they could swallow the white man's bullets and thus escape disaster. The magistrate inquired if this were so.

"Upon this the magistrate loaded his rifle and explained to the native that if he should [illegible] chance he unable to swallow the bullet it would surely kill him.

"'Now, open your mouth,' he continued, 'and I will shoot the bullet down your throat.'

"The native opened his mouth—all unconcerned. [illegible] at a distance the magistrate [illegible] the bullet through [illegible] triumphantly [illegible]. The native [illegible] of [illegible] exit. Undoubtedly the bullet had gone clean through the [illegible]. The magistrate [illegible].

"'Now, [illegible],' said he, 'and swallow the bullet if you can.' And the native opened his mouth.

"Naturally, the magistrate [illegible] and [illegible] to [illegible] with the remark: 'What in the world is one to make of such people—what is one to do with them?'"

THE SOLDIER'S LOAD.

While the rifle of the infantryman of the world's armies has steadily lessened in weight during the last [illegible] years, and while constant attempts have been made in other ways to lighten the soldier's burden [illegible], it is nevertheless a fact that the infantry fighter of to-day carries very little if any less than he did a generation or two ago. His gun and bayonet and some other details of equipment that had an exact counterpart in the old armies may be lighter, but modern military necessities have added to his carrying requirements.

He must now face this marching load: Magazine rifle, bayonet, scabbard, rifle cartridge belt and fasteners, rifle cartridge belt suspenders, first aid packet, canteen, canteen strap, set of blanket roll straps, haversack, meat can (used as a frying pan), cup, knife, fork, spoon, one ration (half), one shelter tent (half), one poncho (rubber blanket), one pair shoes, one housewife (needles and thread), one overcoat, one [illegible] load.

These marching loads have varied from 50 to 100 pounds in [illegible] and [illegible] about the same now.

Of course, in going into actual battle much of this load is discarded, some of it never to be recovered by the owner again, each having to [illegible] the battle peril. In the old days knapsacks were always cast off by seasoned troops, who grew calloused as to the hoarding up of little trinkets and mementos that so appeal to the amateur soldier. After a battle even discarded knapsacks might be recovered, but it was not likely. At any rate, while another knapsack might be issued, it would not be the one possessed by the soldier before the battle.

Whenever a new levy of troops was [illegible] and arrived in a camp where veterans were stationed the newcomers were greeted with many jeers as to their spick and span [illegible] appearance, with special emphasis on "How nice those knapsacks look!" This time-honored receptacle of everything a soldier desired or hoped to keep ever near him is no longer reckoned in the latter day [illegible] fighting equipment. The Japanese soldier and the men of some other armies carry a [illegible] sack in which it is possible to [illegible] things the fighter needs or thinks he needs until the weight suggests a discarding.

During the Japanese-Russian war the infantrymen of Nippon carried among other things a [illegible] knapsack, a [illegible] bottle of [illegible], a supply of rice in a grass bag and a [illegible] chemical camp bottle of a patented kind that could [illegible] fight in a gale of wind. While troops are going into battle discard everything [illegible] for the fight and are thus lightened up some, they have to take on some weight in the place of that relinquished in the shape of an extra number of cartridges.

Dainty Dance Frock

Three of the season's most fascinating dance frocks are shown in [illegible]. Pompadour silks and [illegible] silks [illegible] taffeta are occasionally used. Pictured is a very dainty [illegible] the round neck [illegible] black velvet facing lends a pretty detail.

When a fellow hugs a girl he doesn't always realize that his efforts are going to waist.

Her Baby Had Dysentery.

Had Two Doctors. No Result.

WAS CURED BY THE USE OF

DR. FOWLER'S

Extract of Wild Strawberry.

In dysentery the discharges from the bowels follow each other with great rapidity, and sometimes become mixed with blood.

Never neglect what at first appears to be a slight attack of diarrhoea or dysentery will surely set in. Cure the first symptoms by the use of Dr. Fowler's Extract of Wild Strawberry.

Mrs. Martin Farrahar, Docherty Corner, N.B., writes: "I can very strongly recommend Dr. Fowler's Extract of Wild Strawberry for dysentery and summer complaints. My little girl, at the age of two years, had the dysentery very bad. We had two doctors, but with no result. My mother brought me a bottle of "Dr. Fowler's," and when half the bottle was used the little girl was running around playing with her dolls with great delight and joy to the family, for we did not think she would ever get better."

There are a number of preparations on the market to-day, claiming to be the same as "Dr. Fowler's Extract of Wild Strawberry," and also called similar names, so as to fool the public into thinking they are getting the genuine.

"Dr. Fowler's" is manufactured only by The T. Milburn Co., Limited, Toronto, Ont. See that their name is on the wrapper.

MECHANICS' RISKS.

Airmen's Helpers Take Big Chances.

The tragic death of a naval air mechanic at Hoo aerodrome recently, who, after being lifted to a height of 100 feet by a trailer rope of an airship, lost his grip and fell to the ground, calls attention to the dangerous work carried out by the men behind the air services. The safety of the aeroplanes and airships used by the Royal Flying corps and the naval air service are dependent on the conscientious work of the mechanics. Pilots themselves have not the time to examine personally every strut, wire or bolt on their machines before taking them over the enemy's lines, and this important task is left to the A. M.'s, as they are termed. The work of the air mechanic requires steady nerve, for it entails many risks. When airships start on voyages the mechanics, by means of numerous trailer ropes, hold the swaying vessel to earth until the signal is given to let go. In a wind a lighter-than-air machine is a difficulty monster to manage. It plunges and rears in the air with the unexpectedness of a bronco, and the mechanics are continually being lifted off their feet as the airship wrenches at the trailer ropes. Woe betide the unfortunate mechanic who becomes entangled in a rope as the airship rises in the air. He is likely to be lifted to a height of several hundred feet, and to save his neck he must cling to the rope for ten or fifteen minutes while the airship is manoeuvred back to earth.

Starting up the powerful aeroplane engines used in military machines is an important task of the air mechanic. He has to swing the eight-foot propeller in the front or rear of an aeroplane and jump to safety before its gets into its stride. The slightest slip would mean disaster, for the large blades of an aeroplane propeller turn at a speed of over 1,000 revolutions a minute, and they will cut through any obstruction with the ease that a razor severs a bar of soap.

In the large type of military or naval aeroplanes, which weigh over a ton, air mechanics often have to ascent with the pilot to tend the engine. If the latter proves refractory a descent is made and the A. M. has to get to work with his tools, often within range of the enemy's guns. The air mechanics, as many may imagine, do not keep out of danger well in the rear of the firing line. There are times when they have to make venturesome dashes on a motor repair lorry to assist an aviator who has landed close to the enemy's lines if the aeroplane on such occasions is beyond repair the mechanics have to pull it to pieces and pack it on a lorry, dodging as best they can the shells directed at them from hostile artillery.

Most naval air mechanics are accomplished swimmers and possess a considerable amount of [illegible]. When the navy's great seaplanes are launched the mechanics generally have to wade in to manoeuvre the machine from the shore. To plunge into straight water in the half light of dawn is not a pleasant job, yet it is one which the sailor mechanics have to carry out almost daily. In rough seas the waves break over their heads, and the seaplane they are manoeuvring is tossed about like a cork.—Tit-Bits.

SEVEN MISTAKES OF LIFE.

They Are Summed Up by a Writer of Wide Experience.

"Everyman," writing editorially in the Jeweler's Circular, begins his essay by enumerating the seven mistakes of life, then he treats each individually in paragraphs that are short but right to the point. He declares the following to be the seven mistakes:

1—The delusion that individual advancement is made by crushing others down.

2—The tendency to worry about things that cannot be changed or corrected.

3—Insisting that a thing is impossible because we ourselves cannot accomplish it.

4—Attempting to compel other men to believe and live as we do.

5—Failure to refine the mind by acquiring the habit of reading good literature.

6—Refusing to set aside trivial preferences in order that important things may be accomplished.

7—The failure to establish the habit of saving money.

Was Weak and Run Down.

COULD NOT STAND THE LEAST EXCITEMENT.

When one gets weak and run down the heart becomes affected, the nerves become unstrung, and the least excitement [illegible] of nervousness or utter lassitude. Mrs. J. A. Williams, Tilbrook(?), [illegible], writes: "I cannot speak too highly of Milburn's Heart and Nerve Pills. Captain Pembroke and Mr. Effingham

(By Julius McBride.)

Captain George Pembroke, of the royal engineers, when there were British troops stationed in Canada, wrote his fiancee that he was ordered home to England. The lady, Emily Collins, who was a New Yorker, was somewhat surprised at a request made in the letter that she should sail from that city, meet him in London and marry him there. Miss Collins would have considered this an impertinence, but, reading further, saw that the order was imperative that the officer report at once, and, since a steamer sailed from Montreal the evening he received it, he could not sail with her.

Now, this was all a tissue of deception. Pembroke, ten years before a young lieutenant, had met Miss Collins, a girl of 17, in England; had flirted with her, but the two had drifted apart. After he came to Canada he opened a correspondence with her that led to an engagement. Instead of sailing from Montreal he purposed going across from New York and on the same steamer as his fiancee. Having grown ten years older and raised a full beard, he did not believe she would recognize him. He would endeavor to win her under another name, then confess that he was Pembroke himself.

This was a pretty scheme—that is, if he succeeded in winning the girl away from himself.

When the ship sailed in which Miss Collins was to go to England, Captain Pembroke in mufti, under the name of Guy Effingham, was on board. He was a handsome fellow, of an aristocratic bearing and quite a lady killer. He did not recognize Miss Collins, who had considerably changed, but succeeded in securing some one to point her out to him. An introduction was secured, and the captain and his fiancee were soon sitting next each other on deck in steamer chairs engaged in a desperate flirtation.

The word flirtation is generally used in connection with women, and we do not associate it with persons on the lee side of middle age. But both Pembroke and Miss Collins were flirts.

The night before reaching port while steaming up the channel the captain gave Miss Collins a fictitious account of himself, stating that he was related to a duke; that he had an income of £8,000 a year and was going home to stand for Parliament.

Having thus prepared the way, he told her that the moment he saw her on the day they sailed he knew that she was destined to have a marked effect upon his subsequent life and he had since realized that he was madly in love with her. Then he offered her his heart and hand. She hid her face on his bosom and whispered "Yes."

Pembroke was shocked. It was not that he had won the lady from himself, but that she should show so little sense of honor in thus deserting one man for another. He expected that she would say something about complications with another lover, but she maintained silence on the subject, and he could see no evidence of the slightest qualm of conscience at her dishonorable conduct.

Pembroke, of course, knew where he could find Miss Collins in London, but he asked for her address and when he received it put it carefully in his pocketbook. When they separated it was understood that he should call the evening of his arrival. The final party took place on the upper deck behind a great wind funnel, where there was no one to see. So exuberant was the caress he received that he went away as delighted with his success as Guy Effingham as he was enraged at the treatment of George Pembroke.

"You'll not disappoint me to-morrow evening," she said, "will you?"

"Certainly not. Why do you doubt me?"

"You men are so uncertain. I have known you only 10 days. It seems that my happiness is too intense to be real. I must be dreaming."

"I assure you mine surpasses it."

"Well, then goodby. I shall expect you early."

Miss Collins was to go to London with her people, while Pembroke went alone. On the way it seemed to him that he had been caught in a whirlwind that had turned him not only completely round, but upside down. What should he do? Accept the slight put upon him as Pembroke and give way to ecstasy experienced by Effingham, or, as Pembroke, hurl back the love she had lavished on Effingham? He was not quite sure whether he was a jilted or an accepted lover.

When he went to see her in London he had not made up his mind what course he would pursue. When she advanced to receive him, his heart fluttered. Throwing her arms about him, she looked up into his face with a glad smile and said:

"Oh, George, dearest George, how happy I am to be with you again!"

"George?"

"Yes, George."

"You know"—

"Your personating another to win me again was just too lovely for anything."

"But—how how did you know?"

"Stupid, I recognized you long before you saw me at all."

"Well, well, what a donkey I have been. Do you know I've been half crazy as myself and in the seventh heaven as the other fellow."

"And just think, I have been loved by two different men at the same time. It was delicious."

A Human Life Net.

"There is some soul of goodness in things evil would men observingly distil it out." How much evil marked the daily lives of the actors in the following episode is a matter of conjecture, but they were, says a New York newspaper, denizens of what is called the "underworld."

A lodging house in one of the crowded tenement districts in New York caught fire. The lives of the inmates were endangered, and seven of them, all women, were cut off by the flames. They rushed to the windows and shrieked for help.

Then, to quote the newspaper account, "a crowd of Park row human flotsam and jetsam and boys of the neighborhood bunched themselves to act to break the force of the women's fall and called to them to jump. The drop was more than thirty feet, but all the women made it safely.

"Only one of them needed attention, but some of the men walked away with heads cut by flying heels and backs strained by the shock of the falling bodies. When the reporter spoke to those men of those who made up this human life net said gruffly that they had no names. When they were asked where they lived they would only say, 'Oh, round here.'"

FARM AND GARDEN

CONTROL OF POTATO DISEASES.

(By H. T. Gussow, Dominion Botanist.)

In order to prevent loss and make the cultivation of potatoes more profitable, it is necessary to strictly follow certain lines laid down for the elimination of diseases, when it is reasonable to expect that the diseases will be eventually exterminated or reduced to a minimum. Any objections a farmer may have to carrying out the following suggestions will disappear when he finds from experience that their observance results in a greatly increased yield and higher profits to himself:

DISEASES OF SEED TUBER.

1. The presence of powdery scab shall qualify any lot of potatoes for seed purposes. Powdery scab occurs in the Maritime Provinces; no cases of this disease have been observed west of the province of Quebec. In order to prevent the dissemination of this disease, all potatoes grown in the "infested area" are being officially inspected and certified before shipment.

2. Potatoes entirely free from all diseases or blemishes are the ideal potatoes for seed purposes.

3. When selecting potatoes for planting, all bruised, decayed, externally diseased or unsound tubers should be removed.

4. Tubers showing common scab should, preferably, be all removed. The chances are that scabby seed will produce a scabby crop.

5. After having removed all externally diseased and otherwise injured tubers, the seed should be soaked in bags or bulk for three hours in a solution of bi-chloride of mercury, 1 part in 2,000 parts of water. After treatment, spread out and dry.

6. When dry, cutting the potatoes for "sets" will commence. Provide each person engaged with a potato knife, and keep a number of knives in a wooden pail containing a solution of 1:1,000 bi-chloride of mercury.

7. The stem end of the tuber is the seat of several internal diseases. Cut a thin slice of the stem end of each potato; if perfectly sound and free from brown streaks, rings or spots, continue cutting it up to required size.

8. Discard at once all tubers showing discolouration, when cut as above, at the stem end, and throw out those showing any kind of spotting inside, though the stem end itself may have shown no disease.

9. Having used the knife on a tuber showing any kind of discolouration inside, throw it at once into the disinfecting solution, and take out another knife before cutting up a new tuber. A knife that has cut through a diseased tuber conveys certain diseases to the new tuber, hence it is very important to change the knife after having thrown out a diseased tuber. It is waste of time to cut out brown spots and use the rest of the tuber.

After following these precautions, everything has been done to eliminate diseases conveyed by unsound seed potatoes. The sets are now ready for planting.

DISEASE-INFECTED LAND.

In the case of powdery scab and a number of other potato diseases, the casual organism persists in the soil for a number of years; it is therefore, necessary to avoid too frequent succession of potato crops. Ordinarily, potatoes should not be grown oftener on the same land than every fourth year. Where powdery scab has existed, it is advisable to change to land that has not previously produced a diseased crop of potatoes. The infected land may be used for any other crop with the exception of potatoes.

DISEASES OF GROWING PLANT.

The recognition of diseases noticeable only in the growing plant will invariably be most difficult. Where doubt exists, a specimen showing the suspected trouble should be mailed to the Dominion Botanist for his advice, but, generally speaking, careful attention to the elimination of disease in the seed tubers will have largely reduced the disease affecting the growing plant. Farmers should make it a rule to immediately remove any individual hill that may show signs of yellowing, curling-up of leaves or otherwise feeble growth, as well as any individual plant with flowers of a different color from the rest, in order to keep varieties pure.

SPRAYING.

1. Spraying is practised for two main reasons. First, to control the Colorado beetle; and, second, to control late-blight. There are other minor reasons.

2. Experiments have shown that several solutions will destroy the Colorado beetle, but the solution acting most rapidly is the one to use.

3. Spraying must be done thoroughly. All plants, and all parts thereof, must be well covered. A plant with one half sprayed and the other half unsprayed [illegible] the beetles very quickly. This will leave enough beetles to continue the pest. One spray thoroughly applied is better than several carelessly applied.

4. We recommend two special applications for beetles, one when the plants are from four to six inches high, to be followed by another from one to two weeks later. The interval between the sprays will naturally vary according to the severity of the attack. The solution we use and recommend is made up as follows:

First to the amount of Paris green, 1½ to 2 pounds arsenate of lead to 40 imperial gallons of water.

This solution adheres satisfactorily to the foliage and controls the ravages of the beetle. Spraying will generally commence towards the 1st of July.

5. After the first two applications have been made, we continue spraying regularly every [illegible] weeks, [illegible] using "poisonous" Bordeaux mixture of the following composition:

Four pounds of lime or more, if necessary, 6 pounds sulphate of copper, 12 ounces Paris green, 40 imperial gallons of water.

6. Do not spray on very windy days. Spray early in the morning, or commence two hours before sunset. Postpone spraying in unsettled weather, but spray thoroughly, particularly after a period of rain.

FIELD CROPS AND FARM LAND STOCK

Increase in Most Departments of Stock Shown.

A press bulletin of the Census and Statistics Office, Ottawa, reports finally on the areas sown to field crops for the season of 1915, and of their condition at the end of June. It also gives estimates of the number of farm live stock. The areas sown to field crops, preliminary estimates of which were given a month ago, are now after conclusion of the sowing season definitely reported to be as follows: Wheat, 12,986,400 acres, which is nearly 18 p.c. more than the area sown, and 26 p.c. more than the area harvested for 1914; barley, 1,509,350 acres, compared with last year's harvested area of 1,495,600 acres; oats, 11,365,000 acres, against 10,061,500; hay and clover 7,875,000, acres against 7,997,000; buckwheat, 343,800 acres against 351,400; flaxseed, 1,009,600 acres against 1,163,000; corn for husking 253,300 acres against 256,000; corn for fodder, 343,400 acres against 317,000; potatoes, 478,600 acres against 472,900; and turnips, etc., 172,700 acres against 175,000 acres. In the three Northwest Provinces the estimated areas sown to wheat are 11,244,700; acres to barley, 962,000 to oats, 6,290,000 acres and to flax 1,004,000 acres as compared with the harvested areas of last year, viz., wheat 9,335,400; barley, 930,000; oats, 5,353,000 and flax, 1,157,000 acres. More than half the total area under wheat and 59 p.c. of the area under flax is reported from the single province of Saskatchewan.

Condition of field crops.—Correspondents state that in the Maritime provinces the weather during June was cold and wet; growth therefore was rather backward. The hay prospects were, however, excellent. In Quebec the grain crops were good, but the weather had been dry and cold. In Ontario all crops, especially fall wheat, looked well, but the hay crop was light. In the Northwest provinces the condition of the grain crops continued to be generally favorable. Frosts, however, about the middle of June, caused a temporary set-back. In Northern Alberta there had been too much rain, but in southern Alberta the promise was for good grain crops. Conditions in British Columbia were generally favorable.

Expressed numerically, the condition of principal grain crops continues to be excellent. To wheat rye barley and oats are all assigned points exceeding 90 p.c. of a standard of 100 as representing a full crop. Assuming that conditions up to the time of harvest be fairly normal the indications are the end of June are for yields per acre in excess of the average of the six years, 1908 to 1914, by 16.6 p.c. for fall wheat, 5.5 p.c. for spring wheat; 8.3 p.c. for fall wheat; 7.6 p.c. for rye; 3.7 p.c. for barley and 3.6 p.c. for oats. Not since the present Canadian crop reporting system was instituted in 1908 have the grain crops at the end of June presented so favorable an appearance, and this fact, coupled with the large increases in the areas sown causes the outlook to be highly promising.

Numbers of Farm Live Stock.—It is estimated from the report of correspondents that the numbers of farm live stock in Canada at June 30, were as follows: Horses 2,996,099; milch cows, 2,666,846; other cattle 3,399,155; all cattle 6,066,001; sheep 2,438,662; swine, 3,111,900. As compared with 1914 these figures represent increases of 18,361 horses, 35,624 other cattle and 29,184 all cattle, but decreases of 6,440 milch cows, 19,353 sheep and 322,361 swine.

PANAMA HATS.

How the Colombians Make the Costly Headgear.

The Panama hat industry is constantly growing, and the inhabitants of that country are becoming anxious to protect their expanding industry. Tequilla straw, from which Panama hats are made, is obtained from five or six species of the palm. The most important of these is known as Carludovica palmat, and grows in the warm, moist regions of the Pacific coast of Columbia and Equador, and also in the forests of Peru along the headwaters of the Amazon. This palm attains a height of six to ten feet. The leaves are fan shaped. quilla straw is exported to the United States and other countries where the hats are made by machinery.

The way Panama hats are made in Columbia is interesting. When the palm is about five feet high the most tender leaves are cut and the veins taken out, submerged in boiling water several times and placed in the sun to dry and whiten. Further to whiten the straw lime juice is added to the boiling water. Then the straw is moistened to make it flexible and split with the finger nail into strips of the required width. A bunch of the straw is tied in the middle and placed in the centre of a wooden mould. The fibres are placed in equidistant pairs and weaving is begun in the upper part of the cup and continues in circular form until the hat is finished. The addition of fibers while weaving the crown is carefully avoided, and the number of fibers is increased to make the brim and edge. The beauty and durability of the hat depends largely upon the degree of exactness with which the fibers are interwoven. Once completed the hat is washed in clean, cold water, a coat of gum is applied, and the hat is finally polished with dry sulphur.

A Panama hat of the finest quality is an expensive proposition. To weave it requires from three to six months with, four or five hours of work each day. Two inferior hats of ordinary straw can be woven in one day. First quality hats of Toquilla are sold in the foreign retail markets at prices varying from $25 to $100 each.

The Panama hat is very generally liked in this country, both by men and women. It is expensive at the start, but it is a good laster and becomes quite a substantial friend. It can be cleaned over and over again. But the plain American straw hat, cool and light, retains its popularity, and will continue to be worn as the most advantageous summer headwear for men.

CHERRY JELLY

Clean 2 lbs. cherries and a handful of red currants, and bruise stones and kernels in a mortar; place in small preserving pan with 1 lb. John Redpath's sugar loafs and ½ pint spring-water; boil on the stove-fire about five minutes, taking care to remove scum as it rises; pour into a beaver jelly-bag and filter in usual way. Mix juice with two ounces clarified isinglass, and pour into jars or mould.

Choice Fruit Deserves Redpath EXTRA GRANULATED Sugar

to preserve its luscious flavor for the winter days to come. For over half a century Redpath has been the favorite sugar in Canada for preserving and jelly-making—and with good reason. Because it is absolutely pure and always the same, you can use it according to your recipes, year after year, with full confidence in the results.

Fruit put up right, with Redpath Extra Granulated Sugar, will keep as long as you wish, and when opened a month or a year hence will delight you with its freshness and flavor. "Let Redpath sweeten it."

THE WILD SWAN.

Their Amazing Speed and Endurance in Flight.

It is impossible for one who has seen only the common mute swan floating about in the artificial lake of city parks to imagine the grandeur of a flock of the great whistlers in their wild state. In "Wild Life and the Camera," Mr. A. R. Dugmore says the sight is one of the most impressive in nature. As the huge birds rise into the air it seems as if an aerial regatta were being sailed overhead, the swans, each with a wing spread of six or seven feet, moving like yachts under full sail.

Once the swans are fairly under way their speed is amazing, nearly a hundred miles an hour, and that, too, with no apparent effort, for the slow wing motion is very deceiving. Their endurance is as surprising as their speed, for they are said to travel a thousand miles without alighting.

The flocks are usually led by an old and experienced swan, and it is said that as one becomes tired of leading, or it might be called aerial trail breaking, his place is taken by another whose strength is equal to the task, and so they continue until they reach their destination, the southern feeding grounds of the winter or the northern breeding places of the summer. Occasionally they stop to rest in the region of the great lakes. Not many years ago, while on their way north, a large number stopped above Niagara Falls, and more than a hundred were by some extraordinary mischance carried over the falls and killed in the surging waters.

Whether the swans prepare in any special way for their southward journey is not known, but before starting north they indulge in the curious habit known as "ballasting"—that is to say they eat great quantities of sand, for what purpose no one knows.

In the faraway Arctic Ocean is their breeding place, and it is believed that they mate for life. And with so many of the water birds, the swans protect their eggs with a covering of down scratched from their own breasts, so that when the birds leave the nest the two to six large, yellowish eggs are hidden from the eyes of possible thieves and protected against any sudden change of temperature.

It is many years before the swans are clothed in the feathers of immaculate whiteness that make them such conspicuous objects of beauty. Not, indeed, until the fifth year does all trace of gray disappear. Their first feathers are entirely gray. Gradually they lighten, becoming mottled with white, the neck and head remaining gray until after the body is completely white.

Raspberry Lore

(By Peter McArthur.)

The meanest man in Canada has been discovered, but I dare not give you his name or tell you where he lives, for like all the mean men I know, he is very respectable, and moreover, he is well off, and for that reason his neighbors look up to him. It would never do to cast a slur on so estimable a citizen, but let me tell you what he does. He hires the children in the neighborhood to pick raspberries for him, and it is part of the bargain that they must whistle all the time they are in the berry patch. As he is always within hearing he is able in this way to make sure that they do not eat any of the delicious berries they are picking. Now, what do you think of a man like that?

I wouldn't consider this man so mean had it not been that for some time past I have been trying to determine the origin of the name "Raspberry." The explanation given in the big dictionary is perfectly absurd: "Rasp—with reference to its rough outside—looking like a rasp." What nonsense. The appearance of a raspberry might remind one of a cluster of rubies, but never of a blacksmith's rasp. But philology, or the science of words, is a mere matter of guesswork in many cases, so I feel quite at liberty to guess at the origin of the name raspberry myself.

What does a healthy boy do when he discovers that raspberries are ripe? Anyone can answer that. He comes rushing toward the house yelling "Rah! rah! rah! The rahs-berries are ripe." It's an abbreviated cheer, expressive of joy. Hence rahs-berries is the berry that makes the small boy cheer because of the joy he feels. Do I hear any objection to that? Of course not. Anyone can see that that is the true explanation. Let the makers of dictionaries take note.

And now that I am at it I may as well set the learned philologists right on another point that has to do with the raspberry. They seem unable to decide on the exact origin of the word "jam" as used in raspberry jam. Once more I am amazed at their blindness. Also once more I go to the healthy small boy for my explanation. What does he say when he gets a chance to steal raspberry jam? If you cannot imagine, just use your memory and recall what you used to say. "Yum, yum," of course. With this starter any learned professor will tell you that by the application of Grimm's law, or some similar law, this ecstatic exclamation in time became changed to "yam, yam!" Still later it was changed to "Jam, jam!" and then in the hurry of our modern life was abbreviated to "Jam!" Do I hear any objection to that? It is all as plain as mud. Say, I have a notion to give up farming and go in for philology. The college professors and dictionary makers seem to lack both imagination and knowledge of the small boy.

Now can't you see why I consider the man who makes the boys whistle when picking raspberries the meanest man in Canada? The berry itself and its chief product both take their names from the love for them shown by the small boy. If you do not believe in my derivations just try any healthy boy with ripe raspberries and raspberry jam and see how he will act. If he doesn't say "Rah" and "Yum, yum," he is not a normal boy.

LATIN ECONOMY.

It is Practised There, Not Preached, But is Not Irksome.

Economy, as understood and as practised by Latin nations, is not irksome. It is a limitation accepted in good faith, and managed with such dexterity that, although it may rub now and then, it seldom becomes hard. A year or two ago a writer in the Atlantic Monthly gave a vivid and sympathetic sketch of a French middle-class household, with its assured comfort, its touch of elegance, its carefully balanced expenditure. The picture was as accurate as it was pleasing. A Frenchwoman takes an honest and just pride in making every penny of her money bring its fair equivalent; and she knows that her family keenly appreciates the results of her excellent management. She goes to market. The artichokes are big and green and beautifully fresh. Her husband likes artichokes. Very well, then, there must be no salad, and no cherries. Artichokes represent that day's extravagance, and the rest of her marketing deals with necessaries. It no more occurs to her to buy both the artichokes and the salad than it occurs to her to be sorry for herself because she cannot do so. Her good dinner represents heights achieved, and difficulties overcome. She has wisdom enough to relish the situation, says a Youth's Companion writer. Does an Alpine climber want to be carried in a sedan chair? What charm, after all, encircles the mountain top but the supreme sense of triumph?

A Boston woman, whose daughter had lived for two years in Italy, lamented whimsically that the girl could no longer be permitted to run the house at home. "She did fairly well before she went away," sighed the amused parent; "but now she asks the cook what has become of the other half of the onion, and the cook gets up and goes."

In Italy, where everything can be purchased in small quantities, half an onion looms large on the horizon. If a customer chances to want one egg, she buys one egg. No dealer looks askance at her because she does not take a dozen. If she wants a pat of fresh butter and a tiny flask of cream, she buys them for a few cents, and has the comfort of knowing that both are superlatively good. But no food is wasted, and no one considers wasting as a privilege. You seldom hear economy preached in France, or Italy, or Spain; instead it is universally practised.

Bagdad's Mysterious Scourge.

An uncanny, pernicious pest called the "date boil" scars the face of every human born in Bagdad. Children invariably have this dreadful sore on their faces. Throughout the middle east this mysterious scourge is known by various names—"Bouton d'Alep," "Nile sore," "Delhi button," etc. Its cause and its cure are unknown. First a faint red spot appears, growing larger and running a course often eighteen months long.

White men from foreign lands have lived years in Arabia, only to have this boil appear upon their return to civilization, where its presence is embarrassing and hard to explain. Maybe it was "date boils" that Job had! Once a British consul at Aleppo lost almost his whole nose from one of these boils. Nearly every Bagdad native you meet has this "date mark" on his face.—National Geographic Magazine.

Explaining Gravitation's Law.

If you ask a scientific man why a stone falls to the ground he will tell you that he doesn't know. Not long ago he would have replied that it fell to the ground because the earth and stone attract one another. This is very much the same as saying that an unsupported stone falls to the ground because, as has been ascertained by frequent experiments, an unsupported stone falls to the ground.—Scientific American.

THE POULTRY WORLD

LATE-HATCHED CHICKS.

It is during the heated term, or so-called dog days, that the average beginner has troubles, especially with the late-hatched chicks. The experienced breeder well knows the drawbacks of the heated season and avoids them to a great extent by hatching earlier in the season in order to have the chicks at an age that they can better withstand the heat of summer. Late-hatched chicks under careful treatment can be made profitable, but the important essentials that must be complied with can never be neglected for a day. One reads of the success made with chicks hatched in June and July, but seldom thinks that to attain this success the breeder has left but few of the essentials out, and it is folly to expect that the average beginner can do as well in his first attempt as the experienced breeder.

The average poultry keeper can have a fair measure of success if the following is faithfully carried out: If fertility has been good and chicks hatched now should be strong, but like babies, they must have heat, but not too much. Under the mother hen chicks can to a certain degree seek their own heat, especially if the place where the hen is confined is protected from the direct rays of the sun. But when the brooder is used, great care must be exercised that the proper temperature is maintained and that too much heat is not given. This is no easy matter during the changeable month of June, for one night may be cool and the next warm. A good heat to maintain is 90 degrees for the first ten days, but plenty of ventilation should be provided. Fresh air is essential. Chicks need less heat now than in the early spring. The feed should be good and clean and care exercised that not too much is given, especially for the first ten days. Milk in any form is one of the best feeds for young chicks. Clean, fresh water, not warm, or hot due to the vessels remaining in the sun, is one of the important factors. Overcrowding is an error indulged in by not only the beginner, but many of the more experienced breeders, and is more fatal in summer than in the spring.

The brooder or colony house that raised successfully in the early spring 65 or 70 chicks should not have more than 40 or 50. Lice should be fought. They are worse in summer than any other time of the year.

The essentials for steady growth of the late-hatched chick are clean quarters, not too much heat, plenty of fresh air, good feed, roomy quarters and shade, with pure, cool drinking water. This is the only way to insure success in summer chicks.

THE IDEAL POULTRY YARD.

The ideal plan of yarding fowls is to provide two yards or runs for each house. Sow one of the yards with oats or some other equally quick-growing crop, and the other with a mixture of grass and clover, or alfalfa, if it will grow. Permit the fowls to run on one yard at a time, so as to give the other a chance to become covered with a green crop; that is, when the oats are three or four inches high, turn the fowls in on them, closing the other yard. When the grass, clover, etc., in the other yard has made a good start, turn the fowls in on it, and sow the first yard to oats a second time. By following this plan a constant supply of fresh green feed is ready for the fowls all summer, and they will not have to be supplied with lawn clippings, cabbages, etc., in order to keep them healthy and to prevent their efforts to escape to the outside, where plenty of crisp vegetation tempts them.

A POULTRY ALPHABET.

A utility bird is rarely worth doctoring, the axe being an excellent surgical instrument to apply to sick fowls.

Cull closely, for it does not pay to board idlers.

Good stock is the best foundation, but it must be handled with common sense.

Indolence and poultry breeding make a combination which would bankrupt a wealthy fancier.

Just a little observation will prove that the I-know-it-alls never make successful poultrymen.

Lice multiply rapidly in uncleanly surroundings.

May chicks, pushed to maturity, make fall layers to fill in the time when earlier hatched birds are resting.

No mixed flock can give the satisfaction of a single breed.

One's favorite breed is usually the best with which to win success.

Pullets should be separate from cockerels as soon as sex can be distinguished.

Quickly kill the chicks which are dwarfed or crippled when hatched.

Rush young birds toward maturity if you wish large profits.

Select breeders early and dispose of all other male birds.

Unless you give your flock regular care, they are not likely to return profits.

Very few poultrymen know so much that they can learn nothing from the experience of others.

You are the one who must take responsibility for profit or loss.

GREATER BRITAIN

This War Has Made the Motherland That Indeed.

Great Britain has become Greater Britain indeed. Sikhs and Gourkas are fighting in Flanders; New Zealanders and Australians are fighting Germanized Turks in Egypt; Canadians have won imperishable renown in Belgium; Dutchmen under English colors are fighting Germans in South Africa; and the East and the West are again fighting on the plains of Troy. The Empire is carrying on seven wars at once; on the continent, in the Dardanelles, in the Persian Gulf, in Egypt, in East Africa, in West Africa, and in the Cameroons.

The great financial and economic measures to protect the ordinary life of the nation and to enable England to assist her allies have been perfectly successful, and the daily life of the people seems hardly affected. The streets in the city about the bank and the Exchanges look as they used to look on a half-holiday. The restaurants are only half filled. The smart young men have disappeared, except a few in bandages. One notices that a good deal of French is spoken, and a certain number of French and Belgian uniforms are worn in the streets and that is all.

On the other hand, the British navy has cleared the seas, and has kept open all the great trade routes. It has conveyed armies from the ends of the earth, and the German flag is no longer afloat except upon its navy, which, after all the swagger about "The Day," is still skulking at Kiel, though it is hardly to be imagined that it will not some day, in conjunction with the Zepplins and submarines, make, for the very shame, a great adventure of a raid on England.

What the Kaiser called "the contemptible little army" of Sir John French was first sent over to Flanders, and it was as perfectly equipped. Its fighting was a revelation, and the whole moral effect of its presence was worth twice its number. To-day Britain has about 650,000 men in the field abroad, exclusive of the Indian and colonial contingents, all of whom with all their equipment, were transported across the Chanel with the loss of but one vessel, and, I believe, only a dozen lives; and there are upward of 2,000,000 men still in training at home.—From "Impressions of the English Attitude Toward the War," by Frederick W. Whitridge, in the August Number of Scribner's.

A CUP OF COFFEE.

It Has No Value as Food, but It Has a Stimulating Effect.

The infusion of coffee presents practically very little material that is of direct nourishing value, says a writer in the London Tablet, but by diminishing nervous fatigue, by virtue chiefly of the caffeine present, it may increase muscular power. It is not itself a builder of tissue. The use of coffee after dinner, it is of interest to note, is justified in a large number of cases by the fact of its stimulating effect upon the vital centres, and it is said to serve to some extent as an antidote to alcohol.

It is commonly claimed to remove drowsiness. As a matter of fact, in many subjects it produces drowsiness, but this is usually followed by marked wakefulness. The practice of drinking coffee after a meal for the sake of the stimulus which is experienced has much to be said in its favor dietetically.

There is no reason for supposing that coffee possesses any value as a food. The berry contains a quite important proportion of fatty substances (12 per cent. average), but these are necessarily excluded from the infusion, as, owing to their insolubility, they remain in the "grounds."

According to our analysis, the protein contents of a cup of coffee are small, approximating to 1.25 per cent. of the coffee extracted. This amount can have little dietetic significance. There is also a trifling quantity of sugar present, besides traces of alcohol, which again can possess no importance from a psychological point of view.

Fascinated by His Model.

The weekly meeting of the Married Ladies' Society for the Better Control and Guidance of Husbands had just been called to order by the President.

"Members will now tell their troubles, one at a time," said the chair.

The buzz of gossip suddenly ceased, and all eyes were turned upon the speaker.

"But your husband is not an artist," argued the president. "He runs an iron foundry, doesn't he?"

"Yes'm," said the meek lady, "but all the same he loves his model. You see, he's a self-made man."—London Standard.

Only Something.

"It was real cheap, hubby, dear—only a dollar something a yard."

"How much is "something?" What was the price?"

"It was $1.98 a yard."—New York Herald.

of the Better Grade

There are three outstanding features in the get up of our suits that make for the best "Suit Satisfaction"—they're particularly well made, tailored to fit perfectly and "All-wool Quality". These suits are of the season's most popular colorings, greys, blues and dark browns in neat small checks.

These models are cut in styles to suit the young man and the fuller figure for men. The linings is best serge quality. Trousers have belt loops. Special values at $12.50, $14.50 and $15.00.

MEN'S NEGLIGEE SHIRTS

In White, Cream, Tan and Blue. Algerian Silk and fine corded repps with soft collar and tie to match. Have soft double cuffs. seams double sewn. Sizes 14 to 16½. Special at $1.50.

CHILDREN'S WHITE & COLORED DRESSES—WASHABLE

Pretty plaid ginghams and fancy striped linnenettes in good wash shades of pink, blues, tans, etc. White all-over embroidery and white lawn, embroidery trimmed. All nicely made and well finished. Square and V shaped necks and short sleeves. Sizes to fit the ages of 1 to 12 years. Marked to sell at 50c, 75c, 95c. and $1.15.

EXQUISITE MID-SUMMER WASH GOODS

These are dainty voiles in white, pink and blue shades, the new seed voile and rice voile, crystallines and white repps with woven floral spot in pink, blue and green combination. All these lines are the newest in wash goods for mid-summer wear. Per yard 35c, 45c. and 50c

THE CAMPFIRE AND MILITARY MIDDY

Two delightful styles in these popular middy blouses, distinct and new. The one is pleated, has belt at back and lace strings, and comes in all white. The other has high Military collar in all white, or trimmed with blue and red. Collar will button up or fold down. Prices $1.50 and $1.75.

ENGLISH TAPESTRY FLOOR RUGS

These rugs are of the best grade English Tapestry, imported direct by us and are splendid buying values. Colors green, reds, fawn, brown and grey in pretty designs. Sizes 2¼ x 3, 3 x 3, 3 x 3½, 3 x 4, and 3½ x 4. Prices $7.75, $8.50, $9.50, $10.00 and $11.50.

TWO EXTRA VALUES IN MEN'S NAVY BLUE SERGE SUITS

We call these extra values because we know that they cannot be beaten anywhere. The serge is of extra fine All-wool quality, soft in finish. Not that hard finish that will wear to a shiny gloss. Six months ago we placed a large order for these lines, and in future while we may be able to give you serge suits at these prices, it is very doubtful whether the grade of wool will be as good. They're splendidly tailored and finished. Perfect fitting. Sizes 33 to 46. Very special at $15.00 & $18.00.

End War by Christmas.

Before going to Posen to confer with his generals the Kaiser, it is reported, held a Crown Council in Berlin. The Emperor declared Germany could not undertake to negotiate with her enemies until Warsaw and Calais had been captured. With Generals Von Hindenburg and Von Falkenhayn he drew up final plans to end the war, which, the Emperor said, must terminate before Christmas

Office Positions Guaranteed

30,000 Laborers Wanted.

Following upon the consideration of all available reports on the labor situation as far as the crops of western Canada are concerned, representatives of the three chief Canadian railways, of the Agricultural Departments of Manitoba, Saskatchewan and Alberta, and the Dominion Commission of Immigration, met in a conference in Winnipeg on Thursday of last week, and it was decided that in addition to the labor available in the three Provinces, thirty thousand (30,000) additional farm laborers would be required for harvesting purposes. It is expected that harvesting will be general in Manitoba about August 15th and in Saskatchewan and Alberta about August 25th. The first special train will leave Ontario on August 19, and a half cent rate will be granted from Winnipeg west.

Visiting in Carrick

Mrs George A Myers from Middleport (twelve miles west of Brantford) accompanied by her three boys, Alvin E. Cecil A. and Virgil M. is spending her vacation with her parents Mr and Mrs John Fenner arriving there the 7th of July and intends to stay till the end of August The second Saturday after Mrs Myers was there her husband arrived to see if his better half was still enjoying life, and with him were two of his relatives in the persons of Mr John Deagle and Mr Calvin Hager having got Mr Ben Dixon a farmer near Middleport to bring them up in his auto a distance of 110 miles. On Saturday evening Mr Dixon, Deagle, Hager and Fenner made a trip in the auto to see the county town of Walkerton and on Saturday forenoon Mr Dixon took a jolly group of young folks in the persons of Miss Melvina, Virginia Olive Gress and Mr Edward Fenner for a trip in his auto to a sister of his Mrs Thomas McPherson residing on a farm about a mile east of Dundalk, a distance of 45 miles arriving there at 1 o'clock and you may be sure were ready to supply their bodily wants and after partaking of a sumptuous repast and enjoying a sociable time they left for their homeward journey. The trips were enjoyed very much although they had to pass over some stretches of hill and rough roads especially between Durham and Priceville and they reached home again at 7 oclock. The four autoists started for their homeward journey on Monday morning.--Contributed.

Interfered With Police.
George West and William Klingville, two young men of Wiarton were brought to the Walkerton gaol on Wednesday to await trial on a charge of having interfered with High Constable Ward while in the discharge of his duties.

Prize Lists Printed.
The prize lists of the Pinkerton Fall Fair which will be held on Friday, Sept. 24th; have been printed and are now in the hands of the secretary, Mr. A. Pinkerton. Intending exhibitors can secure a copy with entry form on application.

Local Boy Enlists.
Mr. Gus Jenkins who has been assistant at the Savoy Cafe during the past few months went to Paisley on Monday and was examined, for overseas service and accepted. Gus left on Wednesday morning for London where he will join the base company of the 34th battalion.

Poor Apple Crop.
According to the government bulletins the apple crop is practically a complete failure in Brant, Bruce and Middlesex counties, with only slightly better reports from Huron, where there is a light crop of good quality. There are a few early apples, but later varieties are very scarce.

Took a Stroke.
The many friends of Patrick O'Hagan brother of Dr. Thomas O'Hagan the Canadian writer will regret to learn that he has been stricken with paralysis and lies in a critical condition at his home near Paisley. Early last week Dr. Dwyer of St. Michael's Hospital, Toronto, was summoned to consult with Dr. Houston who has charge of the case.

Formosa Pioneer Dies
The death of Jos. Weller, one of the early pioneers of the village of Formosa occurred in that village on Tuesday of last week after a long illness. The deceased who was 70 years of age was at one time proprietor of the Formosa planing mills and one of the village's most prominent citizens. The funeral was held to the Formosa cemetery on Friday morning and was largely attended.

Notice to Ladies
It has been said in some quarters that the supplies for the soldiers which Mrs. Ramsey is engaged in collecting are not all used for Red Cross work. This is not correct as every sheet, pair of socks, etc., which Mrs. Ramsey secures are sent to the Canadian Red Cross Society at 77 King St. East, Toronto. The soldiers are badly in need of these articles and Mrs. Ramsey will supply yarn free to those wishing to knit sox, and help along in her worthy private enterprise.

Protest Fell Through.
The protest of the New Dundee football club entered against the Mildmay club in which the latter charged with using professional Walkerton players was heard by the W.F.A. on Friday and as was expected fell through, there being no evidence to substantiate the the charge. The Mildmay team has now been ordered to play the final games with Listowel. The first game will be played tonight (Thursday) in Listowel, to which town the Mildmay Club intend running a special train.

Accident at Raising.
A serious accident nearly occurred on the farm of Mr. Ritz, just west of town, on Monday evening, while men were engaged in raising the framework of a new straw shed. A large beam was being hoisted to the upper part of the structure when a pike-pole snapped, and the beam dropped to the ground. Fortunately the workmen were able to get clear of the falling big-stick, the only injury resulting from the accident being received by Mr. Jas. Brunnelspach of Carlsruhe, who had the index finger of his right hand pinched off at the first joint

Office Positions Guaranteed.
The Dominion Government guarantees positions to Nothern Business College. Owen Sound graduates who pass the civic service examinations in May and November. Salaries $500 to $1,200. Ambitious young men and women, having attended high school for a year or more, ought easily to pass these examinations, after taking our commercial and stenographic course for six or eight months. Write for particulars to Northern Business College, C.A. Fleming Principal, or G. D. Fleming, Secretary Fall term opening Sept. 1st.

The Liberal View
The Herald and Times last week took the Telescope to task for publishing the article the week previous in the dropping of the protest, lodged by the Conservatives against Mr. R. E. Truax. We answer our contemporary by reprinting a small article from the Mount Forest Confederate, which in a nut-shell gives the view of the Liberals in regard to the action of the Conservatives:

"The election petition that has been hanging over Mr. Reuben Truax, M. P. for South Bruce, ever since his spectacular election, has been quitely dropped by his opponents, but not on Mr Truax. It went up, being filled with Tory gas about Grit bribery and corruption, like most of the other Tory vaporings about Liberals in this regard."

Died in Saskatoon.
Word was received here last week of the death of a former resident of Walkerton in the person of Thos B. Carlton which occurred in Saskatoon on Monday, August 2nd, following an operation: The late Mr. Carlton had been crippled by paralysis for some years, and underwent an operation in the Saskatoon hospital on July 19th in hopes of being restored the use of his limbs. It was unsuccessful, however, the shock being too great and he passed away on August 2nd, the remains being interred in Bradwell, Sask., on August 4th. The deceased was well known in Walkerton, having for many years owned the blacksmith shop at present run by Jenkins & McCannell and having spent three months of last summer, with his sister, Mrs. Thos. Jenkins. The late Mr. Carlton was 56 years of age and is survived by his wife and five sons and two daughters. Mrs. Jas. McNeill of Brant, is a nice of the deceased.

Band of Gipsies Here
A band of gipsies were encamped on the river bank, back of the exhibition grounds during the past week, and as is invariably the case failed to leave town before getting into trouble. They pursued the usual vocation for a livelihood, that of trading and buying horses and had a large number of equines which they allowed to run at large. A number of them crossed the river and getting into an oatfield of Mr. R. Weiss and did considerable damage. Mr. Weiss complained to Chief Ferguson, but the gipsies paying no heed to his warning and allowed their animals to continue their depredations. On Monday the Chief secured their names and proceeded to take action against them, but on awaking on Tuesday morning he found that during the night they had "folded their tents like Arabs and silently stole away."

Saturday's Sports.
The postponed baseball match played at the exhibition grounds on Saturday, between the Married and single men resulted in a win for the latter by a score of 19 to 10. Although the "Singles" won by a big margin, the married men are not satisfied and have challenged their opponents to another game, which will be played soon and at which a collection will be taken in aid of the Red Cross Society. The teams lined up:—

THE ONLY WAY

In an article upholding local option and setting forth the good results it has had upon the business life of that village, the Paisley Advocate says:—How to dry up the sloughs represented on the scenery of this district by Walkerton, Chepstow, Port Elgin, Elmwood, Eden Grove, Cargill, Wiarton, etc. The one only way of drying up these "sloughs" is the taking of a county wide vote on the Canada Temperance Act, when the majority for the measure in places which are already dry will offset the majority against which is sure to be recorded in Walkerton and other wet centres.

Bowman Trophy Here.
That much-sought-for dish, the Bowman trophy has at last found a resting place in Walkerton, a rink of local bowlers having captured it from Port Elgin in the latter place on Thursday last, by the close score of 20 to 17. The cup-winners were, E. McConnel, H. G. Hunter, T. Pye and O. E. Klein, skip. On Monday afternoon a rink of Cargill bowlers came here with the intention of taking the cup from T. Pye's window, where it is on display but were denied the privilege, being defeated after a strenuous twenty-two end game by a score of 21-16. On Tuesday afternoon the Teeswater rink which had entered a challenge, played for the trophy but failed to lift it, being defeated by the decisive score of 25 to 8. The rinks were:

WALKERTON	TEESWATER
Eidt	Brill
Rourke	Hossenllug
Sieveright	Ferguson
McNab sk 25	McKay sk 8

The next challengers, Arthur, will probably play here on Friday or Saturday

Liberal Sweep in Manitoba.
The result of the election in Manitoba, held on Friday, is a clean sweep for the Liberals under Premier Norris. Only five Conservatives have been elected out of the forty-six elections held, and Sir James Akins, who resigned from the Commons to become the leader of the Conservative party in the Legislature, is defeated. This shows that the party is utterly discredited and all attempts to rehabilitate it in public favor have proved abortive. The Conservative party will have to undergo a term in Opposition to purge it of its sins. The Norris Government has a clear majority of 33 with 4 deferred elections yet to be held, which will add to the number. In the new government there are several men who formerly lived in Ontario, three of whom are known in this vicinity. Hon. Valentine Winkler, Minister of Agriculture was born at Neustadt and spent his boyhood days there, Mr. Winkler is now a lumber merchant and carried his riding Morden and Rhineland by a big majority. Mr. W. B. Findlater who carried the Gilbert Plains riding was raised on a farm in Howick township near the village of Belmore, and Hon Edward Brown, the Provincial Treasurer is also a former Bruce boy having at one time been a store-keeper in the village of Paisley.

HIGH SCHOOL REPORT.

The following pupils of the Walkerton High School have been successful in passing the entrance into Normal. Melinda M. Coumans, Sarah H. Little, Hattie G. Long, Gordon L. Pinkerton with honors, Aileen Pinkerton, Gertrude B. Speiran Grace Van Horne, Charlotte M. Weinert, Jessie M. Wells.

We congratulate these young people on their success.

MARRIED

TIEDE—DUERRER—In Formosa R. C. Church, on Tuesday August 10th, Mr. Edward Tiede, son of Mr. and Mrs G. Tiede, to Miss Ellen Duerrer, daughter of Mr. and Mrs. W. Duerrer, both of Formosa.

TUCKER—WIGHTMAN— On Saturday July 24th, in the Carlton Str. Methodist church by the Rev. R. G. D. Simpson. Ethel Mary, youngest daughter of the late Benjamin Wightman and Mrs. Wm. Moody of Walkerton, Ont, to W. Alexander Tucker, eldest son of Mr. and Mrs. Wm. Tucker of 127 Oakwood Ave. Toronto.

CARD OF THANKS

Mrs. Timothy Foly through the Telescope desires to express her sincere thanks to her friends and neighbors, for the many kindnesses extended to her during the illness and demise of her husband, who passed away on July 31st.

LETTER FROM DR. FRASER

Below we give a copy of a letter just received by Mr. A. Collins from Dr. Fraser which will be of interest to the doctor's many friends. His remarks on the "gas" question should be an answer to the "easy chair" critics who hope the allies will not be so ungentlemanly" as to use anything so cruel.

Somewhere in Belgium.

Since getting your last letter have been looking for a parcel from you but it usually takes a couple of weeks longer. Will let you know when I get it. When your last parcel came I had got down to smoking "Arf a moo" a substance that masquerades under the name of tobacco and cigarettes. As to fillers as you call them, chewing gum is fine. Chocolate is good because I can trade it to Roy for smokes. He is very fond of it. I believe some of my friends are talking about me getting a decoration. Kindly tell them to cut it out. I am not hanging any medals on myself and would rather get a box from you than a medal any day in the week.

I was able to help a friend in need yesterday. The 4th. batt. is bivouacked just beside us and who should come over but Harry Wade, formerly of Walkerton. He had heard I was here. Well, he had an old pipe that would make a good disinfecting plant. I gave him one of mine and some good tobacco and he seemed more than pleased. A young fellow that worked on the C. P. R. bridge at Walkerton was with him, Glazier I think is his name. I met a nephew of old Bobby Cochrane of Durham. You know the old gentleman who comes over with the curlers and sings the song with seven verses. He is with the 3rd field ambulance here. The second and third had a baseball match and Cochrane and I put up five francs on the teams as Walkerton and Durham. Walkerton lost. Strafe them. Had a very interesting talk with one of the airmen who had breakfast with us after spending the night in the hospital He had been over the German lines and had gone back three or four times They seemed very anxious to get him with their anti aircraft guns as they had fired about 250 shots at him and we remarked he would go over once too often. It was at a part of their lines where they do the best shooting. Finally he went over about six o'clock and succeeded in locating one of their heavy batteries which as he explained to us he had been looking for. He was working the wireless and sent a message to one of our batteries about two miles away. He showed us on the ranging map. The first shot went about 250 yards to the left. The second, after he signalled the result of the first fell about 200 short. The third landed right on it. He had first signalled F F which means an efficient hit, but they got him after shooting at him continually. He said he should have been up about 13000 feet but as he was only about six it made it easier The engine was struck but they were able to volplane down and landed in a field quite near the hospital. They hit a cow and the machine went nose on into a hedge. The driver escaped unhurt but "Sparks" turned half a dozen somersaults and lit in the road, bruising his arm but not badly. As soon as the plane struck the tail flew up in the air and the Germans must have seen it for they landed a dozen in at the double right around him None of them hit and the plane was not much damaged. He explained that a squadron is divided into flights one will do reconnaissance work, another to locate batteries, another armed with machine guns will fight off enemy aircraft, etc. He was a most unassuming young fellow and very interesting. He landed near one of our big batteries and went over and apologized to them for landing so close and drawing fire on them. Sir Robert Borden is somewhere in the Brigade area to day. Have not seen him. Had a shake with Dr. Fotheringham of Toronto who was over to-day. He is picking up points for the second division of which he is A.D.M.S., Talk about a deserted village this is certainly one here. Took a walk through it last evening and there are few scattered inhabitants who have good cellars. They shell it persistently and consistently morning and evening. The church as usual is a battered wreck.

You speak of the terrors of gas. You cannot imagine the horror of it. To see them lying in rows, the dead with faces black and swollen, others with distorted and cyanosed faces, tossing and gasping for air drowning in their own secretions, others not so bad but with rales all through their lungs which will never recover their full elasticity. Add to this the smarting of the eyes and the constricted feeling of the throat it is diabolical. It effects not only soldiers but any civilians and even vegetation in the vicinity. The effect of it was felt far beyond our dressing station. Sherman said "War is Hell." The Huns have made it worse. Hell does not

Jocelin's Penance

CHAPTER I.

"I did renounce the world;
Palace, farm, villa, shop;
Its pride and greed,
Trash—such as these poor devils
Have given their hearts to,
All at eight years old."

Brother Jocelin smiled as he traced the letters of the Missal he was illumining, and softly sang King Knut's song—

"Merrily sang the monks,
While merrily rowed the King.
And all the birds did also sing.
And tell their loves
'Twas spring—'twas spring!"

He was low of stature, and dark of eye, with clear-cut features of singular beauty, and his hands were white and effeminate, for Brother Jocelin, as a limner, was free from those menial tasks which fell to the lot of the uneducated monk. He wore the usual dress of the Benedictine—the loose black robe with its obtuse, oval hood and plain scapular; and, as the sunlight streamed upon him through the narrow casement, he seemed to absorb all its brightness; his picturesque figure strangely at variance with its bare environment, for the Scriptorium of St. Edmund's Abbey was scantily furnished with a carved desk and stool and naught else, save a great ebony crucifix on the wall, inscribed, "Beholde my meekness, chylde, and leave thy pryde." As if this monk stood in need of warning against the pride of life, and the rush of warm blood in his young veins.

It was spring, and he was but twenty. When the spring sun shines, and the buds burst forth as if called into being by the birds' songs the hearts of earth's young creatures everywhere expand and throb, and glow in the stir and warmth of Nature's revival. Jocelin was weary of the dim cloisters, of the drone of prayer and chant, and to-day a mad impulse urged him to fling aside his black robe and go forth into the bright world of camp and court; to do deeds of great emprise, to win fame, and the love of some pink-cheeked maid; and to live a man's life in a man's world. His song died away, and he sat idly gazing through the open casement.

The pear trees were blooming in the Abbey garden, and the sunshine seemed wooing each blossom's white breast from beneath its vernal zone. The apple trees spread their lacy boughs beside the delicate pink tracery of the plum. A white-throat chirped her nestlings to sleep in a gnarled oak which stood at the end of the long pleached walk; and the light, filtering through the tender green of young leaves, gold-flecked the stone pavement. Beyond the walk stretched a colonnade extending the Abbey's entire length, and through the arched openings white and black robed monks hurried to and fro, unmindful of the beauty so near. Above all, towered the grim, gray walls of Bury St. Edmunds, with many an arch, rounded belfry, deep-set window and grim gargoyle, massive, stern and strong —a testament in stone of the power of Rome in England.

The Abbey lay along the eastern slope of the town of St. Edmunds, a town of no mean size in itself. Its embattled walls, with four grand gateways, enclosed fully sixty acres, containing many buildings and courtyards besides gardens and cemeteries. The buildings, including three chapels, the Chapter house, the Ambulatory and the Infirmary, huddled about the church, like small children at a mother's knee. Behind these, to the west was the empty house of the Master of Horse; for once the Abbey had maintained several score of fighting horsemen. The humble cots of Cellarer, Seneschal and Clerk were near by, in front of the long, low line of stables along the southern wall; and enclosing a spacious courtyard was Bradfield, "A certain solemn mansion," the residence of the Abbott, and often used by the King himself.

This completed the Abbey settlement, save for a high tower which stood far down by the northern wall, overlooking a forest. It stood there grim and mysterious, with its low, iron-spiked door, widely placed oillets and deep-set, narrow windows high up toward its conical roof. This was the Abbey prison, and (some said) torture house. Dark tales were whispered of it in St. Edmund's town, and the solitary herdsman passing on his way home at twilight, shuddered and crossed himself, thinking its shadow crept over the wall to follow him.

The revenues of the Abbey were great, and her holdings formed a whole county in themselves, yet, insatiable, she stretched her fingers into other Hundreds, and her scattered carucates of land were many, while fifty advocates, or feudal knights, with their hundreds of vassals, did her homage, headed by the renowned Adam de Cokefield.

But it was not of the wealth or greatness of the Abbey, nor of the fair scene before him, that Brother Jocelin thought. He had forgotten it and his monastic life in remembering his early childhood, in St. Edmund's town. The low raftered house of his father, Magister Wilhelm, in the narrow little lane of Brakelond, just outside the Abbey wall, and he saw the long, bare room where his father taught.

Magister Wilhelm was master of the schools, with a few of the Abbey-vassals' sons for pupils, but the school was mostly filled with young indigent clergy, unattached to any monastery, who came hither for the learning for which they were unable to pay.

Such being the general financial status of his scholars, and his allowance from the Abbey being small, it was not to be wondered at that Magister Wilhelm's family were left destitute. When little Jocelin had vainly pulled his father's coat one winter's twilight, and vainly called him to their scanty supper, till the frightened wife had come hurrying in, to find the scholar dead and cold over his Ovidius Naso. Thus the widow of the master of the schools found herself and her small children in poverty, scarcely relieved by a daily dole from the Abbey.

When Jocelin was eight years old, being accustomed to running in and out of the Abbey kitchen for the soup and bread on which they existed, what with having lived among wandering friars, inferior clergy, and the monks of Bury, his head was full of legends of angels and saints. And one night, lying on his little palliasse, he dreamed that Satan, with black wings spread wide, descended before a great stone building to fly off with him. Then he cried to St. Edmund for help, and the good saint appeared and took him by the hand; whereupon the devil flew away. His cries awoke his mother, and she pondered on the awful dream through the night. On the morrow, being a devout woman, she took him to St. Edmund's shrine, that she might pray over him and ask guidance of the monks.

"It was just here that St. Edmund touched me, mother," said Jocelin, as they passed through the Abbey gate. After some talk with the Prior, the child was admitted into the Abbey and left by his mother, as was young Samuel of old; thus, at the age of eight renouncing the world, the flesh and the devil.

"Ah," mused Brother Jocelin, leaning his head on his hand, "such a dream was easily interpreted by the monks. Otherwise, I might now have been bearing arms under Sir Adam, a right valiant squire, instead of dreaming over an antiphonary, and who knows if fortune and St. Edmund had not interfered with my fate, but I might have borne my grandsire's crest upon a knightly shield?"

"But" (hastily crossing himself as he glanced at the crucifix with its warning text), "doubtless the brethren were right. Diabolus, with outspread wings, was the pride of life, the pleasures of this vain world, 'Voluptates, hujust seculi,' which would have borne me—who knows whence, if St. Edmund and the Prior had not made a monk of me!" And he, sighing, laid by his work, for the shadows had lengthened, and ere he had set his painting tray to rights the refectory bell summoned him to the evening meal.

CHAPTER II.

The refectory was a noble wainscotted hall, lighted from above, with a stone bench around two sides. In front of the arched door, above the wainscoting, was a pictured Christ, to which, on entering, Jocelin made obeisance. At the left of the hall was the ambry, where stood the massive golden grace-cup, and nearby was the niche, wherein were kept the ewer and basin in which the novices laved the brethren's hands.

A great table stood in the centre of the room, with a smaller one near the window, through which food was passed from the kitchen. On one side was the Bible-stand where, as Jocelin moved to his place near the head of the table, a blushing young novice was reading the evening lesson in very bad Latin.

Lent was over, and the table was bountifully spread with oaten cakes, wine and huge trenchers full of a smoking stew.

"Made of my pet calf," mumbled John O'Dice, as he shook his white head over the portion served him in a burnished platter. "By our Lady, the Sub-Prior has a most infidel spite at me, Brother Tristian" (this to a little weazened monk, with sallow face and red wisps of hair bristling around his tonsure), "never was special favorite of mine in the cattle pen but that he sendeth it to Richard of Hedman to butcher, an' right glad Ric seems to do it" (scowling at the burly Richard, who sat farther down the board wielding his knife as if it had been a cleaver). Pale, sneering-faced Walter broke in peevishly, "Now, now, John O'Dice, thou'rt ever grumbling at naught. For what dost thou tend the Abbey herd save for the very end which befell thy calf? It makes a savory mess, indeed, and methinks I would scold less or eat less."

These remarks were covered by the drone of the reader's voice, being subdued in fear of reprimand for speaking while the lesson was under way. Jocelin (because he was the Prior's favorite, sat at the Sub Prior's right hand, and though that worthy saw fit to reprove the young monk for tardiness several special dishes were sent him; and indeed there was much passing of food from the Sub Prior's end of the table to the eaters farther down the board.

The meal was presided over by an aged monk, directing the novices in their serving, and when they had passed the trenchers and filled the cups, seated at their own table they supped of what remained in the dishes.

The Sub Prior, a pretentious ignoramus, conversed with Jocelin about the flowers he was painting, frequently confusing their botanical names, and Jocelin answered him absently. But the Sub-Prior was satisfied with displaying his own erudition, and did not notice the inattention. When he had concluded, Jocelin roused himself to inquire about Abbot Hugo, who, grown blind and old, kept his chamber in Bradfield house.

"My young frere, he grows no better," answered the Sub Prior, "and I fear me things fall worse and worse for our house. Debt increases. The Jews refuse to advance more money, save at ruinous rates, and alas, it seemeth to me that those of the Father's household are but flattering time-servers, who beguileth him with lies, profit by his infirmities."

In a lower voice he continued: "We lose our power in St. Edmundsbury—our own Stowe. Ay, by our Lady, 'twas only yestereven when our Cellerarius, trying vainly to collect the reeve-silver, was forced to seize throughout all the town stools, kettles, or household wares, in lieu of the refused reaping penny. And beshrew me an' he was chased, yea, my brother, chased through the streets by a crowd of yelling beldames, who belabored him most soundly with their distaffs. Ora pro nobis! We are coming upon bad times. Twenty years agone their hoary heads would have graced the town walls for such resistance of our Lord's authority. The field-husbandry are short in their rents to the Reve, the dyers and weavers pay but a small tithe of their allotted tax, and even the fund for lighting our holy saint's shrine" (crossing himself as he spoke) "falls short of that of last year. Yea, we are coming upon bad times, as thou may'st see; though certes on thy young shoulders falls little of the burden which resteth on mine!" And the Sub Prior nodded his head, and squared his shoulders pompously, though, in fact, he had nothing whatever to do with the administration of the Abbey affairs; his duties being limited to a certain guardianship of the Scriptorium, and the seneschalship of buttery, kitchen and refectory, shared in common with palsied old Hugh, the third Prior.

"Has Brother Samson not yet returned?" asked Jocelin.

"Yea, the Norfolk Barrator! He lies in the tower where our Lord Abbot hath sent him. Didst not know that he failed in his mission to Rome, and that Geoffrey Ridel hath been given the Woolpit Church. He sits there in foul grace awaiting the Abbott's pleasure, and there are whispers of banishment to Acre."

The Sub Prior detailed this news with peculiar relish, for Brother Samson was unpopular with most of the easy-going, careless monks, being an austere, taciturn person, who exhorted them to less self-indulgence, and condemned openly, as many did in secret, the ruinous policy of the Abbot.

Hugo had tried in vain to overawe this stern critic, punishing him more than once to subdue his haughty spirit. Then, to placate him, he made him Sacristan, and finally Librarian, but Samson, perfect in the performance of these functions, neither thanked him, nor ceased denouncing the bankruptcy of the Abbey.

"A doubtful man," querulously said the infirm old Abbot to the Prior. "Severity cannot break, nor kindness soften him." So they sent him to Rome, and having failed in his mission, he was punished in the arbitrary manner of the times. But whatever he might be to Abbot and monks, he was Jocelin's beloved master, and he received the Sub Prior's news with lowering brow, eating no more of his goodly food. As soon as the meal was over, and the monks had marched from the refectory, singing a psalm, he seized his unemptied cup, and poured the wine into his flask; then placing it with some food in his wallet, he went into the garden. Taking his way furtively in the flower-scented twilight falling about the great buildings (where bats flitted in and out of the turrets, and owls hooted softly from far-off bell towers), Jocelin walked for some time, and then climbing cautiously, mounted the Abbey wall, and, some yards farther, came to the prison. The vesper bell had begun to toll, as he swung himself lightly against the tower, by getting a perilous foothold on projecting stones, aided by a sturdy creeper which wreathed its front, and he at length raised himself to the level of a deep-set, grated window.

"Brother Samson," he called, but there was no answer, save the deep breathing of a sleeper, which told that the worn-out traveller had thus forgotten failure and punishment. Taking the food and wine from his wallet, Jocelin pushed them through the grating, and scrambling down, was soon back in the Abbey chapel, leading the droning vesper chant; his mellow notes rising high and clear above the rougher tones of the brethren in the "Ave Maria."

CHAPTER III.

The inmates of the Abbey, roused from their slumbers by the tolling of bells, were assembled in their various chapels of the Nocturnal service. The rain was falling heavily, drearily, outside, and the drone of the sleepy chanters mingled with the low rumble of thunder. As the last "Kyrie" was sung in the chapel of our Lady, the big Abbey bell boomed out sudden and deep. The praying monks rose from their knees, and stood looking at one another with whitening faces. It was not an alarm, nor a call to the church. Slowly, slowly, it tolled, ringing sadness to every heart, and they knew by its sound that in the stately mansion of Bradfield, the soul of their father-Abbot had passed out into the stormy night.

To one man, far off in the cold darkness of the prison tower, the Abbot's death knell brought many and varied thoughts. Brother Samson had small respect for his superior, for the Abbot was a weak man, of little learning, who owed his Abbotship to the favoritism of King Henry, and who for many years had governed most inefficiently. Samson had no love for weaklings; of Norfolk breed, he was possessed of a sturdy strength of character that no cowl could subdue. Early entering St. Edmunds as a novice, on becoming a monk he had departed to the great schools of Paris, and from thence to Rome, in both centres of learning winning fame for his Abbey and commendation for himself.

At the age of forty-five he had returned, to find Hugo in the place of his friend and master, Abbot Gaunarius, and the Abbey sunk into a slough of debt; deserted by the learned monks he had known, and filled with idle, ignorant men. The buildings were out of repair, many valuables stolen or lost and only half of the Advocates true to their allegiance. The monks feasted and caroused; eating flesh and breaking other rules of the order. Rents remained uncollected; no horsemen were maintained; the whole estate evidencing the direst neglect and abuse. While the Abbot, like a frightened hen in charge of ducklings, tried vainly to rule his idle, rebellious monks finally retiring to Bradfield, whence he held lax sway over the disorganized Abbey. Deeply in debt to the Jews, who were clamoring for their rights at the very gates, the Abbot and Prior signed paper after paper, reduced the living fund of the Abbey, and borrowed more and more each succeeding year.

So while the bell tolled, the Norfolk monk thought bitterly upon these things. "Roger, the Prior, will make such another Abbot as Hugo, and I doubt not it is on him the choice will fall: an' were I out of this vile prison, wherein I am so unjustly confined!—But of the dead naught but good!" he murmured, and checked his angry musings with a prayer for the repose of old Hugo's soul.

Loving his Abbey, and jealous of its fame, of aggressive nature with great executive ability, Samson was feared and nicknamed "Barrator," or, "Quarreler." The monks long since had reached the conclusion, by arguing from occasional empty stomachs and knowledge of the increasing Abbey debt, that if things were allowed to continue on the same basis, no roof would be left to cover them, and, forced to become friars, they would have to wander over the country, precariously living on alms, and the most of them realized that it would take a strong hand and clear brain to set things right. And so already the tide was turning in Samson's favor, when Prior Roger summoned the Sub Prior, Jocelin, and some of the other brethren to the Abbot's house before Nocturnal, with the news that the Prelate was dying.

The origin of the people known as gypsies remains largely a mystery. Egypt, India, Persia and Arabia have in turn been pointed out as their original country, but there is little definite knowledge on the subject. The weight of evidence is in favor of their having originated in India. They first appeared in Europe about 1400 and from the Danube region spread all over the continent, appearing in England about 1520.

A GLARING INJUSTICE.

(Exchange)

Barbers' rates unquestionably require revision. What is needed, however, is not a horizontal change, but an adjustment in accordance with the services rendered. Every bald-headed man, for instance, feels a burning sense of injustice when he pays 25 cents for a hair-cut, and sees the tousled poet or musician in the adjoining chair, whose head is covered with an almost impenetrable jungle, lay down a quarter as the reward of the bold and persevering explorer who had lopped off the tops of the dense undergrowth. It is conservatively estimated that ten bald men can be trimmed in a tonsorial parlor in the time it takes to cut the hair of one football player. If barbers' rates were adjusted scientifically, each customer would pay for his hair cut in accordance with the number of square inches of productive surface on his cranium. As it is, the bald-heads are paying excessive charges for services rendered to other people.

CHURCH IN VACATION TIME.

(Pittsburg Gazette-Times.)

There are two theories as to the policy of the church in the vacation season. One is to shut up shop on the excuse that people won't go to church in summer anyway. The other is to keep open and make the services so attractive that it is bound to bring a congregation. Many ridiculous ideas have grown up with vacation time. One is that "everybody is out of town." The fact is that the vast majority of the people are here at home, right on the job throughout July and August as well as the other ten months of the year. Another is that "it's too hot to go to church." Church attendance in summer is, on the whole, much more comfortable and convenient than in winter, when after wading through snow and slush one too often has to sit for an hour and a half in an ill-ventilated auditorium swapping grip and colds in the head germs with one's neighbors. A third fallacy is that religion is a good deal like an overcoat; to be put away carefully for the summer and brought out again in the fall, if it hasn't been eaten up in the meantime by moths.

A Shot That Made Trouble.

An odd incident happened in the then Danish West Indies in the last century that nearly caused serious international complications. An American marksman, paying a visit to Charlotte Amalia, amused the governor by an exhibition of his skill with the rifle. Sitting on the verandah of the Government House, he said that he could cut with a bullet the signal halyards on the flagstaff of the fort and lower the Danish standard to the ground. As the lines were almost invisible in the distance the governor was willing to bet that he could not do it. The shot rang out, and the flag fell. Presently a horseman dashed up, informing the governor that some one had fired on the flag. There was great excitement. The governor, none too popular, it seems, with the military, ruined his political future by admitting that the affair was a joke in which he connived. Report being sent to Copenhagen, highly colored, of course, by the commandant, his excellency was summarily removed.

A CHINESE TYPEWRITER.

Has Only Three Keys But Can Write 50,000 Characters.

Stenographers may be interested in learning that there is a new sort of typewriter which has just been invented by a young student in the engineering department of New York University. The machine is different from the typewriters familiar to the average operator in several respects. For instance, the "standard" keyboard has twenty-six letters and in most cases about a dozen keys devoted to figures and punctuation marks, while the new machine has 4,200 characters in all and only three keys.

One of the three keys is a back spacer, another the space key and the third is the key with which the 4,200 characters are struck. It is possible, according to the inventor, to make more than 4,200 characters by combinations of "radicals" or base characters. About 50,000 characters can be made by the machine, the inventor says.

That stenographers ambitious to operate the new typewriter will find their task a little difficult at first, at least, was indicated by the fact that it required two hours to write the first letter typed by the machine. This letter contained approximately 100 words, but the operator was unfamiliar with the 4,200 keys.

The machine is said to be the first Chinese typewriter ever invented. Heuen Chi, the student inventor conceived the idea that a typewriter could be made to write Chinese while he was at his home in Southern China three years ago, he said. He went to the United States as a Government student and, on the prompting of Chinese officials who had become interested in his scheme, took up the study of engineering at New York University and continued to work on the invention. He completed the model a short time ago, and has patented it in China and Japan, for it also writes Japanese, which, he said, is quite similar to Chinese.

Pat was employed on an engineering job a few miles out of the city and was carried to his work by an express train, which accommodatingly slowed up near the scene of his labors. One morning, however, the train rushed through the cut without reducing speed, and the superintendent of the job looked in vain for Pat. Pat turned stiffly and, waving his hand toward the steep embankment, sighed:

PESSIMISTS REBUKED.

(Ottawa Evening Journal)

"The art of Motherhood is lost," laments a noted American woman-educationist to the International Purity Congress being held at San Francisco. We fear the good lady belongs to the ever-growing class of invincible pessimists. The art of Motherhood is not lost, in fact we know that it's being improved. Despite the United States with its divorce record, despite the quack moralist grocers of a so-called new but in fact age-old philosophy of society that is vicious, there are more good men and true women to-day than ever before, and Motherhood is as sacred as at any time in nineteen hundred years. And the boys and girls being reared by the present generation of mothers are as strong, mentally morally and physically, as the boys and girls of a decade or a century ago—perhaps stronger.

If the pessimistic lady who believes that we have lost the art of Motherhood thinks differently, let her study statistics of health and infant mortality!

THE GERMAN TRAGEDY.

To those who wish to get an inner sight of the causes that led up to the present war and to get a glimpse of the mental attitude of the Germans we would recommend a perusal of the pamphlet issued by R. A. Falconer, President of the Toronto University. The pamphlet consists of four addresses delivered by him, and is entitled "The German Tragedy and its Meaning for Canada." Mr. Falconer declares that Germany's "real God is Force." This is the keynote or mainspring of all Germany's actions, and is the inner meaning of the present trouble. Under the chapter "The Bearing on the Future of Canada," the author says:

The Canada that will emerge from the war will be a new country. Indeed Canada is changed already. Never in our history has there been such a moral act as the response made by thousands from a sheer sense of duty. Nor has the effect been confined to those who went to the front * * * The message of the supreme and triumphant sacrifice made by the first Canadian contingent on the field of battle has, like a mighty spirit, swept across the Dominion. Heads were bowed in grief and have been lifted again in confidence. * * * It means more to be a Canadian since Langemarck. How much more only the future can tell. Our place in the Empire will be different.

The President by these addresses did much to create and sustain that "moral act." His university and other universities have contributed of their young men perhaps the best that Canada contains—young men who have answered the call of country from a high sense of duty and at an immeasurable sacrifice of all life's prospects. We know not what the future holds for Canada. But we cannot but believe that all those sacrifices in some shape or form will meet with compensation whether victory or defeat is our portion.

WAR AND WAR.

The Philadelphia Record recently made a comparison between the conduct of the American civil war and the present war as carried on by Germany. Germany's methods of making war, including the policy of terrorizing and killing civilians, as in Belgium; the use of poisonous gases, and the savage and brutal submarine warfare against defenceless vessels, have, naturally enough, it says, led to comparisons with the way in which Americans carried on the hostilities during the civil war. Captain Semmes, of the Confederate privateer Alabama, which wrought such devastation among Northern shipping, never sank a vessel without having previously taken off the crews and passengers, if there were any of the latter, in accordance with the rules of international law. On land the same principles prevailed. George Haven Putnam, the New York publisher, in protesting against German methods of making war, has recited his own experience as a Union officer to show that a policy of frightfulness is not justified. In a letter he says:

I was with the troops that in 1862 occupied New Orleans, and in 1864 I was with Sheridan in Virginia. During the last months of the war I served with Sherman's armies in North Carolina, and later as post-adjutant of Savannah.

If our commanders in taking possession of New Orleans or Winchester or Goldsboro or Savannah had deliberately burned great quarters of the towns, had put under arrest as hostages the mayors and groups of leading citizens, and later on, on the ground of straggling shooting by people in the town or in the adjacent districts, had executed a number of these hostages, their action could properly have been paralleled with that of the German commanders at Louvain, Aeschot, Termonde and other Belgian cities. The mere reference to the methods under which these towns in the South were occupied shows the futility of the statement that American troops were behaving at that time as the German armies are to-day.

I myself had occasion, in the Valley of Virginia, acting under instructions, to save houses from being destroyed when the adjacent barns, filled with forage, were burned; but in three years of service I never knew of an officer being called upon to protect a woman against mistreatment by our soldiers.

The same observance of humanitarian principles marked the Confederate side of the war. The New York Globe recalls this interesting episode:

As illustrative of a spirit different from that in control at Berlin an incident of our civil war is most instructive. In 1862, during the Peninsular campaign, when the Union troops were advancing on Richmond, General Rains, who commanded the rear guard of Longstreet's corps on its withdrawal from Yorktown, proposed to plant a number of explosive shells along which the army of the Potomac was expected to advance. General Longstreet, when the proposal was brought to his attention, forbade its execution on the ground that he did not "recognize it as a proper or effective method of war." The case was carried to the Confederate Secretary of War, who upheld Longstreet's decision. Perhaps Longstreet was over-scrupulous, but one cannot but honor the motive inspiring him. Longstreet did not accept the doctrine that a man dehumanized himself when he put on a uniform; did not accept the doctrine that a people engaged in a struggle for existence had a right to do anything.

There is a great contrast between this and the German "frightfulness." Germany has done things in this war that will be an eternal disgrace to her. Much of her frightfulness will have no influence in turning the war in her favor, but it has had the effect of arousing antagonism against her throughout the whole neutral world.

Suffered From Salt Rheum FOR MANY YEARS.

Salt Rheum or Eczema is one of the most painful of all skin diseases, and if not attended to immediately may become very deep seated.

Give the blood a good cleansing by the use of that grand old medicine Burdock Blood Bitters. This sterling remedy has been on the market for the past forty years, and is the best blood cleanser on the market to-day.

Mrs. William H. Fowlie, Cole's Island, N.B., writes: "I have been a sufferer from salt rheum for a good many years, and was so bad I could not do my own work. I tried a good many medicines, but they all failed to do me any good until I tried Burdock Blood Bitters. I had not taken one bottle until I found a great change, and I am most thankful for trying it. I hope that every other sufferer from salt rheum will try B.B.B."

The Kaiser in his saner moments must feel this. Not only has he lost the sympathy of most peoples, but he has forever estranged himself from all his friends and relatives outside his own allies. Had the war been conducted along humane and civilized lines this need not have resulted.

The slaughtering of Canadian war horses assumed such proportions after the spavined and broken-winded chargers collected here at so much cost began to arrive in England that the slaughter-house erected for the purpose became a public nuisance to the English people, says the Montreal Herald. In the Imperial House of Commons, on March 10, the Under-Secretary of State for War was questioned as to whether he was aware that the nuisance caused by the slaughter house was such as to endanger the health of the residents in the vicinity. He replied that it was "a temporary structure, and had to be erected near a good road with as little delay as possible for the reception of horses destroyed on disembarkation from Canada." So Foster's Canadian horses were butchered before they got to the front! What a waste of good money.

THE Changeling

Oh, how could she tell him "No," when every fibre of her heart thrilled with the answer "Yes!" She mistook him—mistook the character of Arthur Carrollton, for though pride was strong within him, he loved the beautiful girl who lay trembling in his arms, better than he loved his pride; and had she told him then who and what she was, he would not have deemed it a disgrace to love a child of Hagar Warren. But Margaret did not know him, and when he said again, "Will Maggie answer me?" there came from her lips a piteous, wailing cry, and turning her face away, she answered mournfully, "No, Mr. Carrollton; no, I cannot be your wife. It breaks my heart to tell you so; but if you knew what I know, you would never have spoken to me words of love. You would have rather thrust me from you, for indeed I am unworthy."

"Don't you love me, Maggie?" Mr. Carrollton said, and in the tones of his voice there was so much of tenderness that Maggie burst into tears, and involuntarily resting her head upon his bosom, answered sadly, "I love you so much, Arthur Carrollton, that I would die a hundred deaths could that make me worthy of you, as not long ago I thought I was. But it cannot be. Something terrible has come between us."

"Tell me what it is. Let me share your sorrow," he said; but Maggie only answered, "Not yet, not yet. Let me live where you are a little longer. Then I will tell you all, and go away forever."

This was all the satisfaction he could obtain; but after a time she promised that if he would not mention the subject to her until the first of June, she would then tell him everything; and satisfied with a promise which he knew would be kept, Mr. Carrollton waited impatiently for the appointed time, while Maggie, too, counted each sun as it rose and set, bringing nearer and nearer a trial she so much dreaded.

CHAPTER XX.

Two days only remained ere the first of June, and in the solitude of her chamber, Maggie was weeping bitterly. "How can I tell them who I am?" she thought. "How bear their pitying scorn when they learn that she whom they call Maggie Miller has no right to that name?—that Hagar Warren's blood is flowing in her veins—and Madam Conway thinks so much of that! Oh, why was Hagar left to do me this great wrong? Why did she take me from the pine-board cradle, where she says I lay, and make me what I was not born to be?" and falling on her knees the wretched girl prayed that it might prove a dream, from which she would ere long awake.

Alas for thee, poor Maggie Miller! It is not a dream, but a stern reality, and you who oft have spurned at birth and family, why should you murmur now when both are taken from you? Are you not still the same, beautiful, accomplished and refined, and can you ask for more. Strange that theory and practice so seldom accord. And yet it was not the degradation which Maggie felt so keenly, it was rather the loss of love she feared; and without that, the blood of royalty could not avail to make her happy.

Maggie was a warm-hearted girl, and she loved the stately lady she had been wont to call her grandmother with a filial, clinging love, which could not be severed, and still this love was naught compared to what she felt for Arthur Carrollton, and the giving up of him was the hardest part of all. But it must be done, she thought; he had told her once that were she Hagar Warren's grandchild, he should not be riding with her—how much less, then, would he make that child his wife! and rather than meet the look of proud disdain his face would wear, when first she stood confessed before him, she resolved to go away where no one had ever heard of her or Hagar Warren. She would leave behind a letter telling why she went, and commending to Madam Conway's care poor Hagar, who had been sorely punished for her sin. "But whither shall I go, and what shall I do when I get there?" she cried, trembling at the thoughts of a world of which she knew so little. Then, as she remembered how many young girls of her age went out as teachers, she determined to go at all events. "It will be better than staying here where I have no claim," she thought, and nerving herself for the task, she sat down to write the letter, which, on the first of June, should tell to Madam Conway and Arthur Carrollton the story of her birth.

It was a harder task than she supposed—writing that farewell; for it seemed like severing every hallowed tie. Three times she wrote, "My dear grandma," then with a throb of anguish she dashed her pen across the revered name, and wrote simply, "Madam Conway." It was a rambling, impassioned letter, full of tender love—of hope destroyed—of deep despair—and though it shadowed forth no expectation that Madam Conway or Mr. Carrollton would ever take her to their hearts again, it begged of them most touchingly to think sometimes of "Maggie," when she was gone forever. Hagar was then commended to Madam Conway's forgiveness and care. "She is old," wrote Maggie, "her life is nearly ended, and if you have in your heart any feeling of pity for her who used to call you grandma, bestow it, I pray you, on poor old Hagar Warren."

The letter was finished, and then suddenly remembering Hagar's words, that "all had not been told," and feeling it her duty to see once more the woman who had brought her so much sorrow, Maggie stole cautiously from the house, and was soon walking down the woodland road, slowly, sadly, for the world had changed to her since she last trod that path. Maggie, too, was changed, and when at last she stood before Hagar, who was now able to sit up, the latter could scarcely recognize in the pale, haggard woman the blooming, merry-hearted girl once known as Maggie Miller.

"Margaret," she cried, "you have come again—come to forgive your poor old grand—— No, no," she added, as she saw the look of pain flash over Maggie's face, "I'll never insult you with the name. Only say that you forgive me, will you, Miss Margaret?" and the trembling voice was choked with sobs, while the aged form shook as with a palsied stroke.

Hagar had been ill. Exposure to the damp air on that memorable night had brought on a second severe attack of rheumatism, which had bent her nearly double. Anxiety for Margaret, too, had wasted her to a skeleton, and her thin, sharp face, now of a corpse-like pallor, contrasted strangely with her eyes, from which the wildness all was gone. Touched with pity, Maggie drew a chair to her side, and thus replied: "I do forgive you, Hagar, for I know that what you did was done in love; but by telling me what you have, you've ruined all my hopes of happiness. In the new scenes to which I go, and the new associations I shall form, I may become contented with my lot, but never can I forget that I once was Maggie Miller."

"Margaret," gasped Hagar, and in her dim eye there was something of its olden fire, "if by new associations you mean Henry Warner, it must not be. Alas, that I should tell you this, but Henry is your brother—your father's only son. Oh, horror, horror!" and dreading what Margaret would say she covered her face with her crumpled distorted hands.

But Margaret was not so much affected as Hagar had anticipated. She had suffered severely, and could not now be greatly moved. There was an involuntary shudder, as she thought of her escape, and then her next feeling was one of satisfaction in knowing that she was not quite friendless and alone, for Henry would protect her, and Rose, indeed, would be to her a sister.

"Henry Warner my brother!" she exclaimed. "How came you by this knowledge?" And very briefly Hagar explained to her what she knew, saying that Hester had told her of two young children, but she had forgotten entirely their existence, and now that she was reminded of it, she could not help fancying that Hester said the step-child was a boy. But the peddler knew, of course, and she must have forgotten.

"When the baby they thought you died," said Hagar, "I wrote to the minister in Meriden, telling him of it, but I did not sign my name, and I thought that was the last I should ever hear of it. Why don't you curse me?" she continued. "Haven't I taken from you your intended husband, as well as your name?"

Maggie understood perfectly now why the secret had been revealed, and involuntarily she exclaimed: "Oh, had I told you first this never need have been"; and then hurriedly she explained to the repentant Hagar how at the very moment when the dread confession was made, she, Maggie Miller, was free from Henry Warner.

From the window Maggie saw in the distance the servant who had charge of Hagar, and dreading the presence of a third person, she arose to go. Offering her hand to Hagar, she said: "Good-by. I may never see you again, but if I do not, remember that I forgive you freely."

"You are not going away, Maggie. Oh, are you going away?" and the crippled arms were stretched imploringly toward Maggie, who answered: "Yes, Hagar, I must go. Honor requires me to tell Madam Conway who I am, and after that, you know I cannot stay. I shall go to my brother."

Three times old Hagar essayed to speak, and, at last, between a whisper and a moan, she found strength to say: "Will you kiss me once, Maggie, darling? 'Twill be something to remember in the lonesome nights when I am all alone. Just once, Maggie. Will you?"

Maggie could not refuse, and gliding to the bowed woman's side, she put back the soft hair from off the wrinkled brow, and left there token of her forgiveness.

The last May sun had set, and ere the first June morning rose Maggie Miller would be nowhere found in the home her presence had made so bright. Alone, with no eye upon her save that of the Most High, she had visited the two graves, and while her heart was bleeding at every throb, had wept her last adieu over the sleeping dust so long held sacred as her mother's. Then kneeling at the other grave, she murmured, "Forgive me, Hester Hamilton, if in this parting hour my heart clings most to her whose memory I was first taught to revere; and if in the better world you know and love each other, oh, will both bless and pity me, poor, wretched Maggie Miller!"

Softly the night air moved through the musical pine, overshadowing the humble grave, while the moonlight, flashing from the tall marble, which stood a sentinel over the other mound, bathed Maggie's upturned face as with a flood of glory, and her throbbing heart grew still as if, indeed, at that hushed moment the two mothers had come to bless their child. The parting with the dead was over, and Margaret sat again in her room, waiting until all was still about the old stone house. She did not add to her letter another line telling of her discovery, for she did not think of it; her mind was too intent upon escaping unobserved; and when sure the family had retired, she moved cautiously down the stairs, noiselessly unlocked the door, and without once daring to look back, lest she would waver in her purpose, she went forth, heartbroken and alone, from what for eighteen happy years had been her home. Very rapidly she proceeded, coming at last to an open field through which the railroad ran, the depot being nearly a quarter of a mile away. Not until then had she reflected that her appearance at the station at that hour of the night would excite suspicion, and she was beginning to feel uneasy when suddenly around a curve the cars appeared in view. Fearing lest she should be too late, she quickened her footsteps, when to her great surprise she saw that the train was stopping! But not for her they waited. In the bright moonlight the engineer had discovered a bed-lying across the track and had stopped the train in time to save the life of the man, who, stupefied with drunkenness, had fallen asleep. The movement startled the passengers, many of whom alighted and gathered around the inebriate.

In the meantime, Margaret had come near, and knowing she could not reach the depot in time, she mingled unobserved in the crowd, and, entering the rear car, took her seat near the door. The train at last moved on, and as at the station no one save the agent was in waiting, it is not strange that the conductor passed unheeded the veiled figure which in the dark corner sat ready to pay her fare.

"He will come to me by and by," thought Maggie, but he did not, and when Worcester was reached she was still debtor to the Boston & Albany Railroad for the sum of seventy cents. Bewildered and uncertain what to do next, she stepped upon the platform, deciding finally to remain at the depot until morning, when a train would leave for Leominster, where she confidently expected to find her brother. Taking a seat in the ladies' room, she abandoned herself to her sorrow, wondering what Theo would say could she see her then. But Theo, though dreaming, it may be of Maggie, dreamed not that she was near, and so the night wore on, Margaret sleeping toward daylight, and dreaming, too, of Arthur Carrollton, who she thought had followed her—nay, was bending over her now and whispering in her ear, "Wake, Maggie, wake!"

Starting up, she glanced anxiously round, uttering a faint cry when she saw that it was not Arthur Carrollton, but a dark, rough-looking stranger, who rather rudely asked "where she wished to go?"

"To Leominster," she answered, turning her face fully toward the man, who became instantly respectful, telling her when the train would leave, and saying that she must go to another depot, at the same time asking her if she had not better wait at some hotel.

But Maggie preferred going at once to the Fitchburg depot, which she accordingly did, and drawing her veil over her face, lest some one of her few acquaintances in the city should recognize her, she sat there until the time appointed for the cars to leave. Then, weary and faint, she entered the train, her spirits in a measure rising as she felt that she was drawing near to those who would love her for what she was and not for what she had been. Rose would comfort her, and already her heart bounded with the thought of seeing one who she believed was her brother's wife, for Henry had written that ere this his homeward voyage was made, Rose would be his bride.

Ah, Maggie! there is for you a greater happiness in store—not a brother, but a sister—your father's child is there to greet your coming. And even at this early hour her snow-white fingers are arranging the fair June blossoms into bouquets, with which she adorns her house, saying to him who hovers at her side, "that somebody, she knows not whom, is surely coming there to-day"; and then, with a blush stealing over her cheek, she adds: "I wish it might be Margaret"; while Henry, with a peculiar twist of his comical mouth, winds his arm around her waist, and playfully responds, "Any one save her."

CHAPTER XXI.

On a cool piazza overlooking a handsome flower garden, the breakfast table was tastefully arranged. It was Rose's idea to have it there, and in her cambric wrapper, her golden curls combed smoothly back, and her blue eyes shining with the light of a new joy, she occupies her accustomed seat beside one who for several happy weeks has called her his, loving her more and more each day, and wondering how thoughts of any other could ever have filled his heart. There was much to be done about his home, so long deserted, and as Rose was determined upon a trip to the seaside, he had made arrangements to be absent from his business for two months or more, and was now enjoying all the happiness of a quiet, domestic life, free from care of any kind. He had heard of Maggie's illness, but she was better now, he supposed, and when Theo hinted vaguely that a marriage between her and Arthur Carrollton was not at all improbable, he hoped it would be so for the Englishman, he knew, was far better adapted to Margaret than he had ever been. Of Theo's hints he was speaking to Rose, as they sat together at breakfast, and she had answered, "It will be a splendid match," when the door-bell rang, and the servant announced: "A lady in the parlor, who asked for Mr. Warner."

"I told you some one would come," said Rose; "do pray see who it is. How does she look, Janet?"

"Tall, white as a ghost, with big, black eyes," was Janet's answer; and with his curiosity awakened, Henry Warner started for the parlor, Rose following on tiptoe, and listening through the half-closed door to what their visitor might say.

Margaret had experienced no difficulty in finding the house of Mrs. Warner, which seemed to her a second Paradise, so beautiful and cool it looked, nestled amid the tall, green forest trees. Everything around it betokened the fine taste of its occupants, and Maggie, as she reflected that she, too, was nearly connected with this family, felt her wounded pride in a measure soothed, for it was surely no disgrace to claim such people as her friends. With a beating heart, she rang the bell, asking for Mr. Warner, and now, trembling in every limb, she awaited his coming. He was not prepared to meet her, and at first he did not know her she was so changed; but when, throwing aside her bonnet, she turned her face so the light from the window opposite shone fully upon her, he recognized her in a moment, and exclaimed, "Margaret, Margaret Miller! why are you here?"

The words reached Rose's ear, and darting forward, she stood within the door, just as Margaret, staggering a step or two toward Henry, answered passionately, "I have come to tell you what I myself but recently have learned;" and wringing her hands despairingly, she continued: "I am not Maggie Miller. I am not anybody. I am Hagar Warren's grandchild, the offspring of her daughter and your own father! Oh, Henry, don't you see it? I am your sister. Take me as such, will you? Love me as such, or I shall surely die. I have nobody now in the wide world but you. They are all gone all—Madam Conway, Theo, too, and—and——" She could not speak that name. It died upon her lips, and tottering to a chair she would have fallen had not Henry caught her in his arms.

Silver Fox Fur.

The black silver fox fur is most valuable when there is no silver in it—when it is a pure rich black throughout. A dressed skin of this sort averages 30 by 10 inches and will easily bring $3,500. A good silvery skin, clear and pure in color, with bluish underwool, is worth about $2,000.

Jeroboam Leads Israel Into Sin.—1 Kings 12: 25-33.

Commentary.—I. Jeroboam's fear (vs. 25-27). 25. built Shechem—Jeroboam selected Shechem as the capital of his kingdom. He erected buildings necessary for that purpose and fortified the city. The location was favorable, being central, and the place had many historic events clustering about it. Abraham pitched his tent there upon entering Canaan for the first time. There Jacob bought a portion of land, which he gave to Joseph. Shechem was situated between Gerizim and Ebal from which blessings and curses, respectively, were pronounced upon Israel. It was one of the six cities of refuge. There Joshua gathered the people shortly before his death and delivered to them his parting words. At Shechem all Israel assembled to receive Rehoboam as king, but upon his failure to yield to reasonable demands ten tribes went over to Jeroboam. A few years later the king removed his capital to Tirzah, a place a little north of Shechem. Mount Ephraim—In the hill country, or upon the mountainous ridge which extends for fifty miles north and south through the central part of Palestine Jeroboam belonged to the tribe of Ephraim. went out from thence—With Shechem as a fortified centre, he built other fortifications at important points to keep out his enemies. built Penuel—This is the Peniel of Genesis 32:24-32 and means "face of God." It was here that Jacob wrestled all night with the angel of God and gained the victory, his name being changed from Jacob to Israel. Penuel was situated on the River Jabbok, about twenty miles east of where it flows into the Jordan. It was fortified to protect the kingdom from Assyrian invasion, since Penuel was on the great caravan road to the East.

26. Jeroboam said in his heart—He said one thing in his heart and quite another to his people. It is no uncommon thing for one to say in his heart what he would not for the world say to others. We are judged by men largely by what we say with our lips, but God judges us by what we say in our hearts. kingdom return—The king realized that the people who had so eagerly pledged allegiance to him were liable to forsake him and return to the kingdom from which they revolted, should some provocation arise. He knew the temper of his people, and as a sagacious ruler he foresaw what might occur. 27. if this people .... sacrifice.... at Jerusalem—Jeroboam recognized the fact that the tribes that had seceded and come over to him had not in so doing forsaken the God and the religion of their fathers. They would continue to worship the God of Israel, and Jerusalem was the true centre of that worship. He was wise enough not to attempt to establish at once a new religion although he knew that the repeated visits of his people to Jerusalem for worship as the law required (Deut. 16:16) would be likely to win them back to the parent kingdom. The religious instinct in man is deep-seated, and is easily able to overcome even national and patriotic considerations. Their lord....Rehoboam—This was a confession that Rehoboam was their lawful sovereign. Jeroboam felt that his hold upon the people was at best insecure. shall kill me—Jeroboam was influenced in his course by fear for his personal safety as well as by his ambition.—In comparing the motives which actuated the two kings but little difference is found. Both seem to have been moved by selfish impulses. The true welfare of their respective peoples was disregarded.

II. Idolatry introduced (vs. 28-30.) 28. Took counsel—He surely did not take counsel of God. In such an important matter he wished others to share the responsibility, and consulted those who were his supporters in the kingdom. It is a fatal mistake to leave God out of one's counsels. Made two calves of gold—It is worthy of note that the images made by Jeroboam were like that made by Aaron in the wilderness (Exod. 32: 4.) Both men were familiar with the image of the ox from their acquaintance with the religion of Egypt, and Jeroboam may have been influenced by that knowledge in making the golden calves. It is more probable that the golden calves were suggested by the oxen in the temple upon which rested the molten sea. It is too much for you to go up to Jerusalem—Jeroboam desired to make the people feel that he was acting in their interest, and wished to make religion convenient. If this had been his real motive, his sin would have been great, for whoever makes his religion a matter of convenience loses sight of the nature of true religion. The real object, however, of setting up the golden calves was to keep his people from going to Jerusalem, fearing that in associating with the people of Judah they might be inclined to turn from him and go over to Rehoboam. Behold thy gods. Jeroboam was far from being a deeply religious man, and he doubtless believed that the people would worship the true God, while considering the golden calf as a mere symbol of the divine presence. We observe that he used the exact words spoken by Aaron more than five hundred years before (Exod. 32: 4).

29. In Bethel, Dan—Bethel means "house of God." It was a sacred place. Abraham had built an altar there (Gen. 12: 8); there Jacob saw his vision and gave the place its name (Gen. 28: 11-19), the ark of God was at one time stationed at Bethel (Judg. 20: 18, R. V.) and there Samuel judged Israel (1 Sam. 7: 16.) The city was situated about fifteen miles north of Jerusalem, and was in the southern part of Jeroboam's kingdom. Dan lay in the extreme northern part thus giving all the people of the northern kingdom easy access to one or the other of these shrines. Dan had also a history as a religious centre. An idolatrous graven image had been set up and was presided over by descendants of Moses (Judg. 18: 27-30.) 30. Became a sin. Whatever may have been the design of Jeroboam, the outcome was such as might reasonably have been expected. The worship at these shrines became idolatrous, and both the first and the second commandments were broken. Even unto Dan—It is probable that, since Bethel was so well known and easy of access, it was not considered necessary to mention that place, and it is stated definitely that the people went to Dan, which was far away.

III. God's Laws broken (vs. 31.33). 31. House of high places—It was customary to erect idolatrous shrines upon the tops of hills. Jeroboam built a house of worship at Bethel and one at Dan, while God had declared that the temple at Jerusalem was the true place of worship. Lowest of the people—"Among all the people."—R. V. Instead of employing the Levites as priests according to God's arrangement, Jeroboam took any that pleased him for the purpose. The Levites would not wish to officiate at idolatrous altars and went in large numbers to Rehoboam's kingdom. 32. Feast in the eighth month—The king wished to provide a feast for his people to correspond to the feast of Tabernacles, but in order to make it unlike that feast he appointed it in the eighth month instead of the seventh. He offered upon the altar—Either personally or through the priests of his own appointing he sacrificed to the golden calves of his own making. 33. Devised of his own heart—The king left God out of his counsels. He "said in his heart" (v. 26), and "devised of his own heart" an order of worship which was not pleasing to the Lord.

Questions.—What cities did Jeroboam build, and why? What did the king say in his heart? What is meant by the house of David? At what cities did Jeroboam establish places of worship? What reason did he give for setting up the golden calves in those places? What was the real reason for appointing those two places of worship? Whom did he make priests? What feast did he appoint, and how did it differ from the feast in Judah? What commandment did Jeroboam violate? What warning was sent to him?

PRACTICAL SURVEY.

Topic.—Jeroboam's policy.

I. Caused a breach in national unity.
II. Led to a violation of divine law.

I. Caused a breach in national unity. Jeroboam's policy perpetuated and multiplied in Israel the evils of which the rending of the kingdom had at first been the penalty. The ordained and fully deserved penalty of Solomon's transgression was the placement of another than his son upon the throne of a divided kingdom. Seated at last on his throne, Jeroboam was face to face with the opportunity of his life. It was a decisive hour in the young ruler's career. His future and the fate of a kingdom hung in the balance. With his great opportunity before him Jeroboam failed. Lawless ambition became his ruin. His attempt to sever the sacred bond that held the people of the whole nation in one common allegiance to the temple and God was wholly evil. He reasoned that it was necessary to isolate the nation religiously as well as governmentally. Having adopted his policy, Jeroboam had to devise suitable means for carrying out the same. In his procedure he ignored the universal law of consequences, of cause and effect. Four important measures received his immediate attention, a capital, a plan of worship, a festival and a priesthood. Having fortified some of the chief cities of his realm, Jeroboam set to work to create public sentiment favorable to his scheme, which led to a division in the Jewish church. His policy revealed his utter distrust of God. He took advantage of the jealousy of the tribes. He hid his zeal for his own safety under the plea of seeking the comfort and convenience of the people. He acted craftily upon the religious sentiments of the people, to serve his own ambitious designs. He took advantage of the sacred associations of Bethel and Dan. In every step Jeroboam took he was sealing his own doom and that of his people.

II. Led to a violation of divine law. God had ordained that there should be one sanctuary for the whole nation. Jeroboam knew that and also that the division of the kingdom was to make no difference as to the oneness or the position of the sanctuary. He was repeatedly reminded that Jerusalem was the one place of incense and sacrifice. He ignored the living God as a factor in consolidating his kingdom. Recognizing as he did the religious tendencies of his people, he foresaw that the national assemblies for worship in the temple at Jerusalem would eventually reunite the twelve tribes under one king. To suit the exigencies of the case, God's ordinances were overturned, other places of worship were set up, the commandment against image worship was broken, the national connection with the religion which God had ordained was broken off. Herein was his fatal mistake. True policy would have been to have left matters of religion unchanged. Jeroboam had been called to the throne for political purposes. He made use of the church to serve his political ambitions. He did not openly reject Jehovah, but he corrupted his worship. It was probably his boast that he with the people worshipped the one true God in a more rational and primitive way. Devices to lighten the stress of duty and to give a liberal interpretation to moral obligations became popular. The introduction of old errors indulged their idolatrous propensities. A servile priesthood aided in accomplishing the enslavement of the people. The one centre of unity gave place to three centres of division. The one ritual of divine obligation was travestied by rites and cermonies of human appointment. The one feast of Tabernacles, appointed of God, was supplanted by a feast devised by man. That feast, the most joyous of the year, had once been the greatest manifestation of religious unity which Israel afforded. Jeroboam made a rival feast. The worship of the people was a matter of greatest concern in the establishment of his kingdom. The ten tribes must be brought to renounce Jerusalem as the only place of acceptable worship. They must be persuaded to accept a new order of priests if the division of the kingdom continued. Under his pretense to reestablish the old worship Jeroboam was able to conciliate those who were proud of past history. His policy was shrewd and sinful. He used his authority for the furtherance of ungodliness. He placed politics before religion. He chose convenience instead of duty.—T. R. A.

Beginning of English Snuff Taking.

The battle of Vigo Bay, fought in 1702, led to the adoption of the snuff taking habit in England. After defeating the combined French and Spanish fleets, Sir George Rooke, the English commander, sacked the town of Vigo, the booty including several thousand barrels of the finest snuff. Although smoking was then firmly established in England snuff was almost unknown, but when this enormous quantity was thrown on the market at a low price it was bought out of curiosity by all sorts and conditions of men. The novelty caught on so well that for the next 100 years the English snuffed far more tobacco than they smoked.—London Chronicle.

"The War Summary"

Almost from the very day the great European war began in August last, the outstanding feature in Canadian journalism covering the conflict has been "The War Summary" daily on pages 1 and 2 of THE GLOBE. In the concisest possible form the writer has given his readers a pen picture of the developments in all parts of the world. While the details of the movements along the extended frontiers have not been overlooked, the readers of THE GLOBE have been enabled to follow intelligently and with confidence the general outlines of the stupendous conflict. "The War Summary" of THE GLOBE is reproduced daily by several papers throughout the Dominion.

The Editorial Page

THE GLOBE on its editorial page has striven to place before the public in proper perspective the broad background of the titanic struggle. This series of articles has attracted the attention not only of the Canadian people, but of leading men and journals in all parts of the world. The causes leading up to the war, the elements entering into its conduct, and the results likely to flow from the cessation of hostilities have been dealt with in that bold and clear-cut form characteristic of THE GLOBE'S editorial page.

News Service

The above features, in addition to a cable and letter service from the front unmatched in Canada, have placed THE GLOBE far in the lead of Canadian papers, and partly explain the phenomenal increase of 33 1-3 per cent. in THE GLOBE'S circulation during recent months.

Other Features

The sporting pages, the financial and commercial pages, the woman's pages, etc., etc., with the additional pages in Wednesday's issue devoted to "Farm and Country Life," are maintained at a high standard of excellence, a standard that has justified THE GLOBE in its title of Canada's National Newspaper, and has given it by many thousands the largest circulation of any morning paper in the Dominion.

Local and City Papers

By all means take your local paper, but in the field of metropolitan newspapers THE GLOBE unquestionably offers you the greatest value to be had in Canada. Order it to-day. 25 cents per month—one dollar for four months—three dollars per year.

P.S.—According to Lord Kitchener, the big war has only begun.

A German Prince, probably a son of the Kaiser, will be named Governor of Poland.

Since the slump in the west came and war broke out, Medicine Hat, Alta., has lost a third of its population.

Rain beating on the windshield caused the automobile accident at Muskoka, in which five Toronto people were drowned, according to Mr. John Clarke, the driver, who said he could not see his way across the curved bridge.

The loss of Warsaw had long been discounted in Petrograd and it caused no excitement. The newspapers commented on the fall of the Polish capital without emotion, referring with regret to its loss as a necessity and which is regarded by them as being only temporary.

THE MANITOBA ELECTION

The victory of the Norris Government in Manitoba was generally expected, nor is it surprising that it was overwhelming. When the people decide upon a change, after such revelations as were made in Manitoba a few months ago, they usually do the job thoroughly and in such a manner as will leave no doubt as to their intentions.

The reorganization of the Conservative party, while necessary, could not be expected to have any effect upon the election. A political party must pay the penalty of bad leadership. In cannot restore confidence merely by changing the leader and passing some good resolutions. The party system involves party responsibility, and this means that when the leaders do wrong the party must accept loss of power and be content to serve the country in Opposition.

The Government has a clear field for service, and there is every reason to hope that it will give the Province honest administration and progressive laws.

AS OTHERS SEE US.

(Chicago Tribune)

Canada has not dealt in billions of dollars and millions of men, but Canada has nevertheless made commensurate war sacrifices in money, suffering and blood. All the world has stood ready with ambitious imaginations for any suggestion from the European chancelleries and applauded unstintedly when the complete successes of the billion dollar loans has been announced, but Canada and its patriotic offerings, under the most peculiar circumstances, have had scant notice. Even her American neighbors seem to have forgotten that bigness of spirit is as moving as bigness of number.

The temper of the Canadian soldier has already been proved and approved in the theater of war, but the same bravery of the home people in facing a rapidly rising public debt has had a much less spectacular setting. During June alone there was a increase of no less than $17,970,000 and the increase in the past twelve months has been $130,906,086, or nearly $60 per head for a young government. These sacrifices made at a critical period of Canada's life for a war across the seas, calling for stamp taxes and increased tariffs, in addition to exposing for slaughter the flower of the manhood of the country, are highly idealistic. France, England, and even Belgium are fighting and making sacrifices—but no greater sacrifices in proportion—in the midst of a struggle that actually threatens their existence, but Canada is giving lavishly of her best blood and money without any thought that physically, at least, she is in danger from the Teuton. Both life and money are more precious, too, to a country just entering upon a period of national development.

Canada is giving humanity one of the real returns of a frightful war. It is the triumph of the purest patriotism and unselfish devotion to the mother country.

NOTES

Weekly Sun: Direct taxation, which begins in Ontario, and will presently begin in the Dominion, ought to be welcome because it will create a public opinion against extravagance,

The devotees of sport, fashion and society might ask themselves this question propounded in the Youths' Companion:

Why work at nothing, like the Wee Pig's Tail that Wiggles all day long to no avail.

Power from Eugenia Falls

Following is part of a Toronto Star interview with Sir Adam beck in Toronto on Friday with remarks; "When will you open your new power plant at Eugenia Falls, Sir Adam?" "We may have something to say shortly." As a matter of fact Hydro construction at Eugenia is exciting the whole continent. Enquiries for plans and photographs come daily from various points in the republic to the south. The Hydro has harnessed two small streams flooded a large land area, built two dams and accumulated a drop of about 300 feet, the second largest fall in the world. The normal horsepower was about 40; when the new plant operates the power total will run into the thousands. The Inaugural will take place soon.

Send Us the News

One of the most difficult tasks in a newspaper office is in getting the facts relative to births, marriages, deaths accidents, and other happenings in the community. Many people take it for granted that when a person dies the editor is familiar with every detail of the life of the deceased and his activities, when the fact he sometimes knows absolutely nothing about him, but he has to get his information from other sources, same as other persons would have to do. It is the same with with marriages or other more or less important happenings in the community. In almost every case the editor has to dig up the particulars or satisfy himself and the readers with a meagre and inaccurate account. The patrons can hardly overestimate how much he appreciates any efforts they make in furnishing him the facts for news items. Send your items of news to the Telescope.

Badly Burned by Gasoline

Emmanuel Iles, son of Mr. George Iles of the east hill who went a fortnight ago to Chesley to work on shell making at the plant of the Canada Beds Limited, was badly burned in an accident there on Monday night. For a time it was feared that the accident would have fatal results but the injured man has recovered from the first shock somewhat and it is thought that he will recover. Iles who was working on the night shift was not familiar with the plant and went into a dark room to get something. Not being able to find it in the dark he struck a match and set fire to a can of benzine which was in the room. This blazed up and he took it to throw it from the window, with the result that the clothing, from his waist up began to burn. Before help came and the fire was smothered Iles was badly burned about the arms and chest and throat. He was at once taken to his boarding house and medical aid summoned. For a time it was feared that his life was in danger but though his hurts are very painful it is not thought now that they are necessarily dangerous.—Owen Sound Sun.

Women's Narrow Escape

On Saturday morning, Mrs. John McLean of Ripley, attempted to start a fire in the kitchen stove by pouring coal oil on live coals and without a moment's notice the coal oil can exploded and set fire to Mrs. McLean's clothing. She immediately rushed to the bedroom and covered herself with a blanket and then rushed onto the street. By this time the kitchen was in flames. When it was discovered one of the children was in the burning house, Mrs. McLean who was on fire returned to the kitchen and saved her child. Neighbors responded to the cry for help, and the first to arrive on the scene was Miss Sadie McIntosh, who was horrified to see Mrs. McLean a mass of burning flames. She immediately tore the burning clothing from her body, and her prompt action probably saved her life. Mrs. McLean who was suffering horribly from the burns was carried to the home of Mrs. Gemmel and has a fair chance to recover. The fire alarm being sounded, willing workers arrived. Messrs R. J. Graham and Philip Teahey were among the first on the scene and fought the fire like heroes, and with other citizens kept the blaze confined to the kitchen and in half an hour had the fire under control. The walls and furniture in the kitchen were destroyed, but the main part of the dwelling was only slightly damaged. Unfortunately the insurance on the house expired last May, consequently Mr. McLean will have to bear a heavy loss, but will consider himself fortunate if Mrs. McLean is restored to health. — Ripley Express.

Bruce Making Things Hum.

The following article on Bruce County was written for the Globe by J. E. Munro, who is a staff correspondent and who visited acquaintances in Brant recently: –

Bruce County like Huron, is realizing its own greatness. Bruce county, like Huron, has resources upon which it will be worth while realizing. There can be no quarrel with Bruce county farming compared with the other districts of Canada, but it improves with the rest in the progress of the agricultural business. They are finding out what the county is adapted for. The fruit districts are growing fruit instead of grain. The grain men are picking out the proper grains, the cattle men the best breeds of cattle and getting rid of the poor ones. Bruce county is in its different parts adapted for almost every line of farming known in Canada. The lake district is becoming a fruit section. In certain localities the dairy cow reigns supreme in the fields, as she does in Perth. In other sections the beef cattle are the money producers, and still others grow grain. Any one of the various lines looks goods this summer. Any one will help Bruce get to its proper place on the map. Bruce county used to watch hundreds of young farmers load stock and settlers' effects in box cars and wish them luck as they went west. They left 100-acre farms, many of them. These were rented by farmers nearby or were taken over by drovers and used as pasture farms for large herds. Bruce people got so common in the west that the rest of Canada wondered if any people were left in the old county. There were. They are staying there now. There will be more there, too, for the west, in the common slang phrase, "has nothing on Bruce." Bruce boys have made good in the west, but they might have been as well off if they had stayed on the homestead. They would this year. Those boys who went west used to come back home with their coon-skin coats, their fat-looking pocketbooks and wealthy manner and tell the boys at home about easy money and the free life of the West. That made them go west. They are not doing so much of it now. Bruce is not worrying about the west either. The boys are coming back, many of them to real, nice, comfortable farms. Increased production and better rural districts will tell the story of the return of the "prodigal," and the "fatted calf" was never fatter than he is in 1915. The "calf" never ate in better pastures in his life, nor did his mother. Looking over the fence to the grain fields, he sees prospects of more feed next winter than he had last. Down the road in the apple orchard things aren't so promising, but out among the berry bushes and small fruits the twigs hang heavy with fruit. The old barns are improved and the house is having a new kitchen or a bathroom installed. The "fatted calf" is going to help pay for it, too, and he is going to help pay for the new silo, with the help of many other things. There is some fine stock in Bruce, and it is doing well this year. The stock farmer is the most common in the county. His farm is noticeable, too, for it is rich. The great Bruce community is awaiting the Hydro power patiently. The Saugeen River, possibly the best power river in Western Ontario, is being surveyed. It will provide power for Bruce, and the keenest for it are the farmers. The scenes which are met with in Oxford county to-day of electric-lighted farmhouses and barns, and machinery run by motors will be repeated in Bruce. The Saugeen will light the houses on the concessions as it will the houses in those prosperous villages and towns throughout the county. After "getting wise to herself," and with great advantage of the power being so close, and with happy, contended farmers and the boys sticking with the homestead instead of going west, Bruce county will become one of Canada's gardens, with the old rural crowd but a new rural life.

Working on Fortifications

It is just possible that some of the Bruce boys who have not been heard of by their relatives here and who have been listed as missing, have been taken prisoners by the Germans and have been set to work on fortifications in that country, in which case they would not be allowed to correspond with their own people. It is said that a number of English and Canadian prisoners have been set to work on fortifications and that these men are not allowed to write home, being strictly guarded. It is just possible that several Bruce boys who have not been heard of for some time are prisoners and have been put to such work.

His Day of Troubles.

"Troubles never come single." This old adage was never more truly demonstrated than last Monday in the case of Mr. John Adams, of this town. The day in question was race day at Teeswater and Darkie Brino, was entered. All went well until it was time to score up when Darkie Brino took to bleeding at the nostrils and was forced to abandon the track for the day, But this was not the only trouble Mr. Adams had to contend with. When returning home in his auto which was driven by Mr. Walter Barnside, the axle of the car collapsed in the vicinity of Riversdale. A town car was wired for which brought the party in and a new axle was wired for, Which was expected here last night. While the accident will be quite a loss to Mr. Adams yet he feels that he cannot be in the game unless he is prepared to take the bitter with the sweet.—Kincardine Review.

Praise for Second Canadian Cotingent

A retired major writes in the Daily Express London: "I was present at the review at Shorncliffe when Bonar Law and General Hughes saw the Canadian troops march past. As an old soldier I can say I have never seen finer troops than the thousands who passed in review under the command of Major General Steele. It was a revelation. Among them was a regiment of French-Canadians. The men had stood in a deluge over an hour and a half, but they went by like old soldiers. Not one of them had been a soldier ten months ago. There were enough six-footers among them to make a Guards' brigade."

Bear Near Durham.

On Friday of last week while Mr. Chas. Proctor and one of his little girls were engaged in a berry patch on the property back of the cement works, he claims to have come quite close to a black bear. He first thought it was a cow, and ordered the animal off. On further investigation he decided to perform the getting off stunt himself and beat a hasty retreat for retreat for safety. Shortly the woods were being scouted by a number of local huntsmen, but Mr. Bruin kept out of sight and hasn't been heard from since.—Durham Review.

Stamps Should be Attached.

Many complaints are received that cheques are now being issued by business houses without war tax stamps on them. This is especially the case where they are sent to outside points, evidently with the idea that the person to whom they are sent will put up the two cents rather than return the cheque. The person issuing the cheque is supposed to put the stamp on it, and this rule should invariably be followed Business men and others in a hurry may inadvertently hand out cheques that have not been properly stamped; but the individuals or firms that deliberately issue such advertise their own meanness.

Forty Day's Rain

It seems that it rained on St. Swithin's Day, Thursday, July 15th, and according to the old belief it should have rained every day till forty weeping days elapse. There was a good deal of wet weather in July, and many people no doubt believe that it has rained every day. As a matter of record for the first fifteen days it rained on nine days. On the other six days it did not rain, but the superstitious will not bow to facts, but will plead that it rained somewhere, which is probably true all the year round, or that it was threatening to rain, or that the rain was evaporating, or that the air was so moist that it amounted to invisible rain. Something has to be done to save the reputation of the tearful saint It is a good thing, as the Toronto Star remarks that it did not snow on St. Swithin's Day.

After the War

When the weary war is ended, and the nations cease to groan, when the Right has been defended till it's fit to stand alone, when the Hun has ceased to pillage, and the Vandals work is through, when the wrecked and shattered village starts to build itself anew may the world be saner, wiser, chastened by its frightful loss, putting down the king and kaiser, who'd be universal boss! If a crazy King's ambition to be War Lord of this sphere, threatens such a dire condition as the world has known this year, if he gads as Wilhelm's gadded in his military pride, he should have a cell that's padded where the lunatics abide. You may talk through forty seasons of the causes of the war, you may spring a hundred reasons that the men are fighting for: but this fact above the riot stands, and little comfort yields: Had Old Bill been sane and quiet, there would be no blood soaked fields Had he quit his endless bluffing had he ceased to kick his hat, telling how he'd knock the stuffing from this nation and that, had his headpiece been less rattled, had he known less martial heat, all the nations now embattled would be busy growing wheat. When the bugles sound "Cease firing," let us block the little game of the monarch who's aspiring to an Alexander's fame —Walt. Mason.

How to Make a Ford

There was an old man who had a wooden leg;
He had no money, and he just couldn't beg;
But he had a piece of pipe and a 12-inch board
And he said, "By golly, I'll build me a Ford."
So he took a gallon of gas and a sprinkle of oil
And a piece of rusty wire to make him a coil;
Four big spools and an old tin can.
He hammered them together and the blamed thing ran.

Deafness Cannot be Cured

by local applications, as they cannot reach the diseased portion of the ear. There is only one way to cure deafness, and that is by constitutional remedies. Deafness is caused by an inflamed condition of the mucous lining of the Eustachian Tube. When this tube is inflamed you have a rumbling sound or imperfect hearing, and when it is entirely closed, Deafness is the result, and unless the inflammation can be taken out and this tube restored to its normal condition, hearing will be destroyed forever; nine cases out of ten are caused by Catarrh, which is nothing but an inflamed condition of the mucous surfaces.

We will give One Hundred Dollars for any case of Deafness (caused by catarrh) that cannot be cured by Hall's Catarrh Cure. Send for circulars, free.

Libel on Judge.

New York police officers of high rank held a conference at head quarters Sunday afternoon and afterwards went to the dark room where lay the body of Charles Becker, guilty of the murder of Herman Rosenthal, and removed from the coffin lid the small silver plate on which Mrs. Becker had inscribed "Charles Becker, murdered July 30, 1915, by Governor Whitman." Officers contended that the inscription was a libel on the chief executive of the state.

Palmerston Wants Hydro.

The obtaining bylaw for Ontario hydro electric power was voted on in Palmerston on Wednesday last and carried almost unanimously, 203 voting in favour of it and only twelve against. The projected line starts in Michell and will supply Milverton, Listowel, Palmerston, Harriston and Clifford, Already Palmerston, Harriston and and Milverton have decided handsomely in its favour and it is expected the other towns will go similarly so that hydro may be installed before the winter sets in.

A Little Girl's Thoughtfulness.

Through the kindness and liberality of a number of Chesely citizens buying flowers, Wilma Savage has collected over 4,00 to be sent to the Fresh Air Fund in Toronto. Five dollars gives a child two weeks' outing in the country so this little girl hopes to be able to remit this amount to the Daily Star this week. There are dozens of poor children in the city whose little lives are being stopped by the intense heat and misery of being in crowded houses. Already, 440 of the poorest and frailest have been sent out to the different lakeside homes amongst orchards and streams and flowers where they will get more milk and good food than they have seen for months, but over 1,000 are yet waiting to be sent to strengthen them for the coming winter.—Chesley Enterprise.

RIVERSDALE

(Intended for last week.)

During Mr. McKenzie's vacation, the pulpit of the Presbyterian church here will be occupied by Mr. Konkle of Toronto, who was with us for a few weeks last winter. We hope that Mr. McKenzie will have a pleasant vacation.

Mrs. Colin Currie and daughter Hazel, who has been visiting at the home of Mr. John Thomson, left last Saturday for their home in London. Lieut. Horace Ruwald, who was visiting his friend Currie Thomson, accompanied them as far as Stratford.

Mr. Frank Sanderson, who has been down the country for a week, returned to the village on Saturday night.

Mr. Bradley of Teeswater, preached in the Presbyterian church here on Sunday.)

Mr. and Mrs. Nicholas O'Hogan motored to Paisley on Sunday to see his uncle who is very ill.

Mr. Joseph and Miss Agnes Dietrich, accompanied by Miss Houle of Port Huron, spent last week at the home of their sister Mrs. L. Benninger of Grand Valley, Mrs. S. Scharbach was accompanied by them.

Mr. Frank Sanderson and family spent Sunday in Walkerton.

A Columbia Grafonola

will return you dividends of pleasure for a lifetime.

Until Columbia Grafonolas were brought within reach of us all, folks who lived in country towns and rural districts hadn't the same opportunity for hearing good music that city folks have.

But the Columbia Grafonola has changed all that. Now, the Columbia Grafonola will play, perfectly, records of all the music of all the world. You can sit home in your parlor or living room and hear famous opera selections by the greatest of living artists.

You can listen to famous bands—such as Creatore's, Prince's, H. M. Scots Guards and others. You can hear magnificent symphony orchestras—famous violinists like Ysaye and Kathleen Parlow, old English, Irish and Scotch Ballads sung by such artists as David Bispham—or all the up-to-date light song and dance music of the day.

All this the Columbia Grafonola makes possible for you, and at a small cost.

You can buy a superb instrument for $45.00. Others as low as $20.00 or as high as $60.00. One for every taste and every purse and on easy terms

Come see and hear any Columbia Grafonola play Columbia Records. We will gladly play them for you.

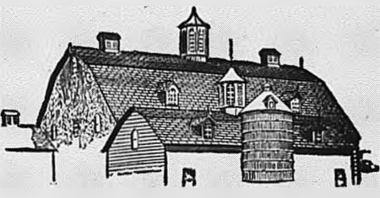
FARMERS!

Why Metallic Roofing and Shingles are not as durable as "Brantford Slates"



Brantford Asphalt Slates
For Houses and Barns

We are making colored and plain Asphalt Slates suitable for roofing any class of building, particularly farmers' buildings.

SPECIAL OFFER We are making a special offer to roof the first house or barn in your locality at about cost price and guarantee it's lifetime for ten years against leakage.

Electricians will tell you that Asphalt, from which Brantford Asphalt Shingles are made, is an excellent insulating material, and does not deteriorate when exposed to the elements, being proof against acid, salt, alkali, rust and corrosion.

Galvanized iron is subject to all these agents of destruction, as well as other enemies, viz., rust and moisture from the inside of the barn, produced by the heating of grain, moisture from cattle, etc. It is also open to attacks from the elements without, and both processes are working toward its ruin at the same time. In other words, condensation is causing the destruction of Metal Roofing and Shingles, while Asphalt Slates retain their wearing qualities indefinitely.

Therefore, Asphalt Slates are, in the end, the cheapest roofing material you can buy, and, as they are now made, the most attractive in appearance, as well as being waterproof and practically fireproof.

LOW PRICES We have succeeded in producing them at about the same price as wood shingles. Let us figure with you at once.

There is no reason why the farmers of our country should put up with leaky roofs when we have acres of material we can supply quickly, at moderate prices.

ROOF-LEAK PAINTS (In Red, Green and Black) This splendid material is especially adapted for old Shingles and Metal and Felt Roofing of all kinds. In fact, any material that will take paint, can be made to last years longer by an application. Put up in large open-mouth cans of 1, 2, 3 and 5 gallons.

Customer is Always Right

THIS is the text or motto of a great and famous department store in Chicago. It is an assertion of the customer's place of supremacy in the relation between buyer and seller.

Any retailer who slights his customer is committing business suicide. The customer wants those who serve him or her to use the newspaper as a vehicle for their announcements of goods or service.

This is the modern and right idea. Newspaper advertisements give desired business news in the right place and at the right time. To ignore your customer's wishes in this matter is to commit a costly mistake— far more costly than newspaper space.

To the Merchants of Walkerton

Keep your eyes on your customers and humor them. It pays to do so. Keep very close to them — by means of advertisements in the Weekly TELESCOPE.

OLD COUNTRY NEWS

LONDON WELCOMES V.C.'s.

Soldiers and civilians, officers and men, more than 300 in all, attended the great investiture at Buckingham Palace on Monday to receive their honors from the King. There were ten V.C.'s: Lieut.-Col. Alexander, Capt. Cyril Martin, Lieut. G. Roupell, Lieut. J. Smyth, Color-Sergt.-Major F. Barter, Sergt. D. Belcher, Sergt. J. Ripley, Bandsman Rendle, Lance-Corp. L. Keyworth, Pte. H. Robson.

Many officers who had done great things came out first, some hobbling on sticks or crutches, some wan and thin from privation and suffering, some stalwart and fit, but all alike in the facts that they were unrecognized and all with the characteristic modesty of the British fighting man were shrinking from recognition.

You could see as they marched across the quadrangle that they were scared to death lest someone in the waiting crowd should identify them and acclaim them as heroes, and as were distinguishable for what they fixed their eyes straight in front of them and strode on until they reached the safety of the Mall.

But the V. C. heroes did not cheat the cheers so easily. Eight of them in a khaki bunch were espied walking across to the southern gate, and they were distinguishable for what they were by the dark ribbon of the V. C. which each man wore upon the breast of his khaki tunic where the King had pinned it.

"Here they come," shouted someone, "Here's Belcher." The eight heroes advanced towards the gate in close formation, resolution in their faces. They had all looked death in the face and would have marched without a tremor against the German army; but something in the sudden stir of the crowd on the other side of the railings warned them that they were facing no ordinary peril now. Still they strode on, took the salutes of the policemen at the gate, reconnoitred the position, and then cautiously advanced into the open.

Then they quailed, as well they might, for they found themselves looking down the muzzles of a massed brigade of cameras all trained full upon them. And at the same moment the crowd broke from the lines to which the police had restrained it, and made an irresistible dash for them.

In a moment every V. C. was assailed by a dozen outstretched hands, and several of them were being kissed by young women who were not to be denied. The eight V. C.'s did not blanch. But they blushed and wavered, then broke and fled. They dashed for cover behind the palace railings, and the police closing in saved the situation. But not before the crowd had achieved its purpose and given them, besides handshakes and kisses, three rousing, hero-worshipping cheers, and three more and three more again.

The eight, overwhelmed by numbers, were still undefeated. They sent for a taxicab, and all crowding into it dashed for the gate by the other end of the quadrangle and escaped by the Mall.

NEW AIDS IN WAR.

The War Office, as well as the Admiralty, is receiving and sifting proposals of new devices, covering the whole range of land warfare, guns, explosives, shields, movable armored fortresses of attack and defence, together with plans for the great utilization of some of the defences already known, such as barbed wire.

This one item of barbed wire is working almost a revolution in the accepted ideas of land warfare. One of the chief officers, after returning from the trenches in Flanders, said that at many points of the line he saw barbed wire laced into an almost solid weave a mile wide in front of the trenches.

"Such a lace-work is absolute protection against sudden attack," said he," and it can hold back a large force long enough to permit the trenches to make every preparation and bring up all needed reserves to overcome the onslaught. It may even do away entirely with frontier fortresses, as an intricate network of wire will hold back a sudden incursion across a border more effectually than a massive fortress costing vast sums and capable of easy destruction by the massive siege guns now in use."

As soon as the Germans began to use poison gases Sir William Ramsay, one of Britain's foremost scientists, went to Flanders, made a study of the effects of the gases, and returned with complete data, analyses of their chemical constituents, and antidotes for the fumes. German devices for throwing liquid fire are considered hardly less deadly than the asphyxiating bombs. Some receptacles for them are carried on men's backs, like fire extinguishers; others are small metal cylinders carried in the hand. One of the devices proposed to the British Government was an "F-ray," operated electrically on the principle of wireless telegraphy, and capable of stunning a whole army with a vast electrical shock.

LAUGHTER CURES DUMB SOLDIER

The novel recovery of a soldier who became deaf, blind and dumb after the attack on Hill 60 has been reported from the Endell Street Military Hospital, W. C.

In time his blindness and deafness passed away, but nothing could make him utter one word. His chair was pulled from him suddenly by his fellow patients, he was splashed with cold water in attempts to startle him into speech. In vain.

Finally he was taken to the Palace Theatre, where Mr. Nelson Keys as a dapper [illegible] drills a number of boys dressed as soldiers. The humor of the little Postman's stride and [illegible] commands was too much for the patient, who suddenly burst into roars of laughter and shouted his approval in a torrent of fluent speech.

Within a day or so he was discharged from hospital perfectly cured.

IMPORTS UP, EXPORTS LESS.

The importance of Mr. Asquith's warning to consume less imported food and luxuries is borne out by the fact that our total imports for the first six months of the year were £429,101,845, while our exports were only £213,621,888. Thus imports have been £215,480,957 in excess of exports. The difference for the whole of 1913 was £211,189,454.

Exports, which in May increased by a million and a half over the previous month, in June fell to £33,822,268, nearly £100,000 less than in May and £6,673,468 below June, 1914.

MINER THE BEST SOLDIER.

From a Manchester officer who has been in France since the beginning of the war, serving with the British staff, the Manchester Guardian has gleaned some interesting news as to the character of the different varieties of the British soldier in the day of war.

In the opinion of the officer, the best soldier is the ex-miner. He puts the miner, "because he is strong in the back and used to dangers and explosions; because he can endure cramped positions in the trenches; because his ears are quick; because he is curious about sounds; because he is intelligent. The miner puts two and two together much more quickly than any other class of men."

Hundreds of boys of 15 have enlisted, but a case has just become known of a lad of 14 who grasped an opportunity to enter the army. "Isn't it time you young men did something for your country?" asked a recruiting sergeant of a group outside a music hall some time ago. "Rather," said a sturdy lad named Priest, aged 14, who looked so eagerly. "How old are you?" "Sixteen," said Priest. "Nineteen! A fine young man like you would pass for nineteen anywhere. Come along!" And young Priest went. He is now a private in the same regiment as his father, who is 41 years of age. Priest's old schoolfellows have sent him a 5s. War Loan voucher.

EIGHT BOYS DROWNED.

Eight boys belonging to Highlands College were drowned on Wednesday last week at Portelet Bay, Jersey.

A party of twenty lads in charge of a Jesuit father left the college at two o'clock and, on arrival at the bay, a number of them decided to bathe. Eight of them entered the water but were carried away by the current. Those on shore were forced to watch the boys one by one being drawn under.

NOTES.

Mr. William Downey, the venerable head of the well-known firm of Court photographers, W. and D. Downey, died in London at the age of eighty-seven. He had the distinction of having photographed more royal personages than any other man in his profession.

The body of Tom Morris Hoyle (28), a miner, of Coleridge road, Sheffield, was recovered on Tuesday week from the canal about 150 yards from Coleridge road Bridge.

Rev. G. Dixon-Thompson, United Methodist, has been appointed president, and Rev. H. Jones, Primitive Methodist, has been elected vice-president of the Rotherham Free Church Council.

A well-known Goole trades-man, Mr. Ezra Foulstone, has died suddenly at Goole. Deceased, who was 57 years of age, was a native of Sheffield, and from there he went to Goole 24 years ago. He was a capable musician and a prominent member of the Goole Orchestral Society.

The Dean of Ripon, Dr. W. H. Fremantle, has intimated to the Chapter of the Cathedral his intention of resigning the Deanery in September next.

The Rev. George Dymock, superintendent of the Blackburn People's Mission and an evangelist of many years' standing, is going to Flanders as a motorist.

It is officially announced that the King has been pleased to approve of the Ven. Edward Latham Bevan, Archdeacon of Brecon, to be Bishop Suffragan, of Swansea.

The employees of the Todmorden Co-operative Society came out on strike on Tuesday week.

In the monthly report of the Boiler-makers' Society the General Secretary announces that there are only 229 members idle—a record—and that 59 superannuated members have resumed work.

Northumberland Miners' Association executive have issued minutes in which they condemn proposals for the introduction of women for handling coal, as has been done at Preston, and with regard to the suspension of the Eight Hour Act suggest that if it becomes necessary it should only be for the war. Extra time worked should be paid for at time-and-quarter, and extra shifts or overtime should not be compulsory.

The Kaiser's name, for the first time in twenty-five years, is omitted from the annual list of Royal Yacht Squadron members at Cowes.

The Prince of Wales has appointed the Hon. Sir Sidney Robert Greville, K.C.V.O., C.B., to be a member of the Council of his Royal Highness.

Superintendent George Ennion, head of the police force in the Northwich division, has been appointed acting deputy chief constable of Cheshire.

Dr. Addison, Parliamentary Secretary to the Ministry of Munitions, has appointed Mr. F. Kellaway, M.P., to be his Parliamentary private secretary.

Miss Violet Asquith's wedding has been definitely postponed, and it is impossible at present to fix a new date. The Premier's elder daughter has only a mild attack of typhoid, and there is every prospect of complications being avoided.

The Mansfield corporation has decided to invest the sum of £7,000 in the new War Loan.

It is stated that [illegible] in Birmingham and Manchester [illegible] rejected for slight defects [illegible] to recruiting offices [illegible] the country.

William Rose, a private in the Bantam Battalion of the Welsh army, was drowned while bathing in a rough sea at Porthcawl, Glamorganshire. He leaves a widow and three children.

A bag of nuts given by [illegible], though only worth 2s. 6d., realized by sale and resale £25 at a jumble sale at Eye, near Peterboro, for the British Farmers' Red Cross fund. The sale produced £350.

H. W. Lee, the young Middlesex professional cricketer, previously officially reported killed in action, is a prisoner in Germany. A post card received by his parents states that he is at Hanover recovering rapidly from a wound.

A three weeks' open air campaign for recruits by the Lord Mayor's committee at Newcastle, in which tents pitched in various parts of the town and staffed by active service men have proved a great feature, has resulted in 1,000 recruits being obtained.

An intimation has been received in Newcastle that the death sentence passed at the Newcastle Assizes on William George Simpson, a private in the West Yorkshire Regiment, for the murder of his two-year-old son, has been commuted to penal servitude for life.

Mr. Warner, deputy-chief of the stationery department of the High Court of Justice, was found dead in his room at the court. He was in his 73rd year, and had been induced to remain at work in consequence of many younger officials being at the front.

The death has occurred at Youghal, Cork, of Major-General Sir Thomas Dennehy, who was born in 1829, and served through the Indian mutiny. He was aide-de-camp to Lord Canning, and later organized the Indian police.

The death has occurred after a lengthy illness of Dr. John Townley, Lynton House, Stairfoot. Deceased, who was about 50 years of age, has been in practice at Stairfoot and Ardsley for many years. He was the first medical practitioner in the township, and was medical officer for over 20 years.

The death has occurred of Mr. J. P. Henning, manager of the Louth branch of the Capital and Counties Banking Co., aged 52 years.

Wargrave Church, which was destroyed by fire by militant suffragists on June 1, 1914, is being rebuilt. In restoring the tower the interesting discovery has been made that the present casing of red brick covers the original Norman tower. Vaults have also been discovered under the chancel, of which no mention is made in the church records.

A military wedding was celebrated in the porch of the Conway-road Wesleyan Chapel, Cardiff, which was destroyed by fire the previous Thursday. The bridegroom was Lieutenant Archibald Norman and the bride Miss Dora Watkins. They have been members of the chapel since they were children, and they determined to be married there even though it was among the ruins. So on Monday morning in the porch of the chapel, in view of a large crowd, the Rev. Charles Tinsley, pastor of the chapel, performed the ceremony. Owing to the size of the porch only twenty friends and relatives were present.

The number of men in the county of Roscommon, said Judge Boyd, addressing the grand jury at Roscommon Assizes on Monday week, is 45,522. There were also 45,424 women. Of these 45,000, he was sorry to say only 178 people had volunteered for the defence of the country. Did those, he added, who stayed at home wish to be placed in the category of cowards?

Quaymen employed by the Great Western Railway at Fishguard Harbor, Pembrokeshire, struck work on Saturday week, demanding an increase of from 5d. to 8d. an hour. The unloading of Irish vessels was stopped until the arrival of soldiers, who took over the work. The strikers came out against the wishes of their leaders. They had already been granted extra war pay of 4s. a week. Many are said to earn over £2 a week.

The Rev. W. Dawes Driver, vicar of All Saints', Chatham, Kent, who was a Poor Law guardian, a councillor, an alderman, and Mayor of Chatham before he entered the church, has been appointed vicar of the adjoining parish of Gillingham.

The violent wind during Wednesday night last week blew down a number of trees near Dover. The gale of Wednesday caused severe havoc in fruit-growing districts. At Maidstone and Hunton (Kent) plum and cherry trees were stripped of green fruit. In one [illegible] orchard over five half-sieves (24-lb. in a sieve) were ruined.

A trial order for 100 baskets for 18-pounder high-explosive shells is being executed in the village of Busbridge, near Godalming. The manufacture of wicker and withy baskets was started in the village two years ago by Mrs. Stuart Pleydell-Bouverie, with the aid of a gypsy who instructed the village schoolmaster. If the order is satisfactorily carried out thousands of baskets will be asked for.

Though her little daughter escaped with slight bruises, Mrs. Day, of [illegible]-road, Richmond, who had saved the child from being run over by a motor-omnibus, was killed instantly.

A son was a witness of the fatality, and the woman's husband, who is serving in the army, had left home a little earlier in the day to rejoin his regiment.

Why You Wink.

The unconscious act of winking bears a quite important relation to the welfare of the eye. This being the most delicate and sensitive organ of the body exposed to the air, it is in constant need of the protection given by the eyelids, which not only close quickly at the approach of danger, but are employed in washing the surface of the eye. Moistening is required to offset the drying effect of the air and cleansing to prevent the injurious effect of dirt. Every time you wink the eye is washed. Inside the eyelid is the little tear gland, which, as its name implies, is for storing up the supply of tears. This gland keeps the inside of the lid moist, and you wink automatically whenever the surface of the eye becomes dry or a particle of dust or anything else strikes it. This work is done so often [illegible] without winking.

Alaska's White Death.

A fearful type of storm is the so-called "white death of Alaska." This is a fog in which the whole air becomes full of minute particles of ice. It is thick beyond belief, and exposure to it for any length of time in the open means certain death to human beings.

There's No Excuse, for Poor Teeth in These Days of Good Dentistry

Lessons From Irene Hough's Beauty

DON'T HAVE ANY OF YOUR FRONT TEETH FILLED WITH GOLD.

(By Idah McGlone Gibson)

"It's all very well to talk about smiling," said a friend to me the other day [illegible] beauty. [illegible] Miss Irene Hough [illegible] beautiful girl in America [illegible] good teeth."

I answered [illegible] dentistry [illegible].

The late Richard Mansfield said very often that [illegible] added to the actor's appearance [illegible] that he could articulate better if he had all his teeth.

Don't by any possibility have any of your front teeth filled with gold. (Thank heaven that horrible fashion went out with Queen Victoria.) If you are unfortunate enough to have a cavity in one of your front teeth have it filled with cement or porcelain that matches it in color.

Have your teeth cleaned carefully twice a year by a professional. Some dentists claim that, unless you have a long sickness, your teeth can be kept from decay.

Remember that a toothbrush is much more essential to beauty than a powder puff and a smile is more effective than the rouge pot. If you do not believe this consult your mirror.

CURIOUS WAYS IN JAPAN.

One Thing in Particular That Pained a Visitor From Missouri.

I knew before I got here that Japan was queer, but I had no idea that everything was backward. I got used to sitting on the floor and sleeping [illegible] pillow. The [illegible] way to figure out how the Japanese would do a thing is to think what would be exactly backward in this country. When two Japanese meet they bow and bow, giving their head [illegible]. They [illegible] their hats.

Japanese never kiss. This pleasant pastime has not yet been imported into cherry blossom land. It is only recently that a few of the [illegible] have learned to shake hands. [illegible] travelers are hoping that they will take up other great American institutions. Japanese look upon kissing as being low and vulgar, believing that a few moments spent in bowing is much better. The girls feel that way about it, they say.

When an ardent young Japanese [illegible] phrases.

One cannot help feeling sorry for them when thinking how many pleasant evenings they miss. From my limited experience I wouldn't give a good old fashioned Missouri kiss for ten minutes of bows.—[illegible] in Leslie's.

THE "FORLORN HOPE."

Real Meaning of a Misused Term in the Vocabulary of War.

In the tales of every war one hears a great deal about "forlorn hopes." This term is one of the most misused in the vocabulary of war. It is commonly understood to mean a desperate venture. It really means "lost troop" or "detached troop."

The word "hope" in the phrase is not an English, but a Dutch word, "hoop," meaning literally "heap" and secondarily body of troops. The word "forlorn" represents the Dutch "verloren," lost. A "forlorn hope" was a detached body of troops thrown out in front of the main line of battle to find the enemy and engage them first. This was the regular custom and [illegible] practice, and though it was one of the most dangerous kinds of service, it was not necessarily "forlorn" in the English sense.

Nowadays much the same work is done by detached bodies of cavalry which are thrown out before the main line of battle without communications or supplies to find the enemy. "Capitulation" is another term of war which is very loosely used. It does not mean surrender, but surrender on terms. In early times it meant the terms, and the surrender [illegible]. It is from the Latin "capitulum," meaning "heading" (from which is derived the word "chapter"), and a capitulation is a formal treaty of surrender drawn up under a series of headings or chapters, embodying the terms on each point.—Manchester Guardian.

Canny Scot.

"I say, Sandy," said Jock, handing back his friend's photograph, "when ye had these photos taken why dinna ye smile?"

"And those pictures costing me two dollars a dozen!" replied Sandy. "Are ye crazy, mon?"—Woman's Home Companion.

VELVET HATS FOR MIDSUMMER.

The sailor and velvet hat is smart and appropriate for midsummer wear. The wide [illegible] brim is wired and finished with a deep net fold. Small [illegible] ornaments are placed at intervals around the edge, and the velvet crown, close fitting, finishes with a saucy velvet bow on one side.

JUST WAIFS, THAT'S ALL

"Meow! Meow!"

Shrilly the plaintive noise came to Miss Branscombe's ears, and she turned uneasily in bed. What was a cat doing in her door?

Old Jim Bellingham, the owner of the tiny two-roomed flats, had a rule that no pets should be kept in the flats.

She lifted it up, in a moment of forgetfulness. It was a tiny Persian kitten of pale smoke blue. Its long soft hair, its merry little black eyes (they had instantly lost their look of pathos on being lifted up), made her feel suddenly that she must keep it. There was something in the way the little thing snuggled against her; there was something in the way it purred and prepared to go to sleep that touched her heart.

How dreadfully lonely Bellingham's buildings had been. She had never noticed the loneliness so acutely as she did now, with this tiny creature hugged against her heart.

She gave it some milk, then climbed back into bed, after putting a cushion for the kitten to lie on, but she had scarcely settled herself for sleep before something climbed into bed, and, nestling up to her, fell asleep, purring happily.

Gentle little Miss Branscombe felt almost defiant. If she were turned out, well she could go, but give up her new-found treasure she wouldn't.

Miss Nora Wentworth and Miss Branscombe had once been friends. It was a strange coincidence that when Miss Branscombe had been the belle of Annerly village her great friend had been Miss Wentworth.

But they had a great quarrel over a man. Nora Wentworth had blamed Lucy Branscombe for stealing her sweetheart, and Lucy, cut to the heart, had left home, and had gone to stay with relations. It meant that the man, who loved Lucy, and who had never shown more than a passing courtesy to Nora Wentworth, went away, too, to try to forget the pretty girl.

And years later the two, now old maids, had drifted into the shelter of Bellingham's Buildings, but they never spoke to each other.

One day Nora Wentworth was out in her garden at the top of the house. She was alone in her roof garden brooding, as she often did, on her trouble, when she saw Miss Branscombe come up and look furtively round.

Now Miss Branscombe had a singularly open face, but instantly Nora Wentworth knew something out of the ordinary was up or else Lucy would not have looked like that.

And then, she could hardly believe her eyes, for from under her shawl Miss Branscombe brought out a fluffy bundle, a kitten! Miss Wentworth rubbed her eyes as she watched. Miss Wentworth went in, her face shining. She wrote quickly

"Dear Sir,—You will be surprised to hear that one of the inmates of the buildings has broken the rule which forbids us to have pets. She has a kitten which she keeps hidden. The woman is Miss Branscombe. Yours sincerely, Nora Wentworth."

She posted it after she had addressed it to J. Bellingham, Esq.

* * *

A month before Jim Bellingham, his uncle, had died. His real name had been Jim Hollingsworth, and the nephew had had his work cut out to sort everything concerning the property out. No one had known that his uncle was such a philanthropist. That the famous Jim Bellingham was his uncle he had never known, and up to now he had had no time to visit Bellingham's Buildings, although now he owned them.

But the letter in his hand puzzled him. What on earth did it matter if one of the old ladies had a cat, he thought, rather irritably. He had lived much of his life out in India, not the best place to keep a placid temper, and he had had to return to manage all the property which was his now.

Branscombe! Branscombe! he was thinking. The name touched a familiar chord in his memory. Ah, yes, he remembered, the little girl who once he had cared for, but who had run away on the day he was going to propose. At first he had kept single for her sake; now he kept single for his own.

When a tall bronzed man jumped out and asked for Miss Branscombe, a flutter did go through the dovecote. For Lucy Branscombe had no relations in England, and then—a man! They never had men visiting them.

Lucy Branscombe, her pretty face so pink under her snowy hair, opened the door after a minute's hesitation. She had taken the precaution to hide the kitten in the airing cupboard, which was warm and cozy, and which would keep the little thing still.

When she saw the man she started back in amazement quite as palpable as the amazement on the face of the other ladies he had passed on the stairs.

And then he stepped in, at her timid invitation. He knew that this was Lucy, Lucy still a Miss, and as pretty as ever. Certainly she was older, but then was not he older?

"I hear, madam," he said courteously, "that you have a cat hidden here."

Lucy's pretty pink faded, and a frightened look came into her eyes. She could not give up her kitten, but then she could not tell a lie.

And then the kitten answered for itself.

The man laughed jovially. "You wanted to say that you had no kitten, I know, but you see you weren't allowed to deceive me," he said merrily.

"I'm glad," she said in a rather frightened voice. This man looked so big and strong, and she felt quite tiny beside him. "But, you see I was so fond of it, and it's such a little one and did not harm."

"I'm afraid I shall have to turn you out," the man said gravely. "It's against the rules, you know."

"Yes," said Lucy, with resignation. "I expected you would; but it has been worth it."

"Yes," said the man softly. "I expect it has been worth it; but even then I must ask you to go."

Tears gathered in her eyes, and the man could play his part no longer.

"I want you to come and be mistress of my house," he said softly, and he took the hand not holding the kitten. It trembled in his grasp, then tried to pull itself away, but it was held too tightly.

"Don't you remember me, I'm Jasper?" he said in a low voice.

"Jasper! Jasper!" said Miss Branscombe incredulously. Now she understood why there was something familiar about him. But the Jasper she remembered was so young. Ah! but she had aged, too, so much.

"I want you to be my wife; you ran away years ago. I'll never let you run away now."

Lucy, startled and bewildered, yet with a feeling of such infinite happiness thrilling her, swayed, but he held her with his strong arms, and then some one ran in.

It was Miss Wentworth, with streaming eyes and trembling lips.

"It's all my fault," she said miserably. "I wrote and told about the kitten, but, oh! I'm sorry now."

She looked timidly at Lucy, and Lucy bent forward and kissed her tenderly.

"I forgive you, dear," she said. "You have found Jasper for me."

Unwittingly she had brought these two together, whereas once she had knowingly, cruelly parted them.

But it was with a sob of heartfelt relief that she whispered:

"God bless you both, and, oh! you will be happy, very, very happy, Lucy, for you deserve it."

Then she stumbled out, as Jasper took Lucy into his arms.—London News.

THE TURKISH HERCULES.

Ahmet Bey's Feat of Daring Strength and Horsemanship.

The Turks tell of Ahmet Bey, an Ottoman officer, who served against the Russians. Ahmet was possessed of a daring in keeping with his heroic proportions and physical strength. He was the beau ideal of a soldier, one whose military knowledge seemed instinctive.

It appears that Abdul Kerim Pasha, the commander-in-chief, while inspecting his troops one morning casually expressed the wish to capture a Servian prisoner from the Servian lines. Ahmet Bey, overhearing the remark, saluted and asked permission to get the commander a prisoner. He received the permission, although Abdul Kerim wondered at the request. Ahmet wheeled his charger, dashed spurs into its flanks and galloped straight for the nearest Serbian outpost.

As he approached half a dozen rifles cracked, but Ahmet galloped on unharmed and marked down one sentry for his prey. The sentry fired at the audacious horseman, missed and started to run. Ahmet swooped on him like a hawk upon a chicken. He bent down, grasped the Serbian by the collar and swung him across his saddle in front. Then he galloped back, bending over his horse's neck to escape the bullets, and handed over the prisoner to the Turkish commander amid the shouts of the soldiers.—St. Louis Republic.

What the Maid Wanted to Know.

One of our leading actresses was engaging a maid and impressed upon her the necessity of not discussing out of doors what she heard said indoors. "There wasn't a single thing said in this house that wasn't gossiped over by my last maid," added the actress. "Now do you think you can keep your tongue still?" The would-be maid was thoughtful for a minute, then piped out, "Please, madam, is there much to conceal?"

Entire Family Stricken With Cholera.

Youngest Child Died.

The chief symptoms of cholera are vomiting, and purging occurs either simultaneously or alternately, and are usually sudden and very violent, and the matter ejected by the stomach has a bilious appearance and a nasty bitter taste. On the first symptom appearing Dr. Fowler's Extract of Wild Strawberry should be taken, and the trouble cured.

Mrs. E. Slade, 370 Logan Ave., Toronto, Ont., writes: "When I first arrived in Canada, nearly four years ago, my entire family was stricken with cholera, from which the youngest child died. Soon after a friend recommended Dr. Fowler's Extract of Wild Strawberry, and acting on this advice I administered it to all who were suffering, with the most gratifying results. Since that first attack my children have been subject to stomach troubles, but on the first symptoms I resort to "Dr. Fowler's," and it always brings relief. I have immense faith in this medicine, and always keep a bottle on hand. Also I never fail to recommend it to anyone who is similarly troubled."

It has been on the market for the past 70 years.

There is nothing "just as good."

Her Nerves Were So Bad Thought She Would Go Out of Her Mind.

Mrs. Hollas Knox, 15 Harding St., St. John, N.B., writes: "I suffered greatly with my nerves, I could not sleep at night, nor work, and the least little thing worked on my mind and bothered me. Last winter I thought I would go out of my mind, I would screech out, and my mother really thought I was going crazy with my nerves. It was so terrible I would hold my head and cry. I tried two doctors but they did not do me any good. I thought I would tell you that to-day I am perfectly cured by using three boxes of Milburn's Heart and Nerve Pills, and I can recommend them to all sufferers from nervous troubles as you can tell everyone that they are the only thing that did me any good."

FARM AND GARDEN

TURNIPS AND RUTABAGAS.

Turnips and rutabagas will yield a larger amount of nutritious food for stock, on the same space, than anything else that can be planted. One ounce of seed will sow 150 feet of drill; one to one and a half pounds will sow an acre. It is better to drill turnip seed than to broadcast it, as by the former method the seed is more deeply sown.

The turnip thrives best in highly enriched sandy, gravelly or light loamy soil. They are generally sown in drills from twelve to fifteen inches apart, and thinned out early to six or eight inches in the rows.

Rutabaga turnips are extensively grown for a farm crop. The roots are close-grained, very hard, and will endure a considerable degree of cold without injury. Sow from June 20 to middle of July, in drills two feet apart and thin out to eight inches.

The land should be plowed level, harrowed crosswise and lengthwise, so as to get it into fine tilth. Then plow shallow furrows two and a half feet apart; in these furrows spread the manure or fertilizer.

In using a seed drill to sow the seed it should be adjusted so as to sow less than three pounds to the acre, if in rows as above.

It is best to mix the seed with ashes, whether sown broadcast or drilled, which latter method is to be preferred. If rain comes so as to moisten the ground, and the young plants get a vigorous growth, they will be likely to escape the ravages of the fly. If the ground is very poor it would be well to sow plaster on it, after the seed is harrowed in.

In about two weeks after the turnips come up, go through them with a hoe and cut out the weeds, and also thin the turnips.

Cows fed on turnips give a much greater quantity of milk than if fed on hay or corn, but it is necessary to give them some hay, or the butter made from them will have a peculiar taste. Cattle may be fed during winter, and even fattened, on turnips, but when fed to cattle or cows it is necessary to cut them in pieces with a hatchet or some other instrument, as instances are known of cattle swallowing turnips whole and thereby getting choked.

If attacked by the fly, sow dry ashes on them while the dew is on. Fresh slacked lime or soot is also recommended for this purpose.

One of the prime essentials in growing a root crop of any kind is to have a good seed bed. The land should be rich in potash and lime, with large quantities of available nitrogen. This holds good with all root crops, with possibly the exception of the sugar beet. Cultivation should begin with the plowing. No furrow should be thrown over flat.

In sowing turnip seed, aim to do so before the ground gets too dry. It is a mistake to sow turnips the last of all crops, but rather sow them early, and as a result you will find yourself thinning them, while your neighbor is waiting for his to grow. Force the growth by cultivation and thereby avoid attacks of lice and woody roots.

Land that is set aside for the turnip field should be cultivated frequently before planting, so as to conserve moisture and give the seed quick germination and the growing plant plenty of moisture. Sow the seed in drills 20 inches apart on good, fertile soil, allowing two pounds of seed per acre, covering to a depth of one inch. Where fertilizers are applied, they should be well worked into the soil. Cover the seed with a spring-toothed harrow turned wrong side up. This will spread the seeds in the row and permit the thinning later. Harrow a couple of times before the plants are up, always harrowing in the direction of the row and not across; then roll hard. On heavy land, rolling should not be done. We do not advocate sowing turnip seed broadcast. Cultivate thoroughly to save the moisture.

When plants have the third leaf they are ready to be thinned. Do this with a sharp hoe; avoid injuring roots; thin so that the plants will be 14 inches apart.

FARM NEWS AND VIEWS.

Timothy has a good effect on the soil. At the North Dakota Experiment Station the four crops of wheat following two crops of timothy were increased 22 4-5 bushels above the yield from four crops of wheat following wheat. So that nearly as much wheat was raised in the four years following the two years of timothy as in the six years of all wheat.

It is a mistake to judge a dairy ration on the basis of protein, as some feeds with less protein mixed with some other ingredients make a more satisfactory feed. Alfalfa has no more food value than clover, but it has the advantage of being a soil renovator, besides furnishing from three to five crops a season.

Alsike is the best clover for wet lands and should be sown in mixtures for moist lands. As the seed is small, it requires about half the amount used in seeding red clover. It mixes well with timothy, but does not grow as large as red clover, and it is not profitable to grow on land where red clover does well.

Wood ashes make a good fertilizer for the strawberry bed or raspberry plantation. Twenty bushels to the acre is about right.

A practical fruit grower says that soil which will raise good potatoes will raise good strawberries. Chip dirt or well-rotted manure, with a little commercial potash and phosphate applied with the manure a year before the plants are set, make good fertilizers.

Star boarders in the dairy herd and unproductive acres on the farm are alike a detriment to the farmer. The former can be weeded out and the latter improved until every cow and every acre will give a good account of itself.

When farmers let up on their everlasting distrust of each other and cooperate in a neighborly manner whenever their interests are mutual, they will begin to enjoy their legitimate share of the profits growing out of production and distribution. One individual cannot successfully buck against the organized business world. We have tried that long enough.

Your decision to diversify must be followed by determination to give every acre and animal in the diversified system a fair chance. Then there will be a further obligation to see that every crop and every animal have a good market. This may require strenuous work and logical thinking, but it will be the means of larger profits on the farm.

Old Cures.

The antiquary took down a little gray book. "Here is a family doctor," he said, "that was published as far back as 1561. Talk about your quaint prescriptions! The first prescription, a truly quaint one, ran: 'If a man be greved wyth the fallinge sicknesse, let him take a he-wolves harte and make it in powder and use it; but if it be a woman, let her take a she-wolves harte.' A 1561 jaundice cure was: 'Take earthwormes and cut them small, and braye them wyth a little wyne so that ye may swallow it, drincke the same fasting.' For toothache: 'Seeth as many little frogges, sitting upon trees as thou canst get, in water; take the fat flowynge from them, and when nede is, anoynt the teth therewyth.'"

FEED RATION AND EGGS.

One of the factors which determine egg production is the feed ration, not merely the quantity of feed given, but the elements contained therein. Many questions are asked as to what a balanced ration for egg production is and how to balance the ration. In order to determine more fully the effect of certain rations a number of experiments are in progress at Mountain Grove, Missouri, experiment station. Each pen contains twelve hens.

The test with a wide ration, containing elements which would produce three yolks for each white, laid 379 eggs in the first six months. The test with a narrow ration, containing elements which would produce two whites to each yolk, produced 269 eggs. The test with a ration containing equal yolk and white material, but without minerals to produce the shell, produced 161 eggs. The test where the ration contained elements necessary to produce equally all parts of the egg produced 1,603 eggs in the same time. This ration is called balanced ration for egg production.

The yolk is principally carbohydrates, the white protein, and the shell minerals. Thus the three parts of the egg are made from three kinds of food.

The ration used is fairly well balanced for egg production. Instead of using the terms "carbohydrates" and "protein," the terms "yolks" and "whites" have been used. All fractions are omitted. Therefore the table is only approximately correct:

Grain.	Lbs.	Yolks.	Whites.
Cracked corn....	150	352	194
Wheat	150	365	273
Mash.
Wheat bran	20	31	41
Middlings	20	41	44
Cornmeal	20	63	27
Ground oats	20	39	31
Gluten meal.. ..	20	43	58
Beef scraps	30	33	232
Alfalfa meal ...	5	7	9
O. P. oil meal ..	5	8	25
Total.........	440	1603	1806

The hens had access to oyster shell and grit, and got two pounds of fine table salt and four pounds of fine charcoal in the above mash.

The basis for computing the number of yolks and whites produced by each kind of feed was that one pound of carbohydrates would produce 3 1-3 yolks; one pound of protein would produce 16 2-3 whites, this being the rate of the average hen here at the station.

It will be seen that from 150 pounds of corn 352 yolks and 194 whites are produced, therefore it is not a balanced ration. The extra yolks are built into fat. In this way hens fed on corn alone get extra fat, and we hear the old expression that the "hen is too fat to lay." The expression should be changed to read: "The hen can't lay is the reason she gets too fat." A simple ration may be made as follows:

	Yolks.	Whites.
150 lbs. cracked corn..	352	194
160 lbs. wheat	365	273
25 lbs. beef scraps	25	275
Total	772	746

This ration would give best results where the hens have free range, because it contains no mash, thus requiring the hen to do the grinding of the food. The kind of food she gets on the range should be considered, however.

If a hen has the ability to produce twenty-four eggs in one month when fed a balanced ration, but is fed an unbalanced ration like corn alone, which produced two yolks for each white, instead of making forty-eight yolks in order to produce twenty-four eggs, she makes only the twenty-four yolks, but can complete only twelve eggs. The same thing is true of the whites. It is the same proposition of "no chain being stronger than its weakest link." No hen will lay more eggs than the weakest part of the feed ration.

Natural Blankets.

Nature is kind in Ecuador. When a native wants a blanket he goes to a demajagua tree, and cuts from it a strip of peculiarly soft, thick bark, five feet or six feet long. This is dampened and beaten until the flexibility of the sheet is much increased. The tough, grey exterior is next peeled off and the sheet dried in the sun. The result is a blanket, soft, light and fairly warm, of an attractive cream color. It may be rolled into a compact bundle without hurt, and with ordinary usage will last for several years.

POTATO ROT

Many Parts of Ontario Report the Trouble.

Ontario Agricultural College has sent out the following bulletin regarding diseased vines being found in the Province:

During the last few days we have received from various districts in the Province of Ontario samples of diseased young potato vines, with requests for information regarding the nature, cause and cure of the disease. We had just previously noticed the same disease amongst the potato crop both on the experimental grounds and in the general crop of potatoes on the College farm. As the disease appears to be fairly wide spread this season, we have deemed it advisable to issue a circular letter respecting it.

In the growing crop an affected plant will have a wilted appearance, being dull dirty green in color, the stems flaccid, the leaves will have a tendency to curl. The stems near the ground and below will be blackened, and in the various stages of decay from a soft wet rot. On digging out the seed potato it will be found to be soft and pulpy, and when broken open, the inside is usually slimy and gives off an offensive odor.

This soft rot of potatoes is a bacterial disease. Its development in ground where it has not been before is nearly always due to diseased seed potatoes having been used for planting. As long as affected potatoes are kept dry, the disease will not spread, but as soon as they become moist the soft rot develops as the bacteria which cause it have then a chance to develop rapidly. An affected seed potato in which the disease has been checked by drying out will have brown or blackish discolorations which are easily seen on cutting. The rot may be present in varying degrees, but as it has dried out it may look like a dry rot. When such affected potatoes are planted the moist conditions in the soil which are necessarily for growth, are favorable for the further development of the disease. Some of the eyes of the potato will send up their shoots, but these are usually weak and spindly. As the disease continues to rot the seed tuber it enters the young shoots and rapidly passes upwards, causing the stems to blacken and rot near the surface of the ground, then the top wilts and topples over.

Treatment—Spraying of any kind is of no direct use with this disease. The treatment is preventive rather than curative. As pointed out above, the disease develops in the first place from affected seed tubers. But when once it is established in a crop it may be spread from the diseased plants to neighboring healthy plants by the cultivator, hoe or other implement used getting contaminated by coming in contact with a rotting plant and then with a healthy plant. Biting insects, as the potato bug, also spread the disease to some extent, and it is only by spraying for these that spraying is helpful in preventing the spread of the disease.

The crop should be carefully inspected and every plant that is found to be rotting should be dug out and either burned or buried in quick lime.

When harvesting the potatoes, any tuber that shows any sign of the disease should be placed on one side and not allowed to be stored with the main pile. Should the disease not be far advanced in the tuber, the affected part may be cut off and the rest used for food. If any of these affected tubers get into the seed pile to be used the following year, they will either rot during storage and cause those around them to rot also if they are not kept dry, and if they are kept dry, the disease will be checked until they are planted, when they will rot and destroy the plant that springs from them.

TRICKS OF ECHOES.

Atmospheric Conditions Have to Do With Their Occurrence.

The best time to study echoes is in the early morning, or just before a rain or an electrical storm. The atmosphere is then heavy, and the echo seems to be louder and is more easily located.

The whistle of a locomotive often causes a pleasing echo which can be heard by passengers on the train. There is an instance recorded in which the echo of a locomotive whistle came so distinctly from a direction opposite to that of the actual sound that a man was misled by it, and was killed by the train.

Echoes are common in the city as well as in the country. The shape and size of buildings, and the width and the angle of streets and alleys will often produce interesting echoes which are easily studied.

A good way to study these phenomena in the city is to remain at the open window and listen for the echo of a sound made by someone else. The peculiar whir of an electric car as it approaches a corner is often echoed by some building, until the car seems to be coming from some other direction. The puffing of a locomotive as it makes along the track often makes an interesting echo, that suggests the presence of several locomotives.

In certain localities heavy rain clouds will send back an echo. Much of the rumbling of the thunder during a storm is the echo of the first report the great sound waves striking both the hills and heavy clouds, and being reflected back.

In many deep canyons in the mountains, and in some caves, there are wonderful echoes. In some of these places a single word or a revolver shot will be repeated hundreds, and occasionally thousands of times, producing a bedlam of sounds.

Amateur Truce Makers.

Toward the end of the last siege of Paris by the Germans in 1870-71, the custom grew up of observing an informal armistice of about an hour's duration at sundown, when the hungry citizens, or some of them at all events, used to come out and purchase sausages from the Prussians and Bavarians in the advanced trenches at about ten times their normal price. After awhile, however, the custom came to the knowledge of Von Moltke, who effectually and promptly put a stop to it by shooting some half dozen or more of the amateur truce makers.—Pearson's Weekly.

We are threatened by cowardly enemies. From these we must protect ourselves.

The Peabodys Overall Factory (Walkerville, Ontario) was bombed on the night of June 20th, because of its activity in making uniforms for Lord Kitchener's Army. The Windsor Armoury's destruction was attempted the same night because soldiers were sleeping there. The same enemy agency attempted to blow the C. P. R. GUN-FLINTS.

Their Making Still a Big Industry in Britain.

It is interesting at the present time, writes Wilfred Mark Webb in Knowledge, when the manufacture of cartridges and shells is of the utmost importance to the nation, to remember that the production of gun-flints still goes quietly on. Thousands are exported every year, particularly to tropical countries, where more primitive methods linger, or are found in the more convenient; or, again, where the British Government sees to it that modern firearms do not get into the hands of the natives.

There seems little doubt but that the maker of gun-flints, or the flint-knapper, as he is called, is carrying on an industry which has continued unbroken from very early prehistoric times, when man first began to fashion implements of stone.

The work of flint knapping, as it is carried on at Brandon, in Suffolk, is briefly this: The flints are taken out of pits, as surface material is refractory and of little use. The picks used, though now made of iron, show by their shape that they have been modelled upon the primitive deer-antler picks which have been found in prehistoric workings. The large flints are broken up with a heavy hammer into convenient sizes, a process which is called "quartering." From the lumps thus made flakes are struck off with a light hammer, which are in every way comparable to the flakes struck off by the prehistoric man from one stone with another.

It is possible to produce a flake with one ridge running down the middle and two sharp edges or by removing the whole of one facet and part of the two on either side a flat flake with two sharp edges may be obtained.

The knapper knows the flake on the top of the wedge-shaped piece of iron, driven into a block. In front of the iron is a piece of leather, over which the knapping hammer is held. This is a very light tool, nowadays made, as a rule, from an old file, and has thin, square ends. With this hammer it is possible to cut the flake into pieces to form the gun-flints, which are afterwards trimmed round with a few dexterous blows.

To the student of flint implements, who is astounded sometimes to see the minuteness of the flakes which have been removed from the edges of a flint knife or arrowhead, and wonders how the work was done, it may be pointed out that one blow of the knapping hammer may make dozens of these; and it is safe to surmise that the prehistoric artificer was no less clever than his modern representative, and much of the beauty of finish was obtained by a few well-directed blows, and not by much laborious chipping.

Gun-flints are also made in France, and there, as a rule, have one end rounded. Strike-a-lights are also made, as flint and steel are still used instead of matches in some parts of the world, and during the Boer war many tinder-boxes were sent out to the British soldiers in South Africa.

Damp Room Test.

To ascertain whether a room is damp or not place a weighed quantity of fresh lime in an open vessel in the room and leave it there for twenty-four hours, carefully closing the windows and doors. At the end of the twenty-four hours reweigh the lime, and if the increase exceeds 1 per cent. of the original weight it is not safe to live in the room.

CATARACT OF THE EYE.

It May Come at Any Time of Life, and Its Goal is Blindness.

Cataract is an opacity of the crystalline lens caused by interference with its nutrition. As the rays of light cannot penetrate this opaque matter it results in blindness. A cataract may come at any time of life, but is most apt to come in old age, when senile changes take place in all parts of the body.

A cataract may be caused by changes in the eye before birth. Children are born with a cataract. It may be caused by changes during childhood, by diseases or injury, by excessive and persistent light and heat and by many other causes. Glassblowers are subject to it, X ray workers, sufferers from diabetes and many others. It may be a primary disease or it may be secondary to other diseases.

It is often very successfully treated by operation, particularly in the aged, the lens or lens and its capsule being removed. The development of cataract is sometimes very rapid, especially after injury, but in the aged it takes place slowly, sometimes requiring years before blindness results. The operation is not usually done until the cataract is mature or ripe. An earlier operation frequently militates against a successful result.—Philadelphia Record.

Antidotes for Poison.

The first thing to do in case of poisoning is to summon a physician without delay, telling him what has happened, so that he may bring a stomach pump and other necessities with him.

The next thing to do is to give the patient an emetic. The sooner and more complete the vomiting, the better chance for recover. Whatever is given should be repeated and repeated until complete nausea empties the stomach.

If there is a tendency to drowsiness, the patient must be kept awake by exercise.

When it is not known what poison has been taken, follow these directions:

Mix in a pitcher of warm water two heaping teaspoonfuls of common salt and one teaspoonful of mustard to each pint of water. Give glass after glass until vomiting is severe.

Also give the whites of one or two eggs, or a cup of strong black coffee.

Carbolic Acid—Doses of weak spirits of ammonia, if the patient can swallow. Stomach pump as soon as possible.

Oxalic Acid—Magnesia or chalk and water in large doses, repeat frequently.

Ammonia—Vinegar in frequent doses.

Opium or Laudanum—Emetic of mustard and water; keep the patient in motion and use a stomach pump as soon as possible. Also give strong black coffee.

Oil of Vitriol or Aqua Fortis—Large doses of magnesia and water.

In connection with the disappearance of Mrs. Winters in the Osprey marsh it is interesting to note that some forty years ago a man was found dead in the marsh by a party of huckleberry pickers. The remains were badly decomposed and the man had worn a good blue serge suit and carried a valise containing underclothing, but there was nothing by which the remains could be identified. As to Detective Reburn's theory that Mrs Winters sank to her death in the marsh, the majority of people scout the idea. They say there is no place in the marsh capable of swallowing up a person in that manner.—Flesherton Advance.

The Bruce county judge follows the ruling of Judge Doyle of Huron but at Paisley court of revision would not consider the opposite ruling of the Dufferin county Judge as the latter has not appeared in the law reports and therefore could not be accepted as a precedent. Neither would Judge Klein listen to any arguments advanced by Paisley council, stating that all had been heard over and over again. Whether Judge Doyle and Judge Klein are absolutely right or wrong according to law The advocate is not prepared to argue. The lawyers should be able to handle that part of the subject. We do say however that hotel-keepers in Paisley or any other place have the same right to pay a business tax as the painter, the grocer, the dry goods dealer, the liveryman or any other man paying such a tax, and a most glaring legal absurdity is manifest in the situation here.

MANY THOUSAND MEN REQUIRED

Thousands of Men will be required from Ontario to help in the great work of harvesting the Western crop, and practically the entire task of transporting this great army of Harvesters to the West will fall to the lot of the Canadian Pacific Railway.

Excursions from points in Ontario to Manitoba, Saskatchewan and Alberta will be run, and special trains operated, making the trip in about thirty six hours and avoiding any change of cars or transfers.

"Going Trip West," $12.00 to Winnipeg.

"Return Trip East," $18.00 from Winnipeg.

effect those who are not in it. I do not often give you a glimpse behind the scenes but sometimes when I think of it I get so——hot under the collar that I have to let off. I was strongly tempted to write and answer that fellow who wrote in the Walkerton Times who said he hoped the Allies would not use anything so cruel. Just wish he could stand up to it for five minutes or if he has a son to see him biting holes in the air to get breath. There is an English regiment beside us. The old Colonel is quite a card. He had a little yellow triangle sewed on the back of his men's coats so that he could tell them. He says among other things when his men hear other fellows say they have a yellow streak it makes them fighting mad and they are ready to clean up on anything.

The crops are certainly growing and there is no waste land. The farms are small but they are made the best of. The women are doing a great deal of the work at present. Here they do their churning, cutting roots by dog power. There is a big wheel eight feet in diameter in which the dog stands and works, as in a treadmill. They always put a plate of bones outside, that he gets when he is through.

Think I told you I saw Fritz Robinson's grave. Am enclosing you a picture of it. I think it will be fixed up by the members of his battalion later. From what I hear he died very quickly. Col. Beecher died shortly after reaching the dressing station. We knew all those boys having been in the same boat with them.

Sincerely,
"Jim."

Didn't Want Work.

Three Englishmen came here on Friday looking for work, and praying that they would not find it. They claimed to have families depending upon them, but refused to work unless given a guarantee that they would earn $2.00 a day pulling flax. They admitted that they had been out of work for two months, and then refused the offer of steady employment for the summer and fall, and possibly all winter. It is very discouraging for those who are endeavoring to help men who are out of work, when they meet men of this class.—Ripley Express.

Girls Break Camp
The bevy of local young ladies who have been tenting down the river, broke up camp on Tuesday after spending three enjoyable weeks on the banks of the Saugeen. Nevertheless the girls were glad to get back to home, sweet home, where they secure more substantial grub, and where the "skeeters" are not as bothersome and where they can go to sleep without being in fear and trembling lest some horrible man might venture within a mile of their abode.

Death of Mrs. Wallace.
The death occurred in Walkerton on Monday of this week of one of the towns most respected citizens in the person of Mrs. Jane Wallace, relict of the late Thos Wallace, who passed away at her home on Yonge st. after a lengthy illness. The deceased who was eighty-two years of age was one of the pioneers of the township of Greenock and moved to Walkerton some years ago. She is survived by three sons and two daughters, viz:—Samuel of Carrick, and John and Thos who reside on the old homestead, concession 1, Greenock, and Misses Emma and Minnie at home, the former, being a clerk at Bremner's Fair. The surviving family have the sympathy of many friends in their bereavement. The funeral took place from her late residence on Wednesday afternoon to the Baptist cemetery in Greenock.

Operated on.
Mrs. Wilson, wife of Mr. O. R. Wilson, tailor at G. T. Rourke's, was suddenly striken with appendicitis on Sunday last and removed to the hospital. Although an operation was immediately performed, the appendix had broken and her condition in consequence was for a time precarious. We are pleased to report now, however, that she is recovering and is almost out of danger.

Horse Breaks through Floor.
While being taken out to water on Tuesday evening, one of George Bros, fine grey horses broke through the flooring of the livery. Fortunately the animal was very quiet and help being close at hand, part of the floor was ripped up and it was soon back on solid footing, with no greater injury than a scraped and slightly strained hind leg.

Hurt in Runaway
A fractious colt which Mr. Jacob Waechter was driving near his home on Gibson st. early Tuesday afternoon became unmanageable and proceeded to do the runaway stunt. Mr. Waechter pluckily held to the reins, but when the animal made the corner at Mr. Andrew McLean's at break-neck speed, the buggy was overturned and he was thrown violently to the ground. He was rendered unconscious and remained in this condition for some minutes. The injured man was removed to his home where Dr. Stalker on being summoned found that the extent of his injuries was a severe shaking up. Although Mr. Waechter is well up in years, no serious results are anticipated. The runaway horse plunged down the steep embankment into Mr. McLean's garden and was not stopped until the buggy and harness were badly wrecked.

Walkerton 8, Fergus 5.
The first junior O.A.L.A. semi-final lacrosse match between Walkerton and Fergus was played at the exhibition grounds on Friday evening and resulted in a win for Walkerton by a score of 8 goals to 5. The first part of the game was rather listless, Fergus having things all their own way, but the locals came back with a vengeance in the second half, and when time was called had overcome the visitor's early lead and made the score 8-5 in their favor. The final game is in progress in Fergus as we go to press and the locals are confident of maintaining the lead which they gained here. The teams lined up:—

Successful Tournament.
Although somewhat spoiled by the heavy rain of Thursday, the first tournament of the Cargill Bowling Club was a success. There were twenty-four rinks in the competition, the majority being from neighboring towns and most of the games were closely contested. Of the five Walkerton rinks, Lay's was the only one to get into the semi-finals of the trophy, but was downed by Fowlie of Cargill and was later put out of the Consolation running. The only local rink to get into the money was the "Colt" rink comprised of Wesley, Vogan, Huether and Eidt, (sk.), who after having one loss and six wins to their credit were beaten in the final game of the Consolation by Zimmerman of Cargill by two shots, the score standing 16-14. As second prize, each member of the rink received a cut-glass berry bowl. Cargill rinks did well, Fowlie, winning second in the trophy event and Zimmerman first in the Consolation. Allen of Lucknow carried off the trophy.

These young soldiers, Privates, Dick Addley, Norm Denny, Fred Jewell, Ray Hyslop and Simon Small Victor Bell expect to be in England within two weeks.

Patriotic Committee
The patriotic committee for machine guns, etc. appointed at a public meeting on Tuesday, Aug. 10th met in the Council Chamber on Saturday evening last, for organization purposes, and was well attended, the following officers were elected: Chairman, D. Robertson, Sect'y. Geo. D. McKay; Treas K. M. Taylor, Executive Committee D. Robertson, R. E. Truax M. P., Jas Coulter, H.M. Lay, F. W. Lippert, Abr. Rowand, W. J. McNally, A.E. McNab and Geo. D. McKay. The committee are getting in touch with all the municipalities in the County, and are seeking their co-operation in the good cause, and it is hoped that they will meet with the success which is attending this movement in other Counties in Ontario.

Thirty Days in Gaol.
John Gillen's craving for the flowing bowl, has, as on innumerable former occasions, once more been the means of causing his downfall and as result of his latest escapade he will spend a term of thirty day at castle McKechnie. Gillen, as is well known, is on the town's prohibitory list and being unable to secure booze for himself, he despatched his son to the brewery one day last week with orders to purchase two kegs of beer. Although only nineteen, the youth gave his age as twenty-one and thus secured the wet goods in the debauch, which followed, Gillen maltreated his wife as a result of which performance, she laid an information against him charging him with assault and on learning the facts of the case, License Inspector White laid a second charge against him, that of procuring liquor while on the interdictory list. He appeared before Magistrates Richardson and Lambertus on Saturday morning and being found guilty on the latter charge, was sentenced to thirty days in gaol, while the hearing of the assault charge was deferred until Friday next at 10 o'clock.

Talk About Consistency
Although the Herald and Times has been persistently blowing the recruiting horn and blowing it long and loud, calling upon young men in no uncertain terms to enlist, when Gus Jenkins, the assistant at the Savoy Cafe signed up last week, our contemporary made light of the matter, referring to Private Jenkins as the corpulant cook and stated that he would soon be carving bigger game. It seems that the Times editor can take nothing seriously, but after calling for recruits as he has done, in making light of Jenkin's enlisting he has displayed a grave breach of consistency. Would it not have been better had he devoted his space to complimenting and praising the one who was giving his all for his country's sake than to make unkind reference to his personal appearance and intimating that he was somewhat of a barbarian? If the Times man had done this it would have carried more weight with other young men, than a dozen columns of his usual buncom in which he refers to them as sluggards black-snaking in the sun, etc.

Patriotic Meeting
A Patriotic meeting will be held in the Town Hall on Tuesday evening August 24th. Adresses will be delivered by W. G. Weichel, M. P., R. E Truax M. P. and other prominent speakers. A good attendance is ask for. Everybody welcome.

Patriotic Social.
A patriotic lawn social under the auspices of the North Brant Presbyterian church will be held at Millers orchard, Malcolm, on Thursday evening, the 26th of Aug. A good programme is being prepared. A fish pond will be one of the attractions. Every body welcome. Admission 25 and 15 cents.

Annual Flower Show.
The Walkerton Horticultural Society will hold their annual flower show in the Town Hall, on Friday the 27th Aug. 1915. And with the consent of the exhibitor. All cut flowers exhibited will be sold at the close of the show. Proceeds to be given in aid of the Bruce County Hospital.—Jas Tolton, Secty.

Will Speak in Durham.
Col. J. A. Currie M. P. who commanded the Highland Brigade at the battle of St. Julien will deliver an address on actual conditions on the firing line at a garden party to be held on Dr. Jamieson's lawn in Durham on Monday next August 23rd. Everyone who is in a position to do so is urged to attend.

Played Tie Game
The Mildmay and Listowel football teams played the first game in the final series for the W.F.A. championship in the former town on Monday, the tussel for supremacy resulting in a draw, neither team being able to score. The Mildmay boys did not play their usual close-checking, stellar game and Listowel had a shade the better of the play. If our southern neighbors wish to land the championship, several of the players will have to change their style of kicking in the final game to be played in Listowel on Friday of this week.

A Miraculous Escape.
The infant child of Mr. and Mrs. Wm White had a miraculous escape from death or serious injury on Saturday afternoon last. The child's elder sister was wheeling the infant along Scott st., in a go-cart, when, Mr. Techirhart's horse which was tied to an electric light pole in front of Mrs. Pilta's residence, took fright and jumped onto the sidewalk directly on top of the carriage. The animal and buggy passed over it and passersby who saw the accident hurried to the scene expecting to find a lifeless body but were astounded when on picking up the child found that although the go-cart was demolished she had miraculously escaped, suffering no greater injury than a slight bruise. The horse which broke away was later caught further down the street, with but little damage done to the outfit.

Young Soldier in Trouble.
A young soldier of the 34th at London who spent the week-end at his home here, figured in a rather ludicrous episode in the late hours of Monday night. He apparently imbibed too freely and in attempting to get to his home in the east ward lost his bearings landing at the house of a neighbor. He found the door locked, but regardless of this, he forced an entrance, climbed the stairs, dismantled and crawled into bed with a juvenile member of the family. In getting into the house, the intruder aroused the household who hurried to the nearest telephone and summoned the police. In the meantime, however, the young soldier had sobered somewhat and come to a realization of his position and becoming alarmed, dawned his trousers and jumped out of the upstair window, and made his way home. He was allowed to spend the remainder of the night in peace, but was arrested in the morning and taken before the Magistrate, who allowed him to go, provided he return at once to his battalion in London.

PRIVATE KINGSBURY WRITES

Sandling Camp,
Hythe, Kent
England.
1st 8/15

Dear Mr. Truax:

I guess it's about time to drop a line to you to tell you what is going on at Sandling. We have been here three months, and have had good hard training all the time. Am glad to say I am feeling like a fighting cock, waiting to do my little bit.

Three weeks ago Sir Robert Borden was down here and also the Hon. Sam Hughes, to inspect the whole of the Second Canadian Division, there were forty thousand troops present in the march past. The inspection took place two miles from camp, and weather conditions were fine and I can tell you it was a fine sight to see so many

Just at midnight the watchers around the bed heard him murmur, "Peace, peace, at last!" And the Prior bending over him, found the old man dead, with a smile on his face. The body, dressed in full pontificals, was stretched on a bier, with waxen tapers set around it, and the bell was tolled, that the monks might know the Abbey of St. Edmund was orphaned. These services performed, the Prior and Sub Prior departed, leaving Jocelin in charge of Bradfield house; where, surrounded by weeping servants and praying brethren, he passed the night beside the bier; while the Prior sat until morning writing the news to various prelates and dignitaries of the church.

The day broke gray and chill. While Jocelin still watched; and Samson mused in his prison house, the monks, after Prime, talked in the refectory among themselves of the election of a new Abbot.

"Now, it seems to me, Brother Tristian," said John O'Dice, "that if the Prior is set in our dead Abbot's place—Mary rest his soul! we will go on eating less and less until we will die of hunger. The Sub Prior, as thou knowest," with a grimace of dislike over the name, "beshrew me, is but an Abbey Lubber with no more learning than thou or I, so what doth our house for an Abbas?" Brother Tristian answered slowly, with the hesitating manner of one who speaks seldom. His shrill voice attracted the attention of the others, who stilled their talk to listen.

"Brother Jocelin remains the only learned one, save Walter the Medicus. Aye, we are fallen into bad times; as the Sub Prior said last eve at meat. I remember when we had ten limners and fifty monks of the schools amongst us. Jocelin is the only one fitted for the Abbotship."

"Peste!" ejaculated Brother Walter, "a popinjay of twenty. Thou forgettest Samson. St. Edmunds cannot be abbotted by one so young."

"Nay, nay," growled Richard of Hennan, and the other monks voiced their approval of his sentiments; leaving the morning meal in groups of two and three, still discussing who should fill the Abbot's place; while the dead man lay decked with jeweled mitre and robe, the crook in his right hand, and the guttering tapers falling about him in the cold morning light. Upon the wall, above his bier, was painted the martyrdom of St. Edmund, and below this a carved figure of the angel Michael supporting a scroll, whereon was inscribed in letters of gold:

"Earthe oute of Earthe ys wondorly wrought,
Earthe hath gotyn uppon Earthe a dygnyte of nought
Earthe uppon Earthe hath set all hys thought.
How Earthe uppon Earthe may be hey brought."

CHAPTER IV.

So large were the securities and mortgages held against the Abbey by Benedict, the chief creditor, that he, with several of his brethren, had bought land from the town folk of St. Edmunds, and erected a stone house where they could be near their debtors. Here they had dwelt for some years, like vultures waiting for a chance to descend upon their prey.

The Jews had suffered long and cruel oppression from the people of England in general, and the church in particular; but at last the time had come in which it seemed possible that Benedict and his friends would become revenged upon their old-time enemies. Becoming aware of the disorganization of the Abbey, they took advantage of the general excitement, on the morning after the Abbot's death, to seize upon certain chests of gold, vessels of silver, as well as silver and some rare and precious relics, and, departing suddenly for London, they declared that they would hold them until proper indemnity was paid.

The Prior, in dismay, wrote a lengthy memorial to Prince John, setting forth the state of affairs, begging that they be speedily allowed to elect an Abbot, and that the Jews be compelled to disgorge their plunder. This missive was signed by the Abbey advocates, lords strong in fortress, famous for prowess in war, and was, as far as the abbotship went, a declaration that the monks and knights belonging to the Abbey would hold an election.

This parchment was carried to Prince John one morning as he sat breakfasting at his toilet in his chamber in Northampton Castle. He intended going hawking, and the delay caused by the arrival of this unwelcome message so vexed him that his attendants fared badly, and more than one suitor had a tap from his dagger hilt. One unfortunate varlet received the remains of a venison pasty full in the face, with its silver trencher to keep it company, because he tied the points of the Prince's red Norman shoes to his garters, instead of to his knees, as was his wont to wear them.

His toilet completed, the Prince dismissed all of his attendants save one, a heavy jowled, handsome young man of twenty-five, rather obese for his age, and dressed in the richly furred robe of a Chancellor. This courtier, noting his highness' ill-humor, remained discreetly silent, taking up a lute from a bench near by and beginning to strum idly upon it (though softly) with his white bejeweled fingers.

John himself had borrowed largely from the Jews of whom the Prior's [illegible] family of Benedict, more than once, against the charges of St. Edmundsbury; as the Abbey and its knights were loyal to the absent King Richard, and the Prince (who conspired with France against his brother) was not sorry to see the Abbey's pride laid low. Indeed, he had cause to fear and dislike the church, for the great Abbeys of England were mighty factors of power, and, joined with the haughty, rebellious nobles, resisted and defied John and the other Regents, the Bishops of Ely and Waltham, whom Richard had left to rule England rather than allow the reins of government to fall into his brother's hands. They, however, looking to John as their future King (if his conspiracy with Philip of France was successful), allowed him to dictate the policy of the government, and assume the role of England's ruler.

Prince John finally threw aside the Prior's missive with an exclamation of disgust. "By our Lady," he said to his friend and confidant, Chancellor Geoffrey, "if the Lion of England would but come again to his lair long enough to crush these bickerings, and smite these proud Abbots and nobles to the dust, then could I make England such another kingdom as that my cousin France boasts of."

"But, my Prince, were it not best to pray that the Lion would then return to gnaw the Infidel's bones, and leave thee undisturbed to rule in peace?" the other asked softly and maliciously.

John turned his little eyes frowningly on the favorite. "Thou viper, whom I took unto my breast from the convent dunghill whereon thy mother reared her king's brat, needest remind me that I am not yet king. That I must still bend subservient knee to the preading brigand whom foul fortune hath made England's ruler?"

Geoffrey's face reddened at the insult, but he bit his lip, and affected to hum a song to his lute strumming. His mother, Rosamund de Clifford, when driven by the Queen from the royal manor, where she held sway over the heart of Henry, had retired to a Priory near St. Edmundsbury, an there had reared her son, becoming in course of time Prioress, and gaining great fame throughout the country for her virtuous indignation and duress against fragile females. When her son became too old to remain in the convent without scandal, Rosamund sent him to the Abbey schools, and, in lack of any other career (for no great noble would take him as page), she wished to place him as novice at St. Edmundsbury, but the Abbott, for political reasons, refused to receive so undesirable an inmate, and Lady Rosamund was in despair. It was then a courtier who had loved her when she was mistress of the King placed him at court as a Herald, under the unpretentious name of "Master Geoffrey," but after a few months the keen eyes of the Queen spied him out; and, exiled from court, back he must pack to the Priory; for at the age of twenty he knew no more of the profession of arms, save for a little fencing, than a lady's puny page. And thus, with Church and Field closed against him, it would have fared hard with the man, if Prince John (pride and delight of Elinor's heart) had not become attached to him. Finding him with his subservient gaiety, ready wit and flattering tongue the ideal courtier, he demanded that his half-brother be provided for, and as is customary with sons of doting mothers, he had his will. Queen Elinor forewent her hatred against the son of a whilom rival, and Geoffrey was appointed Chancellor. Since Richard's departure, he had ever been at John's right hand a tutor and a sharer in his excesses, a plotter and go-between; the jackal that skulked in the wake of this princely cub.

Like King Henry in feature Geoffrey was his mother's true son,—well schooled in his years of seclusion; though the insolent irascibility, inherited from his father, sometimes showed, despite himself—as on this occasion. So while he sang a roundelay of "Maidens fair with breasts of snow," he cursed himself heartily for his short wit and long tongue. But happily, John was too changeable of mood to be long vexed at the one man who could charm away that bete noire of Princes, ennui; and soon turned from the casement where he had stalked in a pet at his brother's inconsiderate reminder, and, laying his hand, hand upon his shoulder, said:

"Nay, Geoffrey, I know thou didst not mean it thus. I have a very devil in me, methinks sometimes, that twists everything askew, and this complaint from the Prior of St. Edmunds, with its insolent accompaniment, vexeth me sore."

"Ods Bodkins! Let the Jew, Benedict, raze the whole damned pile to the earth; 'twill but fill his coffers the fuller, and thence we can draw shekels to fill our own depleted purses. Eh, brother?"

Smiling at this sally, John continued, "Abbot Hugo is dead, and we must appoint another Abbot, though they do so boldly declare the right of election; and as the Abbot, by right of much fief holding, is among the counsellors of the King, beshrew me, Geff, if I wish not now that thou hadst become the snivelling novice thy mother would have made thee. And by my troth, thou'lt be a mitered Abbot on the morrow!"

Laughing loudly at this, the Favorite clapped the Prince on the back, declaring him to be the most "kingly of kings," and they went to mount their gayly caparisoned horses, and ride away to hawk, followed by a brilliant retinue of lords and ladies. The Prince was in high good humor at the turn his thoughts had taken, and soon imparted them to the rest of the company, so that Geoffrey continued to be addressed all morning by the title of "Abbot."

CHAPTER V.

On a bier, before St. Edmund's high altar, lay the body of Hugo. The tapers' yellow light concentrated around the heavy velvet pall which enveloped it, irradiating from the golden fringe, until the Abbot seemed already surrounded by an aureole of glory. The gold and jewels that decked the altar and shrine cast back the reflection until objects near by were wrapped in a brilliant circle of light, surrounded by the darkness of the great church, whose dim vistas stretched on either hand.

Far down the Abbey wall the rising moon peeped in through the pointed window panes; her light separated as it fell upon the tesselated floor into great blotches of green and blue, red and gold, by mullions and tracery of most exquisite designs. Above, the tall shafts mounted in massive pride to spread into carved branches upholding the vaulted dome; all showing but dimly, though a hundred tapers would not have dispelled the black shadows massed there by centuries of nights. Thus in state, Hugo had lain seven days and nights, guarded well by his faithful monks. Abbot Hugo now no longer only a pallid, shriveled old man, who, becoming tired of life's burdens had doffed the cloak of mortality, and lain down to rest, leaving the crude of human greatness lying idle and neglected about his couch.

At midnight the Abbey bell began to sound, and the watchers beside the bier disappeared into the semi-darkness of the side aisle. The great door swung open slowly and silently; the organ pealed forth, and up the broad centre aisle came the Bishop of Waltham in full sacerdotals. Behind him the Prior, carrying a silver clasped Missal, led the long procession of monks, who came two by two in sable cowls and scapulars and white stoles. Wending their way to the altar in a blaze of light (for each monk carried a morning taper), and in their midst the bejeweled Host glittered like a miniature sun. When the procession reached the altar, it opened to right and left and formed two dark wings on either side of the Bishop's purple robed, lace-draped figure. Then mass was sung with all due pomp and ceremony; prayers were said, and from the fretted choir above them rolled out the solemn notes of the Requiem; while the aromatic smoke of incense enveloped them in a fragrant cloud. When the last notes of the chant had died away, the dead Abbot was laid in a niche cut in the rock of the transept wall, and covered with a slab of polished basalt, whereon was carved his name and degree, above the mitre and crook that his brethren before him had fought long and bitterly to bear.

Thus they left him, to lie through the years, while other Abbots came and went, and ever changing bands of monks murmured their prayers above his unhearing ears. Slowly, sadly, the procession passed, each monk extinguishing his taper at the tomb; and, as the last footfall died away, the bells tolled out a knell for the departed soul.

Yet, there was one who lingered there; the Norfolk monk, Samson (released from his prison tower), paced long beneath the great mullioned window, pondering deeply, murmuring to himself; sometimes stretching his hands towards the altar, as if he called the saint to witness some vow he made. "The occasion maketh the man," and in crisis there is ever some one superior to the rest, who steps forward from the ranks and lays his hand upon the rein, and men recognizing in him a leader, follow him. And Samson, the "man" for the occasion of St. Edmunds' orphaning, swore upon her altar to be a father to the orphaned Abbey: to be its Abbas Dominus.

Samson had a few friends and followers in the Abbey (though they had been obscured by the general cloud of his unpopularity), and they saw that his was the only hand strong enough to wield the mitre, and raise the Abbey to power and opulence. So, the next morning, when the Prior had summoned the brethren to the Chapter room, and had sworn them to deal justly, they duly appointed twelve of the brethren to repair with the Prior to Waltham Manor, where their Abbot would be elected, and Samson was among those chosen.

When the twelve were counted, Jocelin, Walter the Medicus, and Sacklon, with the Prior and Sub-Prior, and several of the elder monks, made up the number. Now the Prior, believing that the Abbey would never recover from the ruinous state into which its affairs had lapsed, had no wish to be Abbot. Besides, he desired to pass his declining days in Rome, on the residue of the convent treasure left by the Jews (which he had carefully appropriated and concealed). So, unconcerned, having already applied to the Pope for office, he [illegible] carelessly, wondering on whose head the mitre would fall, and he, too, thought that Samson was the only one of them fitted to be Abbot.

John O'Dice and Brother Tristian were of the twelve, and they had little preference beyond desiring that the hated Sub-Prior was not set at their head. Richard of Hennan inclined toward Samson, for he was the only man of brawn and bulk in the Abbey, and butcher Richard had no standard save "muscle."

"Will the Prince permit us to choose whom we will?" asked John O'Dice.

"It is our right, and if he does not," snapped Walter, "we can protest and appeal to the Holy Father."

"Ah, I hope we may do this in peace!" murmured Brother Tristian.

"Nay, nay," bawled Richard, "we'll get to arms 'neath our Advocates' banners, and elect whomsoe'er we please by force of arms." Thus [illegible] were the questionings and disputes, until Jocelin, the youngest of the body (who has hitherto kept modestly silent), spoke:

"What if we agree not among ourselves?" The electors stared at each other in consternation; they had not thought of that. They looked toward the Prior, but he was deep in reckoning the number of golden cups one could pack into a certain oaken chest, and heeded them not. The Sub-Prior was, as usual, half asleep. Jocelin, tutored by Samson, did not try to answer his own question. Then the big Norfolk monk said quietly:

"It seems best to me that we select six, who shall then agree on three names secretly: these they shall write and seal, and not open until in council with the Bishop of Waltham, when they shall be submitted and one Abbot chosen from them." Relieved to have their thinking done for them, the simple monks assented unanimously, and left the Chapter House, after having named the Prior, Sub Prior, Jocelin, Samson, Walter and old [illegible], who, agreeing on three names, [illegible] the parchment, and [illegible] presently on jennets, and after half a day's ride, knocked at the gate of my Lord the Bishop.

The courtyard was [illegible] soldiers, church servitors and [illegible] with an occasional [illegible] through and fro, and [illegible] was the subject of many a [illegible] jest.

"Here cometh fat, black ducks for Prince John's picking," called one soldier to a fellow, who, stripped to the waist, was burnishing his [illegible]. The polisher had his mouth filled with water (which from time to time he squirted upon the hauberk to accelerate the cleaning process), so he made no answer to this pleasantry, save by an inarticulate grunt. But the portly Seneschal, who came forward to greet the monks, cursed the jester heartily.

"God's malison on thee, thou jork! From those holy men the Abbot of Bury is to be chosen. In my youthful days such as thou wore a collar of brass about his neck, and was whipped with the dog lash if he but spake too loud; but now every popinjay page and prating fool bawleth abroad his fooleries, with none to say him nay." This rebuke somewhat silenced their ribaldry, though there was still much laughter over the poor equipment of the monks, and the effeminate way in which they drew their robes through the crook of the elbow.

The Seneschal led them into a large hall, where a fire had been kindled to ward off the evening chill. Here, on a dais, was Prince John; behind him stood Geoffrey, and at his right hand sat the Bishop of Waltham. All the monks bowed low save Samson, who scarcely bent his untonsured head, then the Prior went forward, and when he had kissed the Prince's hand, he and the bishop conferred apart for some time.

Failures of Soldiers' Armor.

Many years ago several inventors developed bullet proof cloths or breastplates, and in spite of much advertising their suggestions were never adopted, much to the surprise of civilians. The reason is very simple. If the bullet is stopped its energy is transmitted to the shield, which in turn delivers a blow to the soldier's body. The severity of the blow depends upon the velocity of the bullet, and if the shield is very light the chest wall receives more or less injury. In order to be effective the shield must weigh at least ten pounds.

It is a repetition of the old circus trick of striking with a sledgehammer an anvil on a man's chest. If in place of the anvil we substitute a thin metal plate the blow would be fatal, and the sledgehammer has about the same energy as a bullet at high velocity. If the shield weighs but six or eight pounds the blow of the bullet almost knocks a man down. Soldiers are not to wear armor, but to get behind it, as in armored ships, forts and motor-cars.—London Tatler.

GERMAN FINANCE

The minuteness and detail of German misrepresentations are quite extraordinary, and one is not surprised to find that they have taken considerable trouble to mislead the public on this continent into the belief that the condition of their national finances is in some way superior to that of the British Empire. In point of fact the two positions are scarcely a subject for comparison, but are clearly a matter of contrast.

German methods of war finance are curiously like their conduct of the war itself. They are based on the supposition that Germany must win. If and when she is defeated, and defeated she assuredly will be, and instead of receiving war indemnities she has to pay them, the financial confusion cannot fail to be appalling. From the days when certain of our early English kings "clipped" the coinage to make their store of gold and silver go further, debasement and inflation of currency have been the familiar incidents of clever but desperate national finance.

By the exercise of great pressure the German Government have accumulated in the Reichsbank some £120,000,000 of gold. This seems to have been skilfully and effectively done, and undoubtedly there is extremely little gold in Germany apart from this well advertised store. But of the Reichsbank notes alone there are issued some £270,000,000, and in addition to that an unknown amount of notes issued by the Government against which no gold at all is held. This is complete mobilization dear to the German mind and terribly effective for the first blow, but leaving no "unseen reserve."

Probably the debts "on balance" due by German bankers to London and Paris, together with interest on loans necessarily unpaid during the war, all of which automatically fall due on the conclusion of peace, amount to a total far exceeding the sum of Germany's gold, so that the appearance of strength given by skilful mobilization disappears under analysis.

It is necessary to remember that Germany is almost entirely deprived of foreign trade. She is, in effect, together with Austria-Hungary, reduced to almost complete financial and commercial isolation. Under these conditions, and so long as they last, various things are possible that will become quite impossible immediately that relations with the outside world are resumed. For example, the forcing of all the gold into the vaults of the official bank, the entire drainage of all the ordinary repositories of gold coin, has two important effects. First of all it gives an impressive stand to the bankers represented and the Reichsbank's reserve. In the second place it deprives the new paper currency of competition with coin. In that way, if the matter is conducted with the skill of which German organizers are thoroughly capable, there is no reason why, during the war, it should not remain at what might be considered par, for the simple reason that it has nothing with which it can be compared. One indication from outside that is visible in respect to the effects of an exclusive paper currency is that so far as foreign exchange is concerned German bills are at a discount of some 15 per cent. One thing, and one thing only, could rescue Germany from a condition dangerously like national insolvency, and that is success sufficiently decisive to enable her to exact heavy indemnities. Anything short of that would not only fail to avert financial disaster little short of ruin, but would leave an industrial and commercial situation of unparalleled and almost insurmountable difficulty.

The British position presents an almost complete contrast to the German. First, there has been no complete mobilization of gold and no systematic effort to force gold from private persons into the Bank of England. Second, the total of notes issued for all purposes is much more than covered pound by pound by the gold in the Bank of England. Third, besides all this gold, there remains a large amount in the hands of the banks other than the Bank of England, and the general public. In other words, British finance is definitely on a gold basis. The British Empire is financing the war by borrowing from its own people on a legitimate interest-bearing basis, and at the close of the war there need be no confusion, but an ascertainable increase in public debt and revenue requirements.

This description will on the whole adequately apply to Canada and the other great dominions of the British Empire.

Purse Proud.

"The world reproaches us nouveaux riches with being purse proud," said one of them the other day. "Well, my reply is that nobody is so purse proud as your old aristocracy. There's a story, too, that bears me out.

"It's a story about one of the Stuyvesants, or Livingstons, or Rhinelanders—I'm not quite sure of the name, but it was a real New York first family. Miss Rhinelander, if that was the lady, had a back yard abutting on a sky-scraper hotel. Well, the hotel got very prosperous, and one day the proprietor wrote to her:

"Madam, how much do you want for your back yard, as I wish to enlarge my hotel?"

"The haughty lady wrote back:

"Sir, how much do you want for your hotel, as I wish to enlarge my back yard?"—Washington Star.

An Apt Student.

A young woman who went to Columbia to take her degree of doctor of philosophy married her professor in the middle of her second year. When she announced her engagement one of her friends said:

"So I did," replied Edith, "but I had no idea I would get him so soon."—New York Post.

WORK OF THE CRUISERS.

The cruiser in time of war has to perform perhaps more varied functions than any other class of warship in the fleet.

It is her business to stop and fight when the circumstances are, from her point of view, favorable and also to possess a high speed to enable her to run away when the position is unfavorable.

The cruiser is admirably termed the policeman of the fleet, for her capacities of mobility and long passage making without replenishing her bunkers are her chief attributes.

Although the introduction of wireless telegraphy has somewhat lessened the responsibility placed upon the cruiser for scouting work, she is still regarded as the "eyes of the fleet."

The armored cruiser's advent has almost extended that class of ship to be considered to come within the scope of the battleship. Indeed, in some cases they are so perfectly equipped in aggressive policy as to be deemed competent enough to be in the battle line with the "capital ships."—London Answers.

The Largest Frog.

Among the rare specimens not open to public inspection in the Harvard zoological museum is what is claimed to be the largest frog in the world. It weighs about six pounds, is twenty-seven inches long from tip to toe and of a slaty black color. Its web feet are equal in size to those of a large swan. But three of its kind have ever reached the United States. Dr. Boulenger, of the British museum, was the discoverer of this new species in 1906 while on an expedition in central Africa. All known specimens have been found in two districts, called Kribi and Efulen, of the German colony Kamerun.

The Cruel Schoolmaster.

Dear sir, My son writes me that he has to study too hard. He says he has to translate fifty hexameters of Latin a day. I looked "hexameter" up in the dictionary and find it is a poetic verse of six feet. Now, that makes 300 feet, or 100 yards of poetry for my poor son to translate each day. I think about half a hexameter or six [illegible] of this Latin is enough for a boy of his age. Yours truly, Mrs. Blank.

Spinning a Web.

A patient Englishman, who last summer watched a garden spider spin its web from start to finish, has told what he saw to Knowledge. At half past 5 o'clock in the evening the spider, a full grown female, began work by dragging [illegible] of a pine tree to another below and there making fast a line, which eventually formed two of the perpendicular radiating lines of the web. From that time it continued to work without interruption until twenty-five minutes after 1 the next morning. The network and the radial lines were done by half past 12 and the spiral part of the web was consequently made in less than an hour. He says the finished web was one of the most perfect he has ever seen.

WHAT THEY COST.

The report of the British Comptroller and Auditor-General upon the dockyard expense and manufacturing accounts for the year ended March 31, 1914, has been published in a blue book. The total cost of several ships which have been mentioned during the war is an interesting item. Thus the Iron Duke cost £1,899,915, the Lion £1,970,815, the Ajax £1,796,945, the Audacious £1,816,815, the Princess Royal £1,967,927, and the Queen Mary £1,059,797. The Amphion, the first warship lost in the war cost £283,858. Coal and oil purchased for the Navy during the year amounted to £3,276,856. The total cost of combatant ships on the active list is given at £171,166,188.

Many new submarines are shown as having been under construction on March 31, 1914, including three boats of the "S" class, four of the "V" class, two of the "W" class and two special boats, Nautilus and Swordfish. The "S," "V," and "W" boats are being built by Vickers, Armstrong-Whitworth, and Scott's Company respectively. The aerial service accounted during the year for £241,231 expended on airships, aeroplanes, and seaplanes. The airships under construction were Nos. 3, 4, 5, 6, 7, 9, and 16, the maximum cost of any one ship being given as £33,414. In all about 150 vessels of various types are included under the heading of "new construction." Those British submarines are waiting for the day when Von Tirpitz pilots his fleet out of the Kiel canal.

DID HE DIE IN VAIN?

"You know why I am unhappy. It's not the dying, dear old girl, that worries me, and I know that you are as sure of that as I am that my number's up. I wouldn't put it so crudely, old lady, if we didn't both feel the truth, and if we couldn't both so honestly and so humbly, and without hypocrisy say, 'God's Will be done.' It was almost a comfort to me when I confessed to you that I knew I must face the 'Valley of the Shadow' in France, and you told me that you had the same premonition. What is it, I wonder, sister mine, this queer, psychic bond of the twin?

"Well, anyway, as I said, it's not the dying. I shall be just as jolly, right up to the end, as you will be brave afterwards: Don't tell the Mater anything till then. What DOES worry me as I squat here in my dug-out is whether I shall have died in vain.

"If I thought that I were to die in vain, I would, frankly, as I have told you, rather live and do something useful with my life. All the time I was on leave I was watching and listening, and watching: but, watch and listen as I did, I could not persuade myself that dear old England really understood—that she was really in earnest. And the thought is a nightmare to me. Up to the moment I die I shall be wondering whether my dear, kind, generous, forgiving, fat-headed fellow-countrymen will go and muck this war.

"A few successes—and then peace. An inconclusive peace, with all the bother to come again after a few years of anxiety, and then our being wiped out the next time war comes along. If that happens I shall have died in vain, and so will all the splendid fellows who have died before me, and who must die after me.

"This, to anyone else, might sound sickenly weak and morbid, perhaps even cowardly. But it isn't really so, because I am not the only one with the same dread. It's in the minds of many of us out here. They don't speak of it, but I KNOW. That wretched psychic sense again, I suppose!

"I think I would give even my soul to be sure that England understood, and would never give up the struggle till the Germans, with all their loathsome doctrines and their filthy methods, were smashed once and for all. If I were certain of that I would die as cheerfully as I have lived, and so would thousands more. But I'm NOT certain: and though I hope I don't funk anything that is coming to me, the agony of the doubt is great. I'm in the last moment the question will be throbbing about in my mind—SHALL I HAVE DIED IN VAIN?

"Do try and think of some way—as we agreed you should—to get this question home in England's heart when I am dead; not for my sake, it will be too late for me then—but for the sake of the rest."

The writer of the above letter is dead. His premonition was fulfilled. What of the question, "Shall I have died in vain?" This young soldier did not look for defeat of Britain, but was resolved on victory. But he dreaded an inconclusive peace—a patched-up affair. He was willing to make the "great sacrifice" for his country, provided his countrymen would see it through after his death. He had witnessed the titanic battle. He had seen his companions struggle day after day. He had seen them in the trenches, in the wind-swept, bitter cold winter, and he had seen them fight, fall and die all around him. He was willing to die the same death if God willed it. But he shrank from such a death if it were to be in vain. He had a dread of this death being in vain, and he looked for some assurance that it would not be so. He penned those words when alone and went to his death without the assurance with the great dread still on his mind.

It was only the other day that Premier Asquith counted up the hundreds of thousands of sons of the Empire who had died at the front. Have all those died in vain? Perish the thought. An indecisive peace, a peace for peace sake without the attainment of the objects for which Britain entered the war, would assuredly mean that all those brave deaths had been in vain. Peace without a free Belgium and a regenerated France would be a confession that these men had died in vain. It would mean that Britain had made all those sacrifices of everything that was sacred and dear in vain—that they might as well not have been made. Such a peace would be dishonoring to our hallowed and noble dead. But such a peace is unthinkable, and can never be. Better annihilation than such dishonor.

What after flame projectors? Is there anything else outside of Hades the Kaiser can make use of?

This is not a war of aggression on Britain's part, but we doubt if Germany will ever get back her colonies.

King Albert reports that the Belgian army is now as strong as it was at the beginning of the war. These contemptible little armies are wonders.

President Wilson proposes to ask Argentina, Brazil, Chile, Bolivia, Uruguay and Guatemala to join with the States in an effort to bring lasting peace to Mexico. This is better than coercion.

On August 4, 1914, the German Foreign Minister said: "It is evident that we could not advantageously annex Belgium without at the same time annexing Holland." Holland hasn't forgotten that statement.

It is said that part of the Hudson Bay Railway will be electrified. Grading gangs have reached a point within fifty miles of Port Nelson. The whole of the grading will be finished next year. The work is proceeding vigorously, and the line will be finished on time, we are told. The next question is, will the road pay?

There is some talk again of the hyphenated German-Americans making an attack on Canada some fine morning. Our home guards, to say nothing of our regular forces, should be able to deal with any such attack. But our home guards should be properly armed. They should have ammunition as well as rifles and a few machine guns as well.

"Ireland will be there." Sir John Simon, in the course of an address at the Mansion House, London, paid the following tribute to Ireland:

"When some new deed of gallantry comes to be acknowledged on behalf of his people by the King, whom we all serve, you may be sure that Ireland will be there. When anxious eyes scan the casualty lists in dread of reading some beloved name, Ireland is there. When the fatherless and widow wear with solemn pride the badge of their recent sacrifice, Ireland is there. And when this long agony is over, and liberty is restored to all the nations of the earth by the final overthrow of this hateful creed of tyranny, Ireland will assuredly be there."

The Frankfurter Zeitung is not pleased with the people of Luxemburg. It says that any prosperity they possess is due to Germany. In these circumstances it says it might have been assumed that the sympathies of the Luxembourgers would have been on the German side. But the anti-German feeling, cunningly stimulated from France, which frequently found expression in references to 'dirty Prussians,' quite in the French manner, has stifled all sentiments of recognition and thanks, and has induced the Luxemburgers to requite Germany's services and attentions with base ingratitude. The Zeitung further says that 8,678 Luxemburgers have joined the French army while none have joined the German army. This may be just another evidence that the small nations have no love for the Kaiser.

THE Changeling

Leading her to the sofa, while Rose, perfectly confounded, still stood within the door, he said to the half-crazed girl: "Margaret, I do not understand you. I never had a sister, and my father died when I was six months old. There must be some mistake. Will you tell me what you mean?"

Bewildered and perplexed, Margaret began a hasty repetition of Hagar's story, but ere it was three-fourths told, there came from the open door a wild cry of delight, and quick as lightning, a fairy form flew across the floor, while arms were twined round Maggie's neck, kiss after kiss was pressed upon her lips, and Rose's voice was in her ear, never before half so sweet as now, when it murmured soft and low to the weary girl: "My sister Maggie—mine you are—the child of my own father, for I was Rose Hamilton, called Warner, first to please my aunt, and next to please my Henry. Oh, Maggie darling, I am so happy now;" and the little snowy hands smoothed caressingly the bands of hair, so unlike her own fair waving tresses.

It was, indeed, a time of almost perfect bliss to them all, and for a moment Margaret forgot her pain, which, had Hagar known the truth, need not have come to her. But she scarcely regretted it now, when she felt Rose Warner's heart throbbing against her own, and knew their father was the same.

"You are tired," Rose said, at length, when much had been said by both. "You must have rest, and then I will bring to you my aunt, our aunt, Maggie—our father's sister. She has been a mother to me. She will be one to you. But stay," she continued, "you have had no breakfast. I will bring you some," and she tripped lightly from the room.

Maggie followed her with swimming eyes, then turning to Henry, she said: "You are very happy, I am sure."

"Yes, very," he answered, coming to her side. "Happy in my wife, happy in my newly-found sister," and he laid his hand on hers, with something of his former familiarity.

But the olden feeling was gone, and Maggie could not meet his glance without a blush, while he could talk with her as calmly as if she had never been aught to him save the sister of his wife. Thus often changeth the human heart's first love.

After a time Rose returned, bearing a silver tray heaped with the most tempting viands; but Maggie's heart was too full to eat, and after drinking a cup of the fragrant black tea, which Rose herself had made, she laid her head upon the pillow, which Henry brought, and with Rose sitting by, holding lovingly her hand, she fell into a quiet slumber. For several hours she slept, and when she awoke at last, the sun was shining in at the western window, casting over the floor a glimmering light, and reminding her so forcibly of the dancing shadow on the grass which grew around the old stone house, that her eyes filled with tears, and thinking herself alone, she murmured, "Will it ever be my home again?"

A sudden movement, the rustling of a dress, startled her, and, lifting up her head she saw standing near a pleasant-looking, middle-aged woman, who, she rightly guessed, was Mrs. Warner, her own aunt.

"Maggie," the lady said, laying her hand on the fevered brow. "I have heard a strange tale to-day. Heretofore I had supposed Rose to be my only child, but though you take me by surprise, you are not the less welcome. There is room in my heart for you, Maggie Miller, room for the youngest born of my only brother. You are somewhat like him, too," she continued, "though more like your mother," and with the mention of that name, a flush stole over the lady's face, for she, too, was very proud, and her brother's marriage with a servant girl had never been quite forgiven.

Mrs. Warner had seen much of the world, and Maggie knew her to be a woman of refinement, a woman whom even Madam Conway would not be ashamed; and winding her arms around her neck, she said, impulsively, "I am glad you are my aunt, and you will love me, I am sure, even if I am poor Hagar's grandchild."

Mrs. Warner knew nothing of Hagar, save from Henry's amusing description, the entire truth of which she somewhat doubted; but she knew that whatever Hagar Warren might be, the beautiful girl before her was not answerable for it, and very kindly she tried to soothe her, telling her how happy they would be together. "Rose will leave me in the autumn," she said, "and without you I should be all alone." Of Hagar, too, she spoke kindly, considerately, and Maggie, listening to her, felt somewhat reconciled to the fate which had made her what she was. Still, there was much of pride to overcome ere she could calmly think of herself as other than Madam Conway's grandchild; and when that afternoon, as Henry and Rose were sitting with her, the latter spoke of her mother, saying she had a faint remembrance of a tall, handsome girl, who sang her to sleep on the night when her own mother died, there came a visible shadow over Maggie's face, and instantly changing the conversation, she asked why Henry had never told her anything definite concerning himself and his family.

For a moment Henry seemed embarrassed. Both the Hamiltons and the Warners were very aristocratic in their feelings, and by mutual consent the name of Hester Warren was by them seldom spoken. Consequently, if there existed a reason for Henry's silence with regard to his own and Rose's history, it was that he disliked bringing up a subject he had been taught to avoid, both by his aunt and the mother of Mr. Hamilton, who for several years after her son's death had lived with her daughter in Leominster, where she finally died. This, however, he could not say to Margaret, and after a little hesitancy he answered, laughingly, "You never asked me for any particulars; and then, you know, I was more agreeably occupied than I should have been had I spent my time in enlightening you with regard to our ancestor;" and the saucy mouth smiled archly, first on Rose and then on Margaret, both of whom blushed slightly, the one suspecting he had not told the whole truth, and the other knowing he had not.

Very considerate was Rose of Maggie's feelings, and not again that afternoon did she speak of Hester, though she talked much of their father; and Margaret, listening to his praises, felt herself insensibly drawn toward this new claimant for her filial love. "I wish I could have seen him," she said, and starting to her feet Rose answered, "Strange I did not think of it before. We have his portrait. Come this way," and she led the half unwilling Mag into an adjoining room, where from the wall a portly, good-humored-looking man gazed down upon the sisters, his eyes seeming to rest with mournful tenderness on the face of her whom in life they had not looked upon. He seemed older than Mag had supposed, and the hair upon his head was white, reminding her of Hagar. But she did not, for this, turn from him away. There was something pleasing in the mild expression of his face, and she whispered faintly, "'Tis my father."

On the right of this portrait was another, the picture of a woman, in whose curling lip and soft brown eyes Mag recognized the mother of Henry. To the left was another still, and she gazed upon the angel face, with eyes of violet hue, and hair of golden brown, on which the fading sunlight now was falling, encircling it, as it were, with a halo of glory.

"You are much like her," she said to Rose, who made no answer, for she was thinking of another picture, which years before had been banished to the garret by her haughty grandmother as unworthy a place beside him who had petted and caressed the young girl of plebeian birth and kindred.

"I can make amends for it, though," thought Rose, returning with Maggie to the parlor; then, seeking out her husband, she held with him a whispered consultation, the result of which was that on the morrow there was a rummaging in the garret, an absence from home for an hour or two, and when about noon she returned there was a pleased expression on her face, as if she had accomplished her purpose, whatever it might have been.

All the morning Mag had been restless and uneasy, wandering listlessly from room to room, looking anxiously down the street, starting nervously at the sound of every footstep, while her cheeks alternately flushed and then grew pale as the day passed on. Dinner being over, she sat alone in the parlor, her eyes fixed upon the carpet, and her thoughts away with one who she vaguely hoped would have followed her ere this. True, she had added no postscript to tell him of her new discovery; but Hagar knew, and he would go to her for a confirmation of the letter. She would tell him where Mag was gone, and he, if his love could survive that shock, would follow her thither; nay, would be there that very day, and Maggie's heart grew wearier, fainter, as time wore on and he did not come. "I might have known it," she whispered sadly. "I did know that he would never more think of me," and she wept silently over her ruined love.

"Maggie, sister," came to her ear, and Rose was at her side. "I have a surprise for you, darling. Can you bear it now?"

Oh, how eagerly poor Maggie Miller looked up in Rose's face. The car whistle had sounded half an hour before. Could it be that he had come? Was he there? Did he love her still? No, Maggie, no; the surprise awaiting you is of a far different nature, and the tears flow afresh when Rose in reply to the question, "What is it darling?" answers, "It is this," at the same time placing in Maggie's hand an ambrotype which she bade her examine. With a feeling of keen disappointment, Maggie opened the casing, involuntarily shutting her eyes as if to gather strength for what she was to see.

It was a young face—a handsome face—a face much like her own, while in the curve of the upper lip, and the expression of the large black eyes, there was a look like Hagar Warren. They had met together thus, the one a living reality, the other a semblance of the dead, and she who held that picture trembled violently. There was a fierce struggle within, the wildly-beating heart throbbing for one moment with a new-born love, and then rebelling against taking that shadow, beautiful though it was, in place of her whose memory she had so long revered.

Maggie knew full well whose face it was she looked upon, but not yet could she speak that name so interwoven with memories of another, and she answered, mournfully, "It is Hester Hamilton."

"Yes, Margaret, your mother," said Rose. "I never called her by that name, but I respect her for your sake. She was my father's pet, they say, for he was comparatively old and she his young girl-wife."

"Where did you get this?" Maggie asked; and, coloring crimson, Rose replied: "We have always had her portrait, but grandmother, who was very old and foolishly proud about some things, was offended at our father's last marriage, and when, after his death, the portraits were brought here, she—forgive her, Maggie—she did not know you, or she would not have done it——"

"I know," interrupted Maggie. "She despised this Hester Warren, and consigned her portrait to some place from which you have brought it and had this taken from it."

"Not despise her," cried Rose, in great distress, as she saw a dark expression stealing over the face of Maggie, in whose heart a chord of sympathy had been struck, when she thought of her mother banished from her father's side. "Grandma could not despise her," continued Rose, "she was so good, so beautiful."

"Yes, she was beautiful," murmured Maggie, gazing earnestly upon the fair, round face, the soft, black eyes and raven hair of one who for years had slept beneath the shadow of the Hillsdale woods. "Oh, I wish I were dead, like her," she exclaimed, at last, closing the ambrotype and laying it on the table. "I wish I was lying in that little grave in the place of her who should have borne my name, and been what I once was"; and bowing her face upon her hands, she wept bitterly, while Rose tried in vain to comfort her. "I am not sorry you are my sister," sobbed Margaret, through her tears. "That's the only comfort I have left me now, but, Rose, I love Arthur Carrollton so much—oh, so much, and how can I give him up?"

"If he is the noble, true-hearted man he looks to be, he will not give you up," answered Rose, and then for the first time since this meeting she questioned Margaret concerning Mr. Carrollton, and the relations existing between them. "He will not cast you off," she said, when Margaret had told her all she had to tell. "He may be proud, but he will cling to you still. He will follow you, too, not to-day, perhaps, nor to-morrow, but ere long he will surely come"; and listening to her sister's cheering words Maggie herself grew hopeful, and that evening talked animatedly with Henry and Rose of a trip to the seaside they were intending to make. "You will go, too, Maggie," said Rose, caressing her sister's pale cheek, and whispering in her ear, "Aunt Susan will be here to tell Mr. Carrollton where you are, if he does not come before we go, which I am sure he will."

Maggie tried to think so, too, and her sleep that night was sweeter than it had been before for many weeks—but the next day came, and the next, and Maggie's eyes grew dim with watching and with tears, for up and down the road, as far as she could see, there was no trace of him for whom she waited.

"I might have known it: it was foolish for me to think otherwise," she sighed, and turning sadly from the window where all that afternoon she had been sitting, she laid her head wearily upon the lap of Rose.

"Maggie," said Henry, "I am going to Worcester to-morrow, and perhaps George can tell me something of Mr. Carrollton."

For a moment Maggie's heart throbbed with delight at the thought of hearing from him, even though she heard that he would leave her. But soon her pride arose strong within her. She had told Hagar twice of her destination, Hagar had told him, and if he chose he would have followed her ere this; so somewhat bitterly she said: "Don't speak to George of me. Don't tell him I am here. Promise me, will you?"

The promise was given, and the next morning, which was Saturday, Henry started for Worcester on the early train. The day seemed long to Maggie, and when at nightfall he came to them again, it was difficult to tell which was the more pleased at his return, Margaret or Rose.

"Did you see Theo?" asked the former, and Henry replied, "George told me she had gone to Hillsdale. Madam Conway is very sick."

"For me! for me! She's sick with mourning for me," cried Maggie. "Darling grandma! she loves me still, and I will go home to her at once."

Then the painful thought rushed over her. "If she wished for me, she would send. It's the humiliation, not the love, that makes her sick. They have cast me off; grandma, Theo, all, all," and sinking upon the lounge, she wept aloud.

"Margaret," said Henry, coming to her side, "but for my promise I should have talked to George of you, for there was a troubled expression on his face when he asked me if I had heard from Hillsdale."

"What did you say?" asked Maggie, holding her breath to catch the answer, which was, "I told him you had not written to me since my return from Cuba, and then he looked as if he would say more, but a customer called him away, and our conversation was not resumed."

For a moment Maggie was silent. Then she said, "I am glad you did not intrude me upon him. If Theo has gone to Hillsdale she knows that I am here, and does not care to follow me. It is the disgrace which troubles them, not the losing me!" and again burying her head in the cushions of the lounge, she wept bitterly. It was useless for Henry and Rose to try to comfort her, telling her it was possible that Hagar had told nothing. "And if so," said Henry, "you well know that I am the last one to whom you would be expected to flee for protection." Margaret would not listen. She was resolved upon being unhappy, and during the long hours of that night she tossed wakefully upon her pillow, and when the morning came she was too weak to rise; so she kept her room, listening to the music of the Sabbath bells, which to her seemed sadly saying, "Home, home." "Alas, I have no home," she said, turning away to weep, for in the tolling of those bells there came to her no voice, whispering of the darkness, the desolation, and the sorrow there was in the home for which she so much mourned.

Thus the day wore on, and ere another week was gone Rose insisted upon a speedy removal to the sea-shore, notwithstanding it was so early in the season, for by this means she hoped that Maggie's health would be improved. Accordingly, Henry went once more to Worcester, ostensibly for money, but really to see if George Douglas now would speak to him of Margaret. But George was in New York, they said; and somewhat disappointed, Henry went back to Leominster, where everything was in readiness for their journey. Monday was fixed upon for their departure, and at a nearly hour Margaret looked back on what had been to her a second home, smiling faintly as Rose whispered to her cheerily, "I have a strong presentiment that somewhere in our travels we shall meet with Arthur Carrollton."

CHAPTER XXII.

Come now over the hills to the westward. Come to the Hillsdale woods, to the stone house by the mill, where all the day long there is heard but one name, the servants breathing it softly and low, as if she who had borne it were dead, the sister, dim-eyed now, and pale faced, whispering it oft to herself, while the lady, so haughty and proud, repeats it again and again, shuddering as naught but the echoing walls reply to the heart-broken cry of "Margaret, Margaret, where are you now?"

Yes, there was mourning in that household—mourning for the lost one, the darling, the pet of them all.

Brightly had the sun arisen on that June morning which brought to them their sorrow, while the birds in the tall forest trees caroled as gayly as if no storm cloud were hovering near. At an early hour Mr. Carrollton had arisen, thinking, as he looked forth from his window, "She will tell me all to-day," and smiling as he thought how sweet and pleasant would be the task of winning her back to her old gayety. Madam Conway, too, was unusually excited and very anxiously she listened for the first sound of Maggie's footsteps on the stairs.

SUNDAY SCHOOL LESSON

LESSON VIII. August 22nd, 1915

Asa's Good Reign—2 Chronicles 15: 1-15.

COMMENTARY.—I. The message to Asa (vs. 1-7). 1. The spirit of God—The Holy Spirit moved the hearts of men in Old Testament times (2 Chron. 20, 14; 24:20; 2 Peter 1:21). Azariah—We know nothing of this prophet aside from what is here recorded. A prophet is one who brings a message from God. It may declare future events, or, as in this place, it may be a message of instruction or encouragement. 2. To meet Asa—Asa and his army were returning from their victory over the Ethiopian host under Zerah. Asa had cried unto the Lord in submission and faith, and his triumph was complete. A large amount of spoil came into his hands. The Lord is with you—The condition upon which the Lord was with Asa was that Asa took his place on God's side. This message came both as an encouragement and a warning. No one can expect the presence, favor and help of the Lord unless he is obedient to Him and earnest and trustful. If ye seek Him—Compare the words of Jesus in Matt. 7:7. He will forsake you—This truth was verified in the history of God's chosen people again and again. Those who in their hearts and by their actions reject God are rejected by Him. It is an awful calamity to be forsaken by the Lord. 3. For a long season... without the true God—Various views are held regarding these words. Some think reference is made to spiritual conditions in the kingdom of Israel, while others believe that the state of Judah under Rehoboam and Abijah is intended. It is maintained by others that it is a prophecy of future conditions among the Jews, and still others hold that the words are applicable to the times of the judges. Taken in connection with the fourth verse the sense seems to be that many times they had been without the true God and a proper regard for His worship and law, but whenever they turned to him and sought Him they found Him. A teaching priest—There were always priests, but often they were faithless, and through their failure the people were not instructed in the law. 4. In their trouble—Men and nations are inclined to forget God, but when trouble and distress come they are often led to turn unto him for help.

5. In those times—When God's law was disregarded. No peace... great vexations—God has said that there is no peace to the wicked. They may be outwardly prosperous, but within is turmoil and strife. This was the condition of the nation in their rebellion against God. 6. Nation was destroyed of nation.—The kingdom of Judah and Israel waged frequent and destructive wars with each other. City of city—In the times of the judges it was not uncommon for one city to be attacked by another. Adversity—God permitted hostile nations to make inroads into Israel as judgments upon the nation because of their sin. 7. Be ye strong therefore—In view of God's past dealings with His people there was great encouragement for them to be submissive, trustful and firm.

II. Asa encouraged (v. 8). 8 the prophecy of Oded—It is evident that either the words, "Azariah the son of," have been omitted or the word "Obed" has crept into the text from a marginal note, for the prophet here mentioned is the same one whose name is given in the first verse. Took courage—there were two strong reasons why Asa should be full of courage. He had gained a remarkable victory over the Ethiopians through the help of the Lord, and the prophet had come to him with a most inspiring message. Put away... idols—his courage moved him to action. He had already made an effort to destroy idolatry (2 Chron. 14:3), but the prophet's message, following his great victory, urged him on to another strong effort to complete the work. Out of the cities—Asa considered that his responsibility did not end with Judah and Benjamin, but extended to all the territory providentially under his control. His father had taken from Israel the cities Bethel and Jeshanah (2 Chron. 13:19). Mount Ephraim—the mountainous region of the tribe of Ephraim. Renewed the altar of the Lord—This was the great brazen altar (2 Chron. 4:1), the altar of burnt-offering, and stood before the porch of the temple.

III. A great assembly (vs. 9-11). 9. All Judah and Benjamin—the tribes which constituted the kingdom of Judah. Asa desired that the reforms he had undertaken should be most thorough and wide-spread, hence his calling an assembly of the people. Strangers—those belonging to the kingdom of Israel who were drawn to Judah by the great reformation there in progress. In abundance—a genuine revival of religion always attracts the people. The Lord his God was with him—the Lord was with him because he took his position on the side of truth and righteousness, and did his duty in the destruction of idolatry. Idolatry was prevalent in the kingdom of Israel and many of the people longed for something better, and when they saw that God was with Judah they flocked thither. 10. Gathered... in the third month—the assembly was held at Jerusalem at the feast of Pentecost, fifty days after the Passover. 11. They offered unto the Lord—They who expect help from the Lord make their offering to him.

IV. A solemn covenant (vs. 12-15). 12. Entered into a covenant—1. The people realized their need. 2. They made their offering to God. 3. They made solemn vows to the Lord. It is no easy-going, worldly religion that does not take hold upon the consciences of men. All their heart... all their soul—The expression used includes the entire being, physical, intellectual and moral. The pledge made to seek the Lord thus could not fail of results. 13. Would not seek the Lord, etc.—Thus no toleration was given to idolatry, so that it must be rooted out; and, that this covenant might be properly binding, they confirmed it with an oath, and God accepted them and their services.—Clarke. See Exod. 22. 20; Deut. 13. 6-15; 17. 2-6. 14. With a loud voice... They believed they were doing the right thing and were not ashamed. They were intensely in earnest. They were exercised in a good cause. Trumpets—Crooked horns. Cornets—Straight horns. 15. Rejoiced—The people had done their part and God fulfilled His promise. Joy forms a large part of true religion.

Questions.—What kings had reigned before Asa in Judah? Who was king in Israel at this time? What prophet came to Asa? What message did he bring? By what two things was Asa encouraged? What great work did Asa undertake? What was the object in calling the assembly of all the nation? Describe the sacrifices that were made. What covenant did the people make? How was their earnestness shown? What were the feelings of the people? What reasons were there for rejoicing?

PRACTICAL SURVEY.

Topic.—Reformation in Judah.

I. Proposed by the prophet.

II. Undertaken by the king.

I. Proposed by the prophet. The prophet Azariah met King Asa and his warriors with words of timely admonition and warning as they were returning from a victorious campaign. The conqueror's welcome was a message from God. Courage in perceiving and doing the right thing was the special demand of the hour. A sacred duty was presented by the prophet, who deemed it as much an obligation as an endowment to be spiritually strong. By illustration he showed that fidelity to God had proved to be the condition of prosperity, while religious apostasy was as surely followed by national disaster. The right thing in Judah at that time was to return to Jehovah, to reform the abuses of previous reigns and to exterminate idolatrous rites which had been introduced by earlier kings. The prophet laid emphasis upon the necessity of whole-heartedness in seeking God. Only twenty years had elapsed since the death of Solomon, yet irreligion and vice had corrupted the nation. The moral condition was deplorable when Asa came to the throne. The apostasy of Solomon had inaugurated a retrogression which was aggravated in the reign of successive kings, so that for three generations the abominations of the heathen were increasing. Idolatry was immorality concentrated in its most hideous forms. No religious zeal could have been genuine in a monarch which did not sweep the land clean of idolatry. Asa was called upon to be strong in the face of all that was wrong. He was given the promise of success in his work with the assurance that God would be present, to give energy to all the powers and faculties of body and mind.

II. Undertaken by the King. Encouraged by the words of the prophet, King Asa determined to convene a national assembly and enter into a solemn covenant to carry out the work of reformation. He saw that sin was sapping the foundation of the nation's stability and strength and he set himself to uproot it. Neither reverence for the dead nor fear of the living was suffered to stand in the way of his obedience to God. An independent spirit and a resolute will were combined with his piety. It showed the spirit of the people that they responded at once to the king's call. The need of the time was manifestly met. Asa and his people manifested truest wisdom when they, by a national act, sought the Benjamin, with such Israelites as were in sympathy with the new movement, were summoned to Jerusalem to covenant to seek God. Asa began at the right place. He did thorough work up to the limit of his power. Beginning with his own house, he removed the idols which his father had set up. He put down idolatry with unflinching faithfulness. This was followed by public proclamation of a revived faith before the world. There was a thorough reformation of character and reformation of life. The heart of the revival lay in a revival of their covenant with God. The same truths that inspire every true revival in Judah, the faithfulness of God and human responsibility, mercy for the penitent and punishment for the rebellious. The moral reformation is suggested by the words, "He took away the Sodomites out of the land." That was the first step toward a religious reformation. Asa's reform made itself felt in diminishing opportunities for sin, in destroying incentives to sin, in removing influences to sin. His confidence was displayed by his repose in God amid peril, by his prayer to God under difficulty, by the consecration of himself and his people to God after their great victory in battle. The moral conditions which surrounded Asa only magnify the grace which made him what he was. Educated by his idolatrous grandmother Maachah, a daughter of the rebellious Absalom, he had to rise to the standard of his ancestor David before he could deal with the sin that surrounded him. He stood in strong contrast to Solomon, the wise king and great monarch who built idol altars for his heathen wives. In so doing Solomon granted to foreign deities and shameful superstitions a foot in the midst of God's people. Asa was the first to stem the tide of sin with which that great ancestor had flooded the land. He was earnest and pious.—T. R. A.

The "Antique" Craze.

Those of us who can afford it steal and borrow and beg the arms, the trees, the emotions of Greece and Rome. Too often we hang their rotting trophies upon our walls, ignorant of their origin, unacquainted with their meaning and not even sympathetic with the emotions that produced them, bent only upon the paltry respectability that their presence argues.—World's Work.

"The War Summary"

Almost from the very day the great European war began in August last, the outstanding feature in Canadian journalism covering the conflict has been "The War Summary" daily on pages 1 and 2 of THE GLOBE. In the concisest possible form the writer has given his readers a pen picture of the developments in all parts of the world. While the details of the movements along the extended frontiers have not been overlooked, the readers of THE GLOBE have been enabled to follow intelligently and with confidence the general outlines of the stupendous conflict. "The War Summary" of THE GLOBE is reproduced daily by several papers throughout the Dominion.

The Editorial Page

THE GLOBE on its editorial page has striven to place before the public in proper perspective the broad background of the titanic struggle. This series of articles has attracted the attention not only of the Canadian people, but of leading men and journals in all parts of the world. The causes leading up to the war, the elements entering into its conduct, and the results likely to flow from the cessation of hostilities have been dealt with in that bold and clear-cut form characteristic of THE GLOBE'S editorial page.

News Service

The above features, in addition to a cable and letter service from the front unmatched in Canada, have placed THE GLOBE far in the lead of Canadian papers, and partly explain the phenomenal increase of 33 1-3 per cent. in THE GLOBE'S circulation during recent months.

Other Features

The sporting pages, the financial and commercial pages, the women's pages, etc., etc., with the additional pages in Wednesday's issue devoted to "Farm and Country Life," are maintained at a high standard of excellence, a standard that has justified THE GLOBE in its title of Canada's National Newspaper, and has given it by many thousands the largest circulation of any morning paper in the Dominion.

Local and City Papers

By all means take your local paper, but in the field of metropolitan newspapers THE GLOBE unquestionably offers you the greatest value to be had in Canada. Order it to-day. 25 cents per month—one dollar for four months—three dollars per year.

P.S.—According to Lord Kitchener, the big war has only begun.

THE WAR AND MIGRATION TO CANADA.

Many of the inhabitants of Canada will have to mourn the deaths of their relatives in the War, but their tears will be sweetened with pride and with thankfulness that their deaths with honour saved Canada from the dishonour of German Kultur. They will naturally wish to commemorate their patriotism and thus keep it fresh for the encouragement of those yet unborn. Many more will rejoice at the return of their fathers, sons and brothers bearing their laurels of victory with them, and they too will be anxious to record their thankfulness in no empty or common measure. In either case no better form could be imagined than the institution of a TRAINING FARM and DISTRIBUTING CENTRE, especially for those who have fought in the same War as those in whose honour they are created.

Farm training in England would only teach a lot that would have to be unlearnt in Canada, but the institution of such farms and centres in the Dominion would be of the greatest possible benefit to the people at home and to the prosperity of Canada.

The only Government having a Training Farm for Immigrants is that of New South Wales, who at their Pitt Town Farm give men and lads the benefit of a three months' free training in the rudiments of agriculture, fruit, poultry, sheep, pigs, dairy and other form of farming. The cost is about five shillings a head per week, after allowing for the value of their labour, but the benefit to the State is an hundred fold greater. This affords the lads an opportunity of recovering their muscles and hardness which unavoidably become reduced on the voyage, and of getting over their homesickness and the lonesomeness of rural life before they are separated. The distribution of the lads can be done more carefully than if a large party had to be dispersed in a few hours, and the training shows the personal inclinations of the boys themselves, so that they are made to fit the jobs they prefer and are most suited for.

The example of Mr. Sargood at Wanka, New Zealand, in training parties of British lads to become New Zealand farmers with a three years' course and with graduated wages throughout, is worthy of being imitated by thousands of settlers in other Dominions, and all will find that boys are more interesting than racehorses to keep and train, and less expensive.

Those who cannot arrange for boys can find DOMESTIC TRAINING CENTRES for immigrant women and girls, especially those who are bereaved by the War. Here the inmates would learn sewing, knitting, cooking, baking, preserving, the care of poultry, flowers and bees, laundry work and general domesticity. The college or centre would be used also as a distribution base as a home for the Immigrants in case of holidays, change or sickness.

Deeds are the only worthy form of memorial to those whose actions have helped to mould Canada and to make her what she is. The Macdonald College, McGill University, Wycliffe College, Dufferin Terrace and Aberdeen Park, are examples worthy to be generally followed at the present time, not only by individuals who have the means to raise such memorials and thank-offerings, but the Provinces and Cities of the Dominion, who should also collectively consider such beneficent works as their duty to the Forces, to their honour, and to the glorious country they dwell in. This would have the added advantage of decentralising the migration machinery and so make for its perfection.

The mighty majesty of Canada cannot be improved by the erection of statues and groups, however allegorical, which merely serve to emphasize the comparative littleness of man. Her grandeur is her own, and her future greatness, for which her sons have staked and often given their lives, depends upon such worthy memorials being created to develop her resources, to defend her destinies, and to replenish her population and increase her inhabitants.

Although Canada has been largely made by low wages at home and in Europe, she could have had a double population now, had the Federal and Provincial Parliaments, either individually or co-operatively instituted a system of reduced fares payable out of wages after arrival for desirable immigrants, and similarly low rates for the Nomination of the friends and relatives of persons already in the country. The low rates of pay at home prevent four fifths of the workers desiring to migrate, especially the younger and most desirable ones, from coming over because they have no money to pay their fares. The introduction of a party of Immigrants is an endowment of the place they go to. LOCAL IMMIGRATION FUNDS could be established to be advanced to Boys for Farm-Work, ex-Soldiers, Widows and other desirable classes of Immigrants (in specification). The selection could be left to the Canadian Government officals in London, and the MONEY, when collected back, COULD BE USED AGAIN, which is not the case in any other form of benevolence. Then the applicants could be selectd for fitness alone without the entrance of a financial qualification as at present. To secure equal distribution a uniform flat rate to the first job in Canada is most desirable.

It will also be remembered that would-be artistic efforts in churches and elsewhere are not included in the acts of mercy mentioned in the Gospels. These rather advocate practical works of true charity, such as the Memorials above mentioned. These also diffuse the intentions of the giver over a larger area than do tablets, windows or obilisks, and the naming of them and their beneficiaries keeps fresh and fragrant the memory of the founders and of their objects after metal, stone or glass have become worn, mutilated and defaced.

The well-being and employment of the ex-soldier and of the dependents of the fallen is one of our outstanding duties after the War, so that Peace and Prosperity may extend through the Empire as well as throughout the world in general.

The Orangemen of Huron County intend presenting the 33rd Battalion with a machine gun. A special meeting of the County Orange Lodge will be held in Wingham on the 16th inst to order same.

IS THE CHURCH ASLEEP

To the Editor:

The other day an old friend of mine went into one of the most beautiful churches in Europe and this is what he heard: "A hymn of hate and a sermon of Deceit." A strange service surely for a Christain church. It is as if a Priest of old had laid upon the altar a snake or a scorpion instead of a lamb or a dove. And yet we read that such things are being done to-day throughout a great part of Christiandom. Is it any wonder that our missionaries are mocked in foreign lands and that the natives ask that they should be recalled or interned?

When the rulers of nations once followers of the Divine Master call good evil and evil good, and pastors and teachers spread the infection, what can the people do? What will the harvest be?

PERPLEXED.

Whiskey and brandy cannot be taken as "medicine" after January 1st 910 in the United States, and, as a result every druggist who proposes to sell either intoxicant after that date will be forced to take out a licence as saloon keeper paying the high retailer's tax and putting his place under all local and state regulations. This situation is brought about by the decision of the Revision Committee of the United States Pharmacopoeia to drop both whiskie and brandy from the publication. The elemination of these intoxicants from the book has the effect of withdrawing recognition of whiskey and brandy as medicine has had a tendency to make the drug store a "blind tiger." This is especially true in "dry" territory.

Coal Oil at Flesherton.

The residents of the village of Flesherton are quite excited over what they think is a discovery of coal oil in their midst. For some months water in the well of Mr. F. G. Karstedt, a well-known merchant of that place was found to be unsuitable for use by the family as it had a very oily flavor. The latter part of last week the well was pumped dry three times, then the pumping, if continued, would discharge pure coal oil of a bright amber color, which would give as bright a light in an ordinary lamp as any of the best American oil. The natives are now using the oil from the Karstedt well, and are enjoying the cinch. On Monday of this week Mr. Karstedt sent a couple of gallons of the oil to the government laboratory in Toronto, to be examined, and the result of the analysis is awaited with great anxiety by the citizens.

The Fall Fairs.

Discussing Fall Fairs, The Farmer's Advocate remarks that if rural dwellers remain away from the annual exhibition the reason is not that they grudge the payment of the admission fee, but "too often they consider the loss of the day on the farm is but compensated by the enjoyment and ideas received at the fair, and too often farmers do not attend in a receptive mood. Criticisms are often heard from spectators that they have better live stock, fruit, farm produce and other articles at home. If such be true they should exhibit or keep their opinion to themselves for they have not done their duty in making the exhibition a success." The way to have a successful fair is through cordial co-operation on the part of all who have an interest in the development and progress of the community in which they live.

The Western Fair.

The Railway rates for the Exhibition this year are very favourable. One way ordinary first class fair will prevail over all roads from Toronto west, and fair and one-third from outside points. Tickets will be good from Friday September 10th to Monday, September the 20th. Exhibitors rates are good at one fare and a third from Tuesday, September 7th to Wednesday September 22nd. These rates and long dates should be an inducements for the people of Western Ontario to pay London a visit during exhibition week. There will be a number of changes this year. The Ladies Work and School exhibit, instead of being in the gallery of the Main Building, will be in a separate building on the ground floor, next to the Agriculture Building and connected with it by a passage way. A new building has been erected for the Dog Show, near the machinery building and just opposite the Midway. There will be a first-class programme of attractions twice daily and the management are confident that with good weather conditions the Exhibition will be a great success. All information, prize lists and programmes from the Secretary, London, Ontario.

Department of Agriculture Live Stock Branch

We receive enquiries occasionally from different parts of the province with reference to bulls running at large and as the editors of the local papers are quite frequently asked for information with reference to points of law by their subscribers. I thought it might be of interest to you to have information with reference to this. At the 1914 Session of the Legislative Assembly of Ontario "The Protection of Pure-Bred Cattle Act" was passed. It provides as follows:— 1. A penalty of $25 for the owner of any bull who allows the bull to run at large or to be off his promises when not confined or led by halter. 2. The right of an owner of a pure bred cow to recover full damages from the owner of the bull if his cow should be got with calfs by a bull running at large. A bull will be considered to be at large even though he may have broken out of the owner's field, the onus being on the owner of the bull to provide a fence to keep the animal in. The act does not apply to New Ontario or the provisional county of Haliburton but applys to all parts of Old Ontario.

Deafness Cannot be Cured

By local applications, as they cannot reach the diseased portion of the ear. There is only one way to cure deafness, and that is by constitutional remedies. Deafness is caused by an inflamed condition of the mucous lining of the Eustachian Tube. When this tube is inflamed you have a rumbling sound or imperfect hearing, and when it is entirely closed, Deafness is the result, and unless the inflammation can be taken out and this tube restored to its normal condition, hearing will be destroyed forever; nine cases out of ten are caused by Catarrh, which is nothing but an inflamed condition of the mucous surfaces.

We will give One Hundred Dollars for any case of Deafness (caused by catarrh) that cannot be cured by Hall's Catarrh Cure. Send for circulars, free.

Misses Cora Smith, Kate Beattie and Mary Smith of Walkerton spent the week end in town. — Southampton Beacon.

Andrew Malcom, ex-M. P., the well-known furniture manufacturer, of Kincardine, is dead, and Mrs. Malcom is hovering between life and death.

Charles H. Moore, Sheriff of Grey County, died at Bowmanville on Saturday of last week. He was 79 years of age.

The Whitechurch creamery near Lucknow was broken into on Tuesday night by some unknown persons and robbed of almost $100 worth of butter. Provincial Officer Phippen is working on the case and has already secured a clew to the robbery.

Durham's Chinatown colony has experienced an increase for on Thursday of last week the first Chinese baby born in town made its appearance and Charlie Sam, laundryman and his wife are the proud parents. It's a girl too. Moreover the new citizen is to be presented with the perfectly good name of Eva.

Interfered with Police.

Wm Allan Licence Inspector for South Grey, on Tuesday of last week had Wm. Troy before Magistrate Ryan and Fortune for supplying liquor to a minor, Miss Henrieta Kraft, daughter of Mr and Mrs Con. Kraft (deceased). Mr Troy was fined $20 and costs, the total sum being $25.20. Ayton Advance.

Upon Sheriff Jermyn's lawn there is one of the most beautiful Scotch thistles to be seen in Canada, and is now about eight feet in height. Although the Sheriff prefers the Shamrock on St. Patricks Day, yet he takes an honest pride in this Scotch flower on his lawn.—Wiarton Canadian Eye Badly Injured.

Stanley, the young son of Mr. and Mrs. George Ireland, Owen Sound st., Shelburne, sustained a bad injury to one eye Sunday forenoon. He was cutting a shoelace with an old pocket knife, and in some way the knife came in contact with his eye. Dr. White took him to Toronto Sunday for treatment and on Monday an operation was performed in an attempt to save the sight of the eye. Whether the sight can be saved or not, is not yet known.—Shelburne Economist.

A Young Mother Dead.

Mr. and Mrs. Dan McGill of 2nd con. Elderslie received a telegram on Thursday announcing the death of their daughter, Mrs. Hanson, in Saskatoon, Sask. Deceased was well known in Chesley as she was at one time a milliner at the Corner Store. She was married 6 years ago to Mr. Hanson and they moved to Langham, Sask. Her maiden name was Miss Bertha McGill and she was 34 years of age. The sympathy of a large circle of friends is extended to Mr. and Mrs. McGill in their bereavement.—Chesley Enterprise.

Osborne Tweedy Joins Honor Roll.

Bruce has given another boy to the great cause of freedom which is being fought out in Europe. Mr. and Mrs. Tweedy of near Kinlough have received word that their son, Osborne Tweedy, of the 48th Highlanders, died of wounds received in the fighting in France some time ago. Private Tweedy was first reported wounded; later he was reported "missing," and for over a month nothing was known of his whereabouts. Now a comrade at the front, whose home is near Owen Sound has written to his mother and requested that she send word to the Tweedy's of the death of their son of which he (the comrade) knew. He explained that Private Tweedy had both legs shot away and that he died from loss of blood.

Lt-Col. Belcher, big Indian Chief, composer, orator and promoter of the Durham to Southampton railway via Chesley, has blossomed as a poet and has sent us his latest effusion, which can be sung to the familiar hymn tune of "Stand up, stand up for Jesus."

Stand up, stand up for country,
Ye valiant men and true;
In fight for home and freedom,
There's work for you to do.
Lift high the Empire's colors
The enemy assails;
Your cause is true and righteous,
And justice still prevails,
Go forth with dauntless courage
Against the cruel foes,
It's only men with faith and truth
Such devils dare oppose.
The task is great, but glorious,
Obey your country's call:
For sisters, lovers, mothers,
Ask you to risk your all.
Then spring to call of duty,
God help us and sustain
The power of good old Motherland.
And freedom shall remain
To bless the world and all therein;
Then joy and peace and love
Will lasting be eternally,
And blessings from above.

—Amen.

Belongings of Canadian Killed.

Pathetic mementoes of Canada's sons who have fallen at the front and now lie buried on the battlefields of France and Flanders are arriving at Militia Headquarters at Ottawa. They comprise the personal effects of the dead Canadians, articles of clothing, photographs, letters, bits of jewelry, Bibles and keepsakes of all kinds. The effects have been forwarded from the Canadian base at Boulogne for distribution to next of kin in Canada. All of the express companies doing business in in Canada have agreed to forward the package free of charge to the families of the dead.

LETTER FROM ENGLAND

The following paragraphs are taken from a lengthy letter written by Corporal Wilbur Cryderman, son of Mr. and Mrs. C. W. Cryderman of Walkerton to Mr. Thos Dixon and which was received by him last week. The letter is a very lengthy and interesting one and we regret the space will not permit us to publish all of it.—

Shorncliffe Military Hospital,
July 27th, 1915.

Dear Mr. Dixon,

Have been intending to write you for some little time but we have been so busy for the past month or more that I have found it hard to get any letters written. There is so much to tell I hardly know what to start on.

You can get the location of Shorncliffe Camp by looking on the map for the towns of Folkestone and Hythe. The camp stretches away to the north of these places. It is made up of many small camps. For instance you will find Otterpool and Westenhanger to the north west. There are camps at these plans. There were originally over 40,000 Canadian troops in the camp but they have been sending drafts away almost every day lately and no one knows just how many are left. The University Company of the P.P.C.L.C. which Bob Rowland belonged to went away one night over a week ago. They marched to the boat in a heavy rainstorm. I saw Bob just once. It was at a church parade and I had just time to shake hands with him as his company marched out and back to camp.

Our camp was on what is known as St. Martin's Plain. We lived in long wooden huts. There were 46 in the one I had charge of. Sanitory conditions around the camp were wonderfully good. While there we spent the days in route marching, drill, lectures, etc.

While our unit was there we had three days leave of absence. I spent mine in London and had the time of my life there.

We went to Canterbury one afternoon and had time to see most of the interesting sights about the place. The cathedral is wonderful-really bewildering in its size and beauty. Another interesting place there is the old St. Martin's church which is supposed to be the oldest church in England. It is said to have been built at the time of St. Augustine by Queen Bertha of Kent, the first Christian Queen.

In the cathedral we saw the spot where Beckett was murdered. Just back of Hythe there is an old castle, Saltwood Castle. We were through it one afternoon. It was here that the Knights slept the night before the murder.

Folkestone and Hythe are larg fashionable summer towns. They are quiet this year on account of the war. Folkestone is also quite a port. A lot of troops were sent through it on their way to France.

About fifty of our unit including myself are now at the Moore Barracks Hopital. This is right on the coast midway between Hythe and Folkstone and is a splendid location for a hospital. It is away up on the heights overlooking the sea. In clear days the coast of France is quite plain. Boats are always in sight. These are mostly the boats sailing to and from France, destroyers and fishing boats. Occasionally we see submarines.

There are a large number of dirigibles which seem to belong to this part of the country. They seem to patrol the channel at night. They appear away out over the water every evening and are usually seen again early in the morning. Their purpose seems to be to watch for submarines and other suspicious craft. Destroyers are nearly always in sight.

We don't know how long we will be here. We would probably have been in France long ago if they needed us. There are rumors floating around that we are going to leave England during the next two weeks. If a large number of Canadians are sent to the Dardenelles, it is quite possible that we may go with them.

This is really a very pretty country and it is no wonder the Englishmen brag about it. The growth of trees flowers etc. is wonderful. We have been here at about the best time of the year. The roses they get here are great. The climbing ones are most noticeable. I have never seen such fine ones before.

In this part of England there must be no lights showing at night. All the windows have to be darkened as soon as the lights go on at night. This is of course on account of the fear of Zepplin raids. If any lights are allowed to show on the seaside of the buildings, the destroyers that patrol this part of the coast are sure to see and report and then the people are responsible, and are sure to get into boiling water.

I could go on writing for a week, but as time is precious I must close.

Sincerely Yours,
Wilbur C.

Found Hard Stuff.

When the object of curbing the illicit trade in wet goods that is apparent at times, Chief Leitch and nightwatchman Stewart searched the dwelling of a citizen on Tuesday afternoon. Their efforts were rewarded by the discovery of six bottles of whiskey and a case of beer. The wet goods were siezed and are held as evidence in the prosecution that is to follow. At the time of writing it is not known when a court will be held.—Paisley Advocate.

A Columbia Grafonola

will return you dividends of pleasure for a lifetime.

Until Columbia Grafonalas were brought within reach of us all, folks who lived in country towns and rural districts hadn't the same opportunity for hearing good music that city folks have.

But the Columbia Grafonola has changed all that. Now, the Columbia Grafonola will play, perfectly, records of all the music of all the world. You can sit home in your parlor or living room and hear famous opera selections by the greatest of living artists.

You can listen to famous bands—such as Creatore's, Prince's, H. M. Scots Guards and others. You can hear magnificent symphony orchestras—famous violinists like Ysaye and Kathleen Parlow, old English, Irish and Scotch Ballads sung by such artists as David Bispham—or all the up-to-date light song and dance music of the day.

All this the Columbia Grafonola makes possible for you, and at a small cost.

You can buy a superb instrument for $45.00. Others as low as $20.00 or as high as $60.00. One for every taste and every purse and on easy terms

Come see and hear any Columbia Grafonola play Columbia Records. We will gladly play them for you.

FARMERS!

Why Metallic Roofing and Shingles are not as durable as "Brantford Slates"

Brantford Asphalt Slates
For Houses and Barns

We are making colored and plain Asphalt Slates suitable for roofing any class of building, particularly farmers' buildings.

SPECIAL OFFER We are making a special offer to roof the first house or barn in your locality at about cost price and guarantee it's lifetime for ten years against leakage.

Electricians will tell you that Asphalt, from which Brantford Asphalt Shingles are made, is an excellent insulating material, and does not deteriorate when exposed to the elements, being proof against acid, salt, alkali, rust and corrosion.

Galvanized iron is subject to all these agents of destruction, as well as other enemies, viz., rust and moisture from the inside of the barn, produced by the heating of grain, moisture from cattle, etc. It is also open to attacks from the elements without, and both processes are working toward its ruin at the same time. In other words, condensation is causing the destruction of Metal Roofing and Shingles, while Asphalt Slates retain their wearing qualities indefinitely.

Therefore, Asphalt Slates are, in the end, the cheapest roofing material you can buy, and, as they are now made, the most attractive in appearance, as well as being waterproof and practically fireproof.

LOW PRICES We have succeeded in producing them at about the same price as wood shingles. Let us figure with you at once. There is no reason why the farmers of our country should put up with leaky roofs when we have acres of material we can supply quickly, at moderate prices.

ROOF-LEAK PAINTS (In Red, Green and Black) This splendid material is especially adapted for old Shingles and Metal and Felt Roofing of all kinds. In fact, any material that will take paint, can be made to last years longer by an application. Put up in large open-mouth cans of 1, 2, 3 and 5 gallons.

OLD COUNTRY NEWS

COSTS OF NEW WARSHIPS.

Some interesting figures regarding Great Britain's naval expenditures are made public in the Blue Book just issued, although dated back to March 31, 1914.

The cost of the Iron Duke, flagship of Admiral Jellicoe, is given as $9,725,000. The Audacious, which was sunk off the north coast several months ago, cost $9,100,000.

It is noted that the Government's decision to rush the Queen Elizabeth to completion had added an even $1,600,000 to her estimated cost up to March 31, 1914, on which date $7,100,000 had been spent on her. How much more it cost to complete her after that date is not specified.

On March 31, 1914, four months before the beginning of the war, there were 150 vessels of various sorts being built for the British navy.

The cost of several ships that have been mentioned during the war is given as follows:

Battle Cruisers:
Lion	$9,855,000
Princess Royal	9,840,000
Queen Mary	9,805,000
Battleships:
Ajax	8,985,000
Centurion	8,986,000
King George V.	8,890,000
Marlborough (unfinished)	9,035,000

WATCHING WOUNDED ARRIVE.

One of the sights of London is the arrival of wounded soldiers at Charing Cross station. The crowd gathers there about five o'clock every afternoon. Although not a day has passed since the early part of the war without the arrival of a varying number of victims of shot, shell and gas, the crowd never lessens.

Charing Cross station used to be the brightest and most interesting station in London, for most of the travel with the continent passed there. It stands just off Trafalgar square in the Strand, near the centre of the west end shopping district. Before the arrival of the Red Cross train, the ambulance motors form in a line in a narrow side street. Ordinary motor cars are used for the slightly wounded, and ambulances for the badly wounded. The platforms in the great station are kept clear, but the sightseers, who are largely women, gather in the forecourt waiting for the big iron gates to open and let out the stream of slow-moving cars, which pass from the side street into the station and then out.

People are attracted to Charing Cross less from curiosity than to show their sympathy. The men in the crowds always raise their hats as the wounded go by.

TO DROP THE PUTTEE.

The British army has decided to discontinue the use of the puttee, which has been the distinguishing leg wear of the British soldier for many years, and to substitute the Russian army boot. This decision was arrived at as a result of last winter's campaign in Flanders, when it was found that the cloth puttee was little or no protection against the mud and water and led to the men suffering, not from frost bitten, but from benumbed feet and legs. Large orders have already been given for boots, which will be supplied to the troops before the winter sets in, as the War Office anticipates another winter in mud and water soaked trenches.

The puttee, which is to be discarded, was adopted because of its protection against snake bites in India, and became general throughout the British army, and, in fact, has since the commencement of the present war been taken up by some of the continental armies. It, however, has proved useless under conditions prevailing in Europe, not only because of the lack of protection that it affords, but because of the time it takes to put it on properly.

FEWER LONDON BABIES.

London's birth-rate is decreasing and the death-rate increasing. Last week there were 1,900 babies born and 1,060 deaths. Allowing for decrease of population, the births were 290 below the five years' average and the deaths 73 above. In Greater London the loss was even more marked. The births, 3,458, were 531 below and the deaths, 2,068, were 531 below and the deaths, 1,528, 32 above the respective averages.

Boy babies born in London numbered 964, against an average of 1,127. Not once in the ten years with which the Registrar-General compares the figures have the boys fallen below 1,123.

Compared with population, Berlin and Vienna are suffering an even worse decline. London's population is 4,516,612; Berlin, with 1,972,262 people, had 531 babies, and Vienna (2,147,287 people) only 471 in the week ending June 15, the latest return available.

All this year London's births have been falling. If the decline goes on the year's loss in natural increase will be at least 14,500. The loss in boy population to London is at the rate of 8,176 a year.

EXCLUDE GERMAN TOYS.

The exclusion of German war toys is what a movement started by the Countess of Stanhope hopes to accomplish in Great Britain. But the movement is not alone an industrial one aimed against Germany, but an effort to provide a trade at which maimed soldiers can work when the war is over. Heretofore, Great Britain has bought about $7,500,000 worth of foreign toys, which have been almost all of German make. The scheme provides for the financing of the industry by 4 per cent. loans. Surplus profits will be spent in developing the technical side of the business. Needy artists will be given jobs as designers.

FOOD PRICE INCREASE.

The general increase in food prices during the first year of the war, according to the official Labor Gazette, is 35 per cent. in the larger towns of Great Britain, and 30 per cent. in small towns and villages.

In Germany, according to figures received here, the increase in the same time is about 65 per cent.; and in Vienna, 75 to 80 per cent.

NOTES.

Lifeboat Saturday sales and collections at Rotherham realized £171 3s 1d., as compared with £136 19s 5d in 1914, and £48 6s 5d in 1913.

Jacob Crabb, of Barnsley road, Dodworth, while joining in the singing of a hymn at the Dodworth Wesleyan Chapel on Sunday afternoon, fell forward and collapsed. He was removed, but died without speaking.

Mr. William Walker, a prominent Matlock man who was known to Spiritualists throughout the country, has just died at Buxton.

In a case at Leeds Assizes it was stated that Henry Price, a Denaby miner, and his wife bought a girl, who is now 11 years old, for 5s when she was two. A receipt dated Jan. 12, 1905, signed by the girl's mother was handed to the judge. Mr. Justice Rowlatt expressed astonishment at such a transaction, and stated that he thought it undesirable that the girl should continue to live with people who had bought her for 5s.

The Prehistoric Society of East Anglia has published a report that deals with Grime's Graves, Norfolk. These depressions in the ground are of unknown date, and, it has been said, were great flint quarries, the Neolithic arsenal of Great Britain's Stone Age. The society's report now likens them to prehistoric trenches. They were capable of receiving, concealing, and housing an army. The stature of the prehistoric girl whose partial remains were preserved in the chalk of Grime's Graves was about 4 feet. Part of a man's skull was found. It had a brain capacity greater than that of modern Englishmen. The skull bones were thicker. But science says that brain capacity is indicated by quality, not quantity.

Clydesdale shipbuilders and engineering firms will establish canteens within their yards under the control of trade union representatives and masters to provide refreshment at moderate prices. The employers believe this will lead to more regular working hours.

In opening the County Antrim Assizes last week Mr. Justice Pim referred to the number of Ulstermen serving with the Canadian forces at the front. The Belfast Evening Telegraph, on the authority of Major-General Sam Hughes, the Dominion Minister of Militia, states that upwards of 25,000 Ulstermen are already enrolled in the Canadian overseas force. Many of them had been in the Dominion a comparatively short time when the war began.

MYSTERY OF MATTER.

Endless Routine of the Material That Forms Our Bodies.

Mrs. Geoffrey Martin has written a treatise on chemistry from which is taken as a paragraph from the chapter on "Matter."

"The endless circulation of matter in the universe is perhaps one of the most wonderful facts with which chemistry has to deal. It is this endless chain that causes the history of the most common and insignificant objects about us to be more astonishing than any fairy tale.

"What a wonderful story, for example, could be written of the material that forms our bodies! It came into existence in the immense depth of space millions upon millions of years ago and wandered for ages through darkness and void until it reached our earth. Perhaps it fell upon the earth in a fiery meteorite, or perhaps it merely joined the huge fire mist from which our solid world condensed. Since then it has run round age after age in an endless circle of change.

"First it formed part of that vast primeval atmosphere that surrounded the globe and blew in mighty winds round our planet; then it was absorbed into the body of some humble dying being, and when this being died and its body decayed the matter passed into the rich mother earth. Thence it passed into some plant by means of its roots, and from the plant it passed by the process of being devoured into the body of some animal, and from the animal again it passed to earth and thence the plants and animals again, and so on through an endless cycle of change, coursing through the bodies of innumerable multitudes of living forms, which stretch far back in a dim, unending vista into the depths of time.

"Finally it reached man. Yes, the very atoms that thrill and flash in our brains and muscles once formed part of a living plant or animal millions of years ago and will again form part of a living plant or animal millions of years hence. In some form or other the matter that now forms our bodies will exist long after the whole present order of creation has passed away. Indeed, it may well yet blow in the winds of worlds as yet unborn and thrill in forms of life not yet evolved."

White and Pink F lt Hat

The latest fad in sport and semi-dressy hats is the demand for felt hats in gay attractive colors and styles. And to be sure there are numerous varieties to choose from, for there are sailors severe and dressy, flopping brimmed and straight, in light and dark shades, and in attractive velor felts or the conventional flat felt. The model illustrated features a rather dressy sailor shape of pale pink velor felt with wide brim and moderately high crown. A velvet band with white and pink soutache braid furnishes attractive trimming.

MUNITIONS AND MACHINE GUNS

Ralph Connor Sounds Warning of the Empire's Need in Time of Danger.

Everyone has been dutifully saying that this war is a serious business, but no man living, not even Kitchener himself, knew till three months ago just how serious it was. Kitchener knows it now, Asquith knows, Lloyd-George knows, Bonar Law knows, and Labor leaders of Britain and the labor unions [illegible] this war [illegible]. And on London streets and in London offices, in the [illegible] and all [illegible] men are asking each other with [illegible] questions they would not dare to ask aloud, and are getting answers [illegible] that give a queer feeling at their British hearts.

A serious business indeed is this war. The time of it, the careful and [illegible] with his eye on the past, when wars were waged by men and not by machines, and when valor, not explosives, won fights, [illegible] to be assured. Only one thing is possible—victory for our arms. A pleasant man, this careful optimist, till you notice that his eye is upon the back trail or in the clouds. When you know him you damn him for a [illegible] fool.

Every heart in the Empire that ought to be listened to [illegible] of victory, complete [illegible], and little hope of even a decisive battle, unless conditions be changed, changed so as to be entirely different from those under which the war has hitherto been waged.

The first impression one got on reaching London about two months ago was that the traditional British [illegible] had been shattered and had been replaced by a paralyzing sense of uncertainty. You caught it everywhere, on the streets, in the hotels, at dinners, in the House of Commons, and in the press, even in the [illegible]. It was not so much what people said, but what they refused to say. It was the determined and obvious effort to be cheerful that all pressed into [illegible]. Everybody was saying to his neighbor, "Cheer up, things will improve." But everybody, when by himself, refused to cheer up, being firmly convinced that things were heavily rotten. He was mostly engaged during these lonely moments in damning in his own particular way something or somebody, and not the Germans either, because of the "[illegible]" of things in general, and especially things about the War Office.

THE SPECTRE OF DEFEAT.

What was wrong? The fact was simply this: That the British people were standing and looking with newly-opened eyes at the spectre of defeat looming up through the Channel mists, a spectre unlike the traditional spectres of our dreams, sleeping or waking, in that it refused to disappear, and wore a [illegible]. That spectre, unless conditions were changed, could not be laid, but would take on a reality of hideousness and permanency for their children to contemplate for successive generations. There are people doubtless reading this line who pause to say "rot." But the British people are not saying "rot" any more, and do not say "rot" when their eyes were opened some two months and a half ago.

The British people sat up, broad awake, and with that superb, cool courage that flows from up to the pleasant and terrible facts, looked the situation in the eye and began forthwith to change things.

The Government showed the way. With that fine power of sacrifice which is the characteristic of the British statesman, Asquith met the crisis, for crisis it was. It was a bitter, hard day for the Premier, the bitterest and hardest day of his whole great career, but he was equal to the demand made upon his patriotism. A coalition Government was formed. Then the housecleaning began. Among other things the War Office was reorganized. A new department was created, with Lloyd-George, that wonderful, great, little man, at its head as Minister of Munitions.

Up to this time the call had been for men, men, and more men. Now to the nation's ears came a new cry: "Munitions, munitions, and more munitions." That "wonder-working little Welshman" was on to his job. He took industrial England into his confidence with a frankness that disarmed criticism and a passion that overbore opposition. He organized the whole country into one great munitions factory and summoned to this service, as to a sacrament, men and women—yes, women, mind you—till every wheel that could turn in England was set a-turning, and thousands of men and thousands of women, high and low, rich and poor, were impressed somehow into the patriotic mission of making munitions of war.

RAISING THE BIG LOAN.

Next came the question of money. Great Britain is spending three millions of pounds a day, fifteen millions of dollars, and she will need to spend more in this business of war. To meet this terrific drain money must be found. The big loan was launched, and the launching was a marvellous exhibition of cooperative patriotism. Carefully was it planned and vigorously was it pushed. The Prime Minister and the big politicians addressed meetings. The preachers thundered over their congregations. The billboards smote the eyes of the unheeding public. And the press, the magnificent British press, every day and everywhere drove into the heart of the nation the appeal: "Invest in the war loan." And invest they did, men their hundreds of thousands, women their hundreds and children their pounds. One day, in the House of Commons, Mr. McKenna made the quiet announcement, after the British way, that eight hundred million pounds had been subscribed by three-quarters of a million of British men and women and children, that the end was not yet. That quiet voice in the British House of Commons produced two satisfactory results. It helped the British people to cheer up and it shattered the complacent dream of stupid German egotism that British finances were in a critical condition.

And so Kitchener has secured his men, between two and three millions of them, the munitions are on the way, Lloyd-George says, and the money, says McKenna, is in sight. The conditions are assuredly beginning to change, and in consequence and after the British habit, when people begin to do things they begin to cheer up.

One question still remains to be answered: "What is to be the issue of this serious war?" The answer is plain, so plain that even the easy-going, cheerful optimist can see it. And the answer is this: "If the change in conditions, so splendidly initiated, be not continued and with ever-increasing acceleration, the issue is defeat."

WHAT CANADA MUST DO.

What, then, is the immediate duty of Canadians? To raise large sums of money? Not so much. Old John Bull may be safely trusted to look after the financing of this war. But for Canada two things lie to her hand. Listen to the insistent iteration of Lloyd-George: "Munitions and machine guns, munitions and machine guns." Let every Canadian wheel that can turn on a shell be set a-going. Let every Canadian workman and workwoman that can get to a munition factory or gun factory get there, and with all speed. Machine guns and more machine guns. Where British soldiers have two machine guns Germans have forty. Shells wasted means battalions saved. We have tried fighting machine guns with men and have learned our bitter lesson. Canadian shells and Canadian machine guns means the saving of Canadian men.

And the other need is this: Men. Listen to Kitchener in his great Guildhall speech the other day. "I shall have to ask you for more men. The time was when we could not equip or clothe or train men in large numbers. That time, thank God, is now past. And to-day I ask you for more men."

Canadians, do you know that your name is like a flame in British hearts to-day? That men's voices quiver and their eyes grow dim as they tell the tale of Ypres and of St. Julien, and of Festubert? The call is more insistent to-day than eight months ago a thousand times over, for men, for Canadian men, the same kind that held the gap at St. Julien, and as French himself said three days after that glorious fight, in tones that broke and faltered, save the day. It thrills our Canadian hearts to call his words: "Canadians, I want you to know that when you held the line that day you saved the British Empire—well, I will take that back, for we should finally have recovered what we lost, but for that day, at least, you saved the Empire's name and the army."

WOMEN MUST MAKE SACRIFICES.

Canadian women, you will not hold back your men, your sons and your sweethearts, but will send them forth where honor and safety bid them go. Men, and ever more men! Not the men only who can be spared! Not the men without ties of love to hold their hearts! Not the men whose going is easy! No, no! But the men whose going will imperil business interests and will break hearts. These men, men of sacrifice, whose wives and mothers will wave them away with mist-dimmed eyes, but with hearts that will not refuse to make complete the sacrifice.

Seriously, soberly, solemnly, let it be said, that unless the Empire can furnish in overwhelming quantities munitions of war, and in overwhelming numbers men of war, the bitterness and humiliation of defeat will be our portion, and the shame and slavery of an infamous and tyrannous militarism will be the portion of our children.

VANITY BAG ON PARASOL.

The "Vanity Bag Parasol" is one of the newest novelties in dress accessories for midsummer wear. It is a dainty affair of pampadour silk with long slender handle and ivory trimming. The feature of this parasol is the attached vanity bag which is fastened to the handle by a heavy silk cord. A draw string and an ivory ring serve to keep it closed. The "tam" and collar are both fashioned in cretonne.

HAD CHOLERA MORBUS.

SO BAD COULD NOT SIT UP.

Attacks of cholera morbus are caused mostly by indiscretion in diet, the use of unripe fruit and new vegetables, and usually occur during the hot summer months.

On the first sign of this very weakening trouble Dr. Fowler's Extract of Wild Strawberry should be taken.

Mrs. George Lee, Ruthven, Ont., writes: "I was taken with cholera morbus, and I was so bad I could not sit up any more than five minutes at a time. My husband said I looked as if I had been sick a month; he got me a bottle of Dr. Fowler's Extract of Wild Strawberry, and I took the whole of it in one day, and it completely cured me. We are never without it in the house for I don't think it can be beat."

When you ask for Dr. Fowler's Extract of Wild Strawberry see that you get "Dr. Fowler's," as imitators have gone so far as to imitate our wrapper both in color and style, and have adopted similar names, such as Strawberry Compound, Wild Strawberry Compound, Extract of Strawberry, etc.

"Dr. Fowler's" has been on the market for the past 70 years, and is acknowledged by all who have used it to be a sure cure for all bowel complaints.

Was Troubled With Smothering Spells.

Would Wake Up With Breath All Gone.

Mrs. Wm. McElwain, Temperance Vale, N.B., writes: "I am not much of a believer in medicines, but I must say Milburn's Heart and Nerve Pills are all right.

Some years ago I was troubled with smothering spells. In the night I would be sound asleep but would waken up with my breath all gone and think I never would get it back. I was telling a friend of my trouble, and he advised me to try Milburn's Heart and Nerve Pills. He also gave me a box which I tried, and I had only taken a few of them when I could sleep all night without any trouble. I did not finish the box until some years after when I felt my trouble coming back, so I took the rest of them and they entirely cured me."

Milburn's Heart and Nerve Pills are 50c per box or 3 boxes for $1.25, at all dealers or mailed direct on receipt of price by The T. Milburn Co., Limited, Toronto, Ont.

THE PRICE OF A HEART

The man was going to get married. He had sown his wild oats and now he meant to settle down. Wealthy, good-looking, a first-class sportsman, a favorite with men and women alike, the Fates, spinning busily, had smiled upon him at birth and woven only golden threads in the wool of his life.

For years he had lived the life of the smart young man about town. He had done the same things in the usual way, he had been neither very good nor bad: in his own words, the favorite words of British youth, he had always tried to play the game.

It was because he felt it incumbent upon him to play the game that he decided to tell the woman he was going to marry of a certain newly-closed episode in his life. The consideration that perhaps it would be as well for her to hear the tale from him first-hand, instead of embroidered with lies on a foundation of truth, as she might hear it from some one else, may have counted for something, too.

But his ostensible reason, the reason he gave himself as he knotted his tie carefully before his mirror on the fateful morning of confession, was that he must play the game.

"I hardly like to tell you, dear," he began, awkwardly, standing tall and perfectly groomed on the hearth rug that afternoon. "It is so difficult to speak to women like you about certain things. But—but—Evelyn, you're not marrying a saint, you know."

The fair-haired woman in the big armchair looked up at him sweetly out of innocent blue eyes. "Dear, I know," she said gently.

He moved uncomfortably. "But it's just what you don't know," he told her, "that I am worrying about. I'm not thinking of cards and racing and things like that. It's about women I want to speak to you. Especially one woman." He paused and bit his lips nervously.

"Ah!" — said she softly, looking down.

"She was a nice little thing," went on the man, "not quite a lady, you know, but very pretty and all that. Her father drank. She ran away from home. Hadn't a friend in the world when I picked her up. Only the streets in front of her. A good woman, like you, Evelyn, can't realize what the horror of that means. I took a flat for her."

"Ah!" —said the woman softly, looking down.

"I knew her for three years," went on the man, gathering courage. "She was grateful for all I had done for her. She was really a nice little thing. But, of course, that's all over and done with now. I settled up legally with her to-day. I shall never see her again. There was no reason for you ever to know, only that I felt it wouldn't be quite playing the game not to let you know."

"What has become of the girl?" asked the woman, still softly, still looking away.

The man shrugged his shoulders. "Still in the flat, I presume," he said carelessly. "The rent is paid up till December." His voice became persuasive. He bent down so that his face was very near the coils of fair hair wound smoothly round her head. "Don't let us talk about her any more," he said. "It's all finished and done with. Don't pout. But say you forgive me."

"I'll forgive you," she said, prettily. He caught her, flushed and smiling, to him fiercely. "My saint," he said.

In a daintily furnished room of a little flat a woman lay dead upon the bed with an empty vial in her hand. There were traces of tears upon her cheeks, her closed eyelids were swollen. She, too, played the game.—London News.

THE POULTRY WORLD

"COMFORT," POULTRYMAN'S MOTTO.

It is just as important to keep the poultry comfortable in summer as it is in winter, "Comfort" should be the motto of every poultry keeper, and it should be strictly enforced. To remain healthy and vigorous, both fowls and chicks must be protected from the burning rays of the sun.

To deprive the stock of sunlight would be fatal. A house situated where it does not get the sunlight is unfit for fowls, but if it gets the sun for only a few hours a day it may be used. Mature birds soon degenerate without the sun and chicks are sickly when grown with little sunlight. But no fowl can thrive when long exposed to the heat of the sun, so there should be shade at least in the heat of the day. Dense and complete shade is to be avoided. Air and sunshine in moderation are important factors in the growth and thrift of stock.

Natural shade is desirable and fruit trees are particularly good, since they give shelter as well as crops that can be sold at a profit. They provide shade during hot weather and, dropping their leaves for winter, allow the sunshine to strike past their limbs in cool weather. Evergreen trees planted in hedges for windbreaks for winter also furnish a dense and cooling shade in summer.

Shade can be furnished artificially in different sections of the yard by using branches of trees cut in full foliage, or by driving three foot stakes in the ground and covering them with a canopy of burlap, or by erecting frames made of wire netting or lath, covered with hay or straw.

The prime importance of sunlight in sanitation is universally acknowledged by the medical fraternity. It is nature's great disinfectant and the direct rays of the sun will destroy disease germs.

So the beneficial effects of sunlight must not be ignored.

The question is how can it best be controlled so as not to do damage to the stock.

It is not uncommon to have heat prostrations during hot weather, especially in the case of heavy fowls, the birds suddenly dropping over insensible. The cause is attributed to the heat making a pressure on the brain. Exposure to the hot sun is frequently the reason.

I might go through the entire list of poultry ailments and find where sunshine acts as a tonic as well as a preventive of diseases. The lesson is then that we have our poultry houses so erected that the sunshine can enter at certain hours of the day to disinfect the interior, drive out dampness and destroy disease germs. The yards must be only partially shaded, so that the stock may be able to get a cool place. Failure to provide for this may result in serious loss.

Probably at no time is the hot sun more dangerous to fowls than during moulting season. Moulting is nature's condition for exchanging the old, worn-out weather beaten suit for a fresh, clean one. Quite frequently individual birds will be almost entirely nude, and when exposed to the hot sun the skin not only quickly reddens but is apt to blister, and become sore. It is just as important to shelter moulting fowls from hot sun as it is to protect them from cold storms.

NOTES.

Growing chicks will not thrive if they are not given the proper amount of shade in their runs. They must be protected from the strong rays of the sun. Niagara Farm, in Ransomville, Niagara County, New York, has adopted an excellent method for providing shade for young birds. A field of ten acres is fenced off and planted in corn. After the stalks are about two feet high, colonies of young chicks, with their coops scattered here and there all over the field, are quartered on this cornfield. They are not only protected from the hot sun, but are enabled in this range to gather considerable bugs and sprigs of grass that crop up. As the chicks grow older the corn stalks grow higher. It is the best provision for shade I have seen yet, and as the corn is planted in hills, there is still sufficient space left for the sun to shine in and keep the ground from becoming too damp for the chicks. It is the best wrinkle I have yet come across as the corn crop more than pays the cost of planting and what other expense may be incurred.

The four chief requirements in raising chicks are space, shade grass and insects. These four requirements are met by the Niagara Farm plan. But this will be unnecessary where there is an orchard or grove. The next best substitute would be the planting of shrubs.

Not only must there be partial shade in the runs or ranges, but the houses must be so constructed that the air can pass through and that the hot roofs can be more or less cooled by proper ventilation.—Michael K. Boyer, poultry editor of Farm Journal.

There is no farm stock which repays good care as quickly as the hen, but it must be good care.

Keep eggs in a cool, dry place, which is free from odors.

If a man hasn't the time to attend to his fowls, better sell them at once. The best of pure-breds soon become scrubs in the hands of a slovenly poultryman.

Don't put the little chicks in with the old birds or the younger chickens larger than themselves. Grade the flocks according to size.

Broilers should be ready for market by now; they are wanted small enough for one person.

Hens that are afraid of the caretaker and fly every time he approaches will never lay as well as those which are on friendly terms and have found they can trust the men and women who work around them.

Fresh air is one of the greatest aids to health that poultry can have, and lack of it will give rise to trouble. Therefore, provide good ventilation in all poultry buildings, but do not allow draughts to blow on the fowls.

Underfeeding the growing flock is false economy. It is apt to be indulged in more this year than in former years due to the high price of feeds. Nevertheless, the growing stock must be properly fed if they are to be fit for market in the given time and of A1 quality. Pullets not properly fed will reach laying maturity late and be at a loss instead of a source of a profit.

Purchase feeding stock now. It will not be any cheaper later on. Do not get the impression that there is an oversupply of good breeders on the market. Rather the supply in the right kind early hatched and ready to lay this fall, will be even more hard to secure than formerly, while poultry and eggs are not as high as they should be, cost of feed, etc., considered. Nevertheless, every indication points to a profitable figure, an overproduction of fresh A1 poultry or eggs, and the "real thing" will soon come into its own.

If the poultry keeper is in need of new blood or better blood in the flock now is the time. Nearly all poultrymen will sell one a pen of extra good breeders at a price lower than could be obtained in the early spring during hatching season, or later on during the fall. Take advantage of the summer prices by all means if you care to add new blood to the flock.

Separate the cockerels from the pullets now, and market every one that is not to be retained for breeding purposes. The pullets will do much better for the additional room and feed. The cockerels will bring more money now than if kept until full grown.

It is now in the midst of the heat of the summer, the hardest time in the growing period for both young and old fowls. Eternal vigilance is the price of a healthy flock of poultry. One must provide plenty of fresh water, shade and well-cleaned poultry houses if a satisfactory growth of the young stock is expected or the breeders that are kept are to be in the prime of health.

Don't be sparing with the feed just because it is high. "Money saved is money earned," is an old saying, but it does not apply to the feeding of poultry. If one saves money by underfeeding now, the growing pullets will be longer in producing their first eggs if checked on the way to maturity by underfeeding. Young stock can never regain what is lost in weight which should result in good feeding the first three months of their lives.

"Lonely" and "Lonesome."

Here's the distinction between the words lonely and lonesome, although often they are used in the same sense. "Lonely" means to be deprived of human society and companionship while "lonesome" is the dejection and sadness due from lack of society. The one is a state of being, the other a state of mind.

To be lonely is entirely physical, while lonesome is exclusively mental and may be the result of actual loneliness, or may merely be an imaginary lonesomeness caused by mental depression.

The difference between the words is better illustrated in the following: A man is sitting in the library of his home, both lonely and lonesome. The telephone rings. Friends invite him to join a merry party then in progress a few miles away. In order to reach this party he must mount his horse and traverse a lonely and dangerous road. In this journey he is lonely, for the road is lonely, but he is not the least bit lonesome, for his thoughts are already in anticipation of the enjoyable evening he is about to spend with gay comrades.—St. Louis Post-Dispatch.

SUMMER CARE OF FOALS.

The first summer is the time when growth can be put on the colt cheapest and most profitably. Plenty of food is necessary for the best growth and development. Of all feeds, the mother's milk is of greatest importance. It is essential that the dam be cared for in such a way as will cause her to yield the biggest supply of milk possible. Mares suckling foals should be fed liberally of clean healthful appetizing foods. It is permissible and usually advisable that the mare be worked. She should, however, be in the hands of the most thoughtful, careful driver, and should be handled with good judgment.

After the age of about one month the foal needs food in addition to what it can secure from its mother. Clean, bright oats makes probably the best food that is available on the farm. A mixture of oats, bran and oil meal in proportion of 6 1-3 is splendid if one will go to the trouble of preparing or mixing the feed. Ordinarily a colt will learn to eat the first mouthful from the mother's feed box but he cannot get enough there. He must have a small box out of reach of the mare, or some place where the larger and older stock can not touch it.

Good pasture is highly important in securing gain and growth. In fact there is no one thing so necessary aside from mother's milk. If the mare is worked in the field, and the colt should have the best grass pasture as possible night. Care must be given that pastures are not overstocked and that variety of grasses or succession of pastures is provided to avoid the dry grass in summer. The mare relishes grass and her milk flow is stimulated and increased by good pasture. The colt relishes grass, gets needed exercise, and will thrive best where pasture is abundant.

If the mare and colt are running on pasture, supplemental feed will be needed just the same, especially when the grass begin to dry up. A feeding place should be constructed in such a way that young colts can enter and older stock cannot. Grain should be fed liberally in this separate pen.

Colts should not follow mares at work in fields during summer and fall. They should be left in clean stalls, paddocks or pastures where they can not hurt themselves. Colts love company and where there are a number of them on the farm, they should be in the same stall, paddock, or pasture while the mares are in the field. Good sense and judgment must be used in allowing the youngster to suckle at noon and evening.

It is very necessary to keep the colt free from accident. Wire cuts, nail pricks and bruises produce severe losses on many farms where colts are grown. To just the extent that a man keeps his colts free from accident, he increases his profits. Old sagging fences must be straightened up; corner posts must be set; broken boards with nails in them must be gathered up. Every precaution possible must be taken to guard against injury because it means the saving of money.

Flies, too, must be guarded against by having the barn clean and by having manure piles and all breeding ground for flies cleaned up. Shelter from the hot sun in summer is another factor that increases the growth and thrift of the colt and increases the profit of the owner.

It pays to handle the colt the first summer. They should be broken to halter. Their feet should be picked up and whenever they need it, trimmed. If they are handled the first summer, much of the work of breaking later will not be necessary. Good care and management the first summer will cause the colt to become a bigger and better horse and a more profitable farm product.—H. E. McCartney, Assistant in Animal Husbandry Extension, Perdue University Experiment Station.

ADVANTAGES OF SHEEP RAISING.

1. The sheep is a dual purpose animal, producing both wool and mutton.
2. The initial expenditure is small. Every farmer can well afford the investment of the necessary capital in a few sheep.
3. Rapid monetary returns are received, the wool clip and the lamb crop being saleable annually.
4. Expensive buildings are by no means necessary. A warm lambing pen is required, but for the aged sheep, a sheltered shed to protect them from the winter winds is alone sufficient.
5. Weed destruction represents another asset. Sheep will eat and relish almost every class of weed.
6. Sheep admittedly improve soil fertility. Their manure is rich and uniformly distributed.
7. Except at certain seasons of the year, less time and attention need be bestowed upon the care of sheep than in the case of almost any other animal without thereby endangering successful results.

NOTES.

The great majority of diseases are due to bad management and housing, including cold, damp and ill-ventilated houses, rich feeding, impure water and lack of exercise.

Nitrate of soda may be used to good advantage in hastening vegetables to maturity. This fertilizer is easily dissolved in the soil and readily available for the use of plants. It may be spread between the rows of garden plants, and you will be surprised at the rapidity of the growth. Apply two or three times at intervals of 10 days or two weeks at the rate of from 100 to 200 pounds per acre in all applications.

It is claimed that unsalted fresh mutton fat is better than oil as a preservative against rust in tools.

In order that a brood mare may deliver a strong, healthy foal she must have plenty of exercise. Ordinary farm work is the very best kind of exercise for her. There is no reason why she should not pay her board bill in the harness. Exercise does not mean heavy lugging on rough or slippery ground; it does not mean fast driving and over-heating, but regular, every day work in the field, even right up to the day of foaling. Accompanied with this should be careful feeding and watering. Like all other questions of live stock management, it calls for the use of "common sense."

Frequent garden cultivation is very essential in seasons of frequent showers or heavy rains. Special pains should be taken to keep a soil mulch on the surface of the garden soil and thus prevent the weeds from taking a start. This will require diligence in seasons like the present, when showers are frequent and the ground in serious danger of baking should it not be cultivated after the rain. Cultivation will also help tender garden plants to make better growth, as air, sunshine and plant food are supplied better by frequent cultivation.

If a saw, hammer, plane or other steel tool is damp, do not put it away in that condition. Lay it on the warm stove a few minutes until the metal warms up enough to dry off.

Watch the currant and gooseberry bushes for the currant worms. They will strip the leaves before you know it. Use a poison to kill them. Better spray them to-day. A teaspoonful of paris green or a few ounces of arsenate of lead in a sprinkling pot of water will do the trick.

A good dairyman should practice that nicety of care that is so essential for the production of that kind of milk labeled "certified." Such milk is absolutely necessary for those that are weak, and particularly for children, since they have not the strength of older people for resisting disease germs.

No horse should be allowed to stand for even a day without exercise if the health of the animal is valued by the owner, and it is just because these two most important adjuncts to health, "careful feeding and regular exercise" are not properly attended to that we horses, especially in the winter months have so much sickness among farm

ENCOURAGE THE BOYS

The keen competition brought out in the boys' hog-feeding competition last year has prompted the management of the Toronto Fat Stock Show to again include this class in their sixth annual show to be held at the Union Stock Yards, December 10th and 11th.

This class is open to boys under 21 years, and carries with it added prizes aggregating $12[illegible].

The Provincial Department of Agriculture are offering a free term at the O. A. C. at Guelph along the same lines.

Inexpensive Check Frock

The summer frock of crepe or indestructible voile is a desirable factor of the summer wardrobe. These frocks are inexpensive and come in many attractive styles, with all manner of fascinating detail trimming. A very attractive model is illustrated, blue and white checked indestructible voile, with pleated frill edging the double-flounced skirt. The bodice, a simple surplice effect with pleated frill trimmed, three-quarter length sleeves, is daintily finished with an organdy vest with roll collar.

"Valley of Dried Bones."

The Island of Jamaica possesses a "valley of dried bones." It is near the Cockpit gap, in the Maroon county. This valley, though in the heart of the "wet country," is bare of leaf and life. The limestone rock is hot. Giant trees, which seem to have been blighted suddenly, stand up gaunt and dead. Although vegetation seems to have been active here in former years, nothing will grow now. During the hot season the temperature is almost unbearable. It is visited by seismic disturbances, which cause the dead trees and hot stones to rattle like dry bones.

LIFEBOAT FAILURE.

Lusitania Disaster Demonstrated Inefficiency of Small Craft.

The sinking of the Lusitania has demonstrated two things important alike to shipowners and passengers: One is the inefficiency of the present lifeboat service and the other is the sinkability of a supposedly unsinkable ship.

As to the lifeboats, of which less than one half the equipment actually performed their mission, it must be noted that they were even in half readiness for launching, having been swung in the davits and made all ready for loading and lowering. The event occurred in early afternoon, when passengers were dressed and for the most part out of their rooms, and as to the officers and crew was at least anticipated as well within the scope of possibilities. With some fifteen minutes in which to load, lower and get away, fully one half of the boats became unworkable and of those lowered several overturned or were smashed against the ship's side. To the inlander who never saw a Lusitania, this failure and loss of boats seems inexplainable. To the passenger who has crossed on such a ship the difficulties and dangers of a launching are very real. In the first place, the boat deck corresponds in height to the eighth or ninth story of an office building. The boats are suspended from an iron ring at each end and a slight overload on one side causes them to list or tip. Nervous passengers are unconsciously apt to spring toward the other side, which then tips still more or spills out its contents. A well-fitted canoe in the water is a very fair illustration of the instability of a lifeboat when being lowered. A slight roll of the ship also swings the boat suspended over its side like a pendulum. The outward swing is harmless, but the force of the inward swing is destructive. An ordinary ship's lifeboat, filled to capacity, weighs about four tons and strikes the steel side of the vessel with greatp force. The wash of the waves against the ship where the boat must take the water is the same as where a heavy sea meets a high seawall, producing a boiling effect on a large scale and specially favorable to a turnover. Unless loaded far in excess of capacity, a modern lifeboat should yield a high average of safety after it has gone 100 yards from its ship.

In the old days of sailing vessels, the main deck where the boats were kept was only ten or fifteen feet above the water. As hulls grew in size with steam power, the boat deck and its boats were steadily lifted higher and higher, until now they occupy a dizzy height. Shipowners will dislike to give up the large amount of valuable space on lower decks necessary to accommodate the lifeboats, but apparently something of the kind will eventually be required.

It is evident, therefore, that our present system of lifeboating is absolutely inadequate, especially in the case of the large ships, and that some radical changes are imperative, to some extent in the boat itself, but particularly as to getting it into the water successfully—Popular Mechanics.

WHY THE COYOTE HOWLS.

(A Legend of the Pueblo Indians.)

The coyote wanders up and down the earth, howling so loud that he can be heard a long distance away, and all because he has the toothache, and it is a very sharp toothache that no cries so loud, as if that would ease his pain!

But though everyone knows that the coyote howls, yet everyone does not know that he does so because his teeth aches, and even if they do know that he has an aching tooth, very few know how he came to get such a pain. The Pueblo Indians know, however, and even the little children are told all about the coyote, and when they hear his sharp cry they know the toothache is very bad.

The coyote did not always howl so dismally, for in the very beginning of the world his voice was agreeable.

When the world was first made and all the animals came into existence, the gods of the Indians gave the coyote a bag made of skin and told him to carry it to a great white mountain which stood far to the south, but warned him that on no account must he open it. The coyote took the bag and started off, running as hard as he could. He ran and he ran and he ran, for many days and many nights, and he became very hungry, but he could find nothing to eat. "Perhaps," he said to himself, "there is food in this heavy bag I am carrying. And at any rate it will do no harm to look and see."

So he opened the bag, but lo! instead of meat or corn or fish, the bag was full of beautiful, shining stars, which, as soon as the opening into their prison house was made, flew straight up into the sky, and there they have remained ever since.

The gods, however, were very much displeased with the coyote for disobeying them, and letting all the stars escape, so to punish him they ordered him to roam up and down, up and down, through forest and field, crying an howling with the toothache that should afflict him forevermore.

Havana's Water Supply.

For more than 300 years the water supply of the city of Havana was carried through an open ditch, built in 1592. The supply originated at the springs of the Almendares River, nine miles south of the city, and this source still provides an adequate flow for the springs, which have since been fully developed, number 150 and are inclosed by a heavy wall of masonry which is constantly under military guard. An aqueduct has long since supplanted the ditch.

OBSTINATE INDIGESTION CAN BE CURED

Dr. Williams Pink Pills Go Right to the Root of the Trouble.

No trouble causes more widespread suffering and discomfort than indigestion. The ailment takes various forms. Some victims are ravenous for food; others turn sick at the sight of meals: but as a rule every meal is followed by intense pains in the chest, heartburn, sick headache and often nausea. Indigestion assumes an obstinate form because ordinary medicines only subdue its symptoms but do not cure. So-called pre-digested foods only make the digestion more sluggish, and ultimately make the trouble take a chronic form.

Dr. Williams' Pink Pills cure indigestion because they go right to the root of the trouble. They make new rich blood, which so strengthens the system that the stomach does its own work and digests the food in a natural way. Many a terrible sufferer from indigestion has found a permanent cure through a fair use of Dr. Williams' Pink Pills. Among them is Mrs. H. Carmern, Locke street north, Hamilton, Ont., who says: "Dr. Williams' Pink Pills not only gave me new health and new life. For five years I was a great sufferer, was almost constantly doctoring, and spent a great deal of money with absolutely no result. My stomach was in such a dreadful condition that frequently it would not retain nourishment of any kind. When I ate I suffered terrible pains, a fluttering of the heart and often a feeling of nausea. In addition to this I was in a very anaemic condition, and felt as if I was lingering between life and death. One day while sitting in a park a lady got into conversation with me, and I told her my trouble. She asked me if I had tried Dr. Williams' Pink Pills, saying that they had been a great benefit to her daughter. When I went home I decided to try this medicine. I soon found the Pills were helping me and continued taking them for several months, when I was restored to better health than I had enjoyed for years, and I have since been the picture of health. I hope my experience may be the means of pointing to others the way to health."

You can get these pills through any medicine dealers or by mail at 50 cents a box or six boxes for $2.50 from The Dr. Williams' Medicine Co., Brockville, Ont.

MUSK.

Something About the Basis of Most Good Perfumes.

Tachienlu, which derives its importance from being what is called China's gateway to Tibet, is one of the principal musk markets of the world. During the past few years a large firm with headquarters in Paris stationed a representative at Tachienlu for the sole purpose of buying musk. It is very difficult to obtain pure musk, and every pod has to be carefully examined. While musk is exported at several points along the Tibetan border, the best quality is obtained at Tachienlu. Three thousand pounds of musk on an average are shipped every year from Chungking, and it is estimated that fully half of this amount passes through Tachienlu.

Most of the musk is sent to France where it is employed in the manufacture of perfumery. The musk is not only used for the perfume that wears this name, but is a most essential ingredient in all of the better classes of perfumery. Musk has certain radioactive properties that cause the odor of the perfume to be carried through the air in a way that would otherwise be impossible. The radioactive property of the musk affects most peculiarly the natives who carry it. If it is held close to the body for any length of time it produces sores that are probably similar in character to those caused by pure radium.

The musk pod above referred to is a sort of gland or pouch of the male deer, and the musk itself is secreted only during certain seasons of the year. It is said that this highly odoriferous secretion is provided by nature to enable the musk deer to be followed by its mate. This species of animal is much smaller that is generally supposed. It is seldom more than three feet long and twenty or twenty-two inches tall. It is becoming more and more scarce each year and at the present rate of destruction will eventually become extinct.

Quite True.

John Smart, Esq., sat in the club dining-room at lunch when a bill-collector, having somehow eluded the attention of the hall, walked up to him and laid on the table his overdue account.

The diner glared at the account, his fork suspended in the air. Then, solemnly and indignantly, he handed the paper to the collector.

"How dare you," he said, "infringe upon the rules of my club in this manner? Don't you know that a man's club is like his home? Don't you know I can have you forcibly ejected for coming in here without a card of membership or an introduction. The rules of this club require that if you have business with a member you wait in the hall when an attendant brings in your name. Now I demand that you go out into the hall at once, taking that bill with you, and that you send in your card in the proper way."

The collector, red in the face, but hopeful on the whole, complied.

John Smart, Esq., eating steadily, received the card on a silver salver. He studied it gravely.

"Ah," he said, sweetly, "tell the gentleman I'm not at home."—London Opinion.

Rough on Tommy.

The mails from home had just been received by a certain regiment. Not only were there letters, but many parcels from relatives and friends at home for lucky soldiers. One of the Tommies received a large box addressed to himself, and with a triumphant yell he rushed off to his company's lines and gathered them around him to share in the eagerly anticipated contents of his box.

"Smokes, lads!" he cried as he undid the wrapping. "From the old man, I knows it. An' there ought to be a bottle or two of Scotch."

He opened the box, gave one look at the contents and collapsed in a heap.

"What is it?" cried his comrades, pressing round.

"It's from my Auntie Mary," groaned the disappointed warrior. "Bandages an' ointment an' embrocation an' splints, an' a book on 'ow to be yer own Surgin!"—London Tit-Bits.

The Willow Creek bridge is to be rebuilt and a concrete one will take the place of the old wooden one. It is about 17 years since the old one was rebuilt. The abutements of the new bridge are to be 21 ft high and a 30 ft span, the abutements are to be built of piles, this will be the biggest bridge in the township of Bruce. The road will be closed to traffic for about two months. Jas. McKinnon has the contract for the cement work, and Hunter Bridge & Boiler Co., of Kincardine have the contract for the steel. This will mean 2½ miles further for some of the boys to go to see their "dear love", or else use the telephone or stay at home sweet home.

Centre Bruce Presbyterian church held the annual garden party at the home of Mr. and Mrs. Geo Brown on Aug. 11. But owning to it raining it had to be postponed at the last minute, after some had arrived, till the next night, Aug. 12. The weather man was against the success of the garden party. But the congregation was not nor the people who came were not, it proved to be a success in every way. The gate receipts amounted to $115 and total recepts $231 which speaks good for a postponed affair. The grounds were light up with the torches as usual, those who have never seem them before think they are just the pure thing. The Kincardine Highland Pipe band was in attendance, this is seldom given at a garden party. The program was second to none, those taking part were, the Paisley chorous Misses Wittiey, McKay, Gillies, McKenzie, McInnes, Mr. Parker, Snowden J. McColl and D. McArthur. The ladies provided abundance of the eatables for the crowd. The congregation are to be congratulated on the success they always make at their garden parties.

MANY THOUSAND MEN REQUIRED

Thousands of Men will be required from Ontario to help in the great work of harvesting the Western crop, and practically the entire task of transporting this great army of Harvesters to the West will fall to the lot of the Canadian Pacific Railway.

Excursions from points in Ontario to Manitoba, Saskatchewan and Alberta will be run, and special trains operated, making the trip in about thirty-six hours and avoiding any change of cars or transfers.

"Going Trip West," $12.00 to Winnipeg.

"Return Trip East," $18.00 from Winnipeg.

GOING DATES

August 19th and 26th—From Kingston, Tichborne Jct., Sharbot Lake, Renfrew and East in the Provinces of Ontario and Quebec, including intermediate stations and branches.

August 21st and 26th—From Toronto, Sault Ste. Marie, Ont., and East in the Province of Ontario including intermediate stations and branches, but not East of or including Kingston, Tichborne Jct., Sharbot Lake or Renfrew.

August 24th and 28th—From Toronto and stations West and North in the Province of Ontario, but not including Stations on line North of Toronto to Sudbury and Sault Ste. Marie, Ont.

For full particulars regarding transportation West of Winnipeg, etc., see nearest C.P.R. Agent, or write M. G. Murphy, District Passenger Agent, Toronto.

General Sam Hughes, Canadian Minister of Militia, declares that two thousand Americans have enlisted with the Canadian forces and that more than 100 have been killed in action in Flanders.

More Recruits Enlist

The recruiting office is still open in Paisley, under the charge of Major Hay and Dr. Houston, so that none in this district who desire to soldier for their country need miss the opportunity. During the past week seven new men have enlisted there viz:

George Woolmer,	of Port Elgin

Beating the Government.

It is reported that three tons of the catalogues of a Toronto departmental store arrived here this week by freight for distribution by parcel post from the local post office, thus getting the advantage of the cheaper parcel post rates. It appears to us to be unfair to the retail merchants of the district that the post office department should permit that sort of thing. Besides it is unfair to the department itself, depriving it of the revenue that it should have under the same system in force which should not be circumvented in such a way. Our merchants, too, should meet this unfair competition by advertising more generally, and more vigorously.—Mount Forest Confederate.

College Re-opened.

The Walkerton Business College has opened for the Fall Term with a record attendance. For the first time in the history of the institution the ambitious young men and women of Walkerton who have attended High School for one or more years have an opportunity of preparing themselves for the Civil Service examinations in November and May. To students who have graduated in Civil Service work, the Dominion Government guarantees positions with salaries from $500 to $1200 per year. Students who have taken our Correspondence Course may enter College any time now and complete the work. Others interested would do well to apply at once for particulars.—P. J. Moloney, Principal. The Western Fair

The new steel Grand Stand on the Exhibition Grounds is nearing completion. It is a magnificent structure with a seating capacity for 5,000 people. Every seat in the whole building commands a good view of the track and amusement platform. "Safety First" has been in the minds of the management from the time the building was first thought of, and this principle has certainly been carried out in its construction. There are three twenty foot entrances through to the front, one for the reserved section and two for the 25c sittings. These entrances will also be used as exits along with the other exits at either end of the stand. The accomodation provided will certainly be appreciated by the visitors to the Exhibition and the management are to be congratulated on erecting such a fine structure. Although the accomodation will be far in advance of the old stand the prices will remain the same, 50c for the reserved section and 25c for the balance. Prize lists, entry forms, programme and all information from the Secretary A. M. Hunt, London, Ont.

fine troops, especially when bayonets were fixed, the sun shining, brightening up the steel. As our section was given 'eyes right,' I took a good look at Sir Robert, for it was the first time I had seen him.

Well, two weeks ago, we had the hardest week, the first day we were out with our guns, firing all day and on Tuesday we marched to the town of Ashford twenty-two miles from Sandling, left camp seven in the morning, arriving back the same time in the evening. The next day we had a sham battle with the 10th Battalion, the 18th won the day. It was very exciting, covering about eight miles of country, over hedges, ditches, etc. carrying out precisely what would happen in real warfare only minus fixed bayonets and shell. We had a bit of fun and this is how it happened.

We took our four machine guns, placing them in position, to drop a good fire on the enemy, then we had four dummy guns fixed up, so that they could be easily seen, so that when the 10th advanced, they thought they had us guns and all but when they found out the guns were only dummies of course they were fooled and they belong in our line of fire. Well, it was a good job that we were only going through the motions else they would have been no more so you see our section that day had to gain the points that won the day, their being umpires on both sides, giving the decision. The next day had another sham fight with the 20th battalion, the result being a draw.

On Friday morning at six o'clock we had orders to roll two blankets and water sheet, and great coat. I said to myself, I know what's coming, a day and night out in the fields, or using a military phrase, a bivouac.

Well, leaving camp after breakfast, we reached our destination at five in the evening at a place called Dymchurch, a very pretty village, there is a church standing there that is 800 years old. After having supper in the field where we were to camp for the night, we were allowed to go to the village till ten o'clock, then having to answer the roll call.

After spreading my sheet on the grass, I got under my two blankets and coat, and soon fell asleep, it being a dandy night but in the early hours of the morning, down came the rain, we all got soaking wet, and laid in it, for there was nothing else we could do. When five o'clock came the sun was shining brightly and my blankets and myself soon dried. Colonel Wigle marched us down to the beach, about a mile away, and we had a swimming parade, the salt water was fine, and I have never seen such a fine beach before, there being 7 miles of sand, well this was before breakfast, and started back at nine for Sandling. This past week we have had our guns out, firing and taking up positions, trench digging, bayonet fighting, physical drill, and I can safely say, then when the word comes for us to go either to France or the Dardanells, every man will be ready to fight for the good old flag, which shall never be torn down.

Just lately there has been quite a lot of Canadian papers come into camp, and by what I see, you are getting more news than what we are over here, so its not much good of me, saying much as to how the war is progressing. But one thing I will say that this war is not to be won on points gained, it would certainly be a very black lookout for Europe, but this war is to be won on endurance, the side that can last the longest. Germany will fight to the last man, to the last shilling and to the last dog and cat, but we all know which side is going to last the longest that MUST be us, we will be for the next three month's on trial, the third big drive for Calais, because I do not think that Warsaw can hang out much longer and if not mistaken, by the time you get this, Warsaw will be in the hands of the Germans.

I think I can safely say that in September we shall be either in France or the Dardanells, but whenever it is, so long as my letters are addressed to the G P O., London, its bound to find me, and in case of accident, the list will show my English address. Last month I was home on leave, for four days, mother was very glad to see me, had a nice time, she is 'keeping pretty well, but of course, she does not want me to go, I told her that she is not the only mother that wishes that, but I guess there are thousands of mothers who right down in their heart of hearts, do not want their boys to go, but duty steps in between.

Now am just about to quit, how is Harry, hope he is quite well, guess the times are not so bright as they used to be the wheels not going quite as fast as you would like them, please remember me to all the men, often picture myself along with them in the shop.

Now will say goodbye, always glad to hear from you, hoping that yourself and Mrs. Truax are quite will.

I remain

Yours truly,

GEORGE KINGSBURY.

Youth Got Noisy

A local youth who celebrated the victory of the baseball team at Teeswater on Monday by getting intoxicated, became so noisy on the streets that night-watchman Swanson laid an information against him on a charge of being drunk and disorderly. He will appear before the magistrate in police court on Thursday afternoon at three o'clock.

Military Day in Walkerton

An attempt is being made by the town council and several prominent men to have a military day on Wednesday, Sept. 15th. Efforts are being put forth to have the company of the 34th Battalion which is billed to be in Harriston for Sept. 14th, come here for the following day. If the arrangements can be made the regimental band and a machine gun section will also be here.

Horse Turns Somersault

Mr. R. Sutton's horse did a spectacular stunt in front of the town hall on Wednesday afternoon of last week. While being driven down the slight grade there the animal stumbled and turned a complete somersault. Fortunately it took matters very quietly and the only damage done was to the harness which was, as a result, badly in need of repair.

Who is Responsible?

Who is responsible for the deplorable condition of the vacant lot at the rear of the public library? The beautiful weeds which bedeck the scenery there are an eyesore and a disgrace to the municipality. The town fathers should see to it that conditions are remedied at once and that the lot in future is kept clean by the party responsible, whether it be the streets commissioner, the Department of Agriculture, the caretaker of the library or the Horticultural Society.

Council Strike Rate

The town council held a special meeting on Monday evening for the purpose of striking the tax rate for the present year and after some consideration fixed it at thirty-two mills. This is somewhat of an increase over last year's rate, but was made necessary by the increased expenditure this year.

Farmer Instantly Killed

Mr. Ruttle a well-to-do farmer living in the vicinity of Ripley was the victim of a fatal accident on Thursday afternoon last. The deceased was on a beam in the barn watching the slings which were in operation, but were not working satisfactorily, when a pulley became loose from its place and struck the unfortunate man on the head with terrible force. He fell to the barn floor and received such injuries that death ensued shortly afterwards. The late Mr. Ruttle was a brother-in-law of Mrs. Robt. Irwin of Walkerton.

Death of Mrs Shaw.

On Friday last there passed away one of Walkerton's most highly respected and best known residents in the person of Anna Robertson, widow of the late Alexander Shaw, K. C., whose death occurred at her home on Durham St. after but a short illness. The deceased was in her 77th year and is survived by four sons and one daughter, viz: Messrs J. R. of Woodstock, Alex of Texas, Farquhar of Winnipeg and Wm. of Walkerton and Miss Bede at home. Mr. Norman Robertson is a brother of the deceased. The funeral which was private was held to the Walkerton cemetery on Sunday afternoon.

Fayle, Andrew Lang, Joseph M. Schill, Alvin Riley, Eugene N. R. Reed, Henry Ernest, Hector McDonald, William Tronge, Wm. Finlayson, J. Cotterman, Frank Morrison, Bert Chatteau, Thos. Loftus, Ed Ernest, Chas Frieburger, and Thomas Cunningham.

Bruce Should Purchase Guns

The purchase of machine guns for the Canadian overseas forces, has become a live topic in Bruce County and is being discussed in every municipality. The difficult question is, how to raise the money, that is an amount which would do credit to this county, for that purpose. Several different methods have been advocated, personal canvas for subscriptions, etc., but to date no definite plan of campaign has been arranged. To settle the matter would it not be advisable to call a special meeting of the county council and make a county grant? This would mean that there would be no shirkers and each and every citizen of Bruce would necessarily contribute his share. Wentworth County Council took this course and the county is providing ten machine guns for the 1st and 4th Battalion. Let Bruce not be backward and let some member of the council or interested party, take the matter up at once and have the special meeting necessary, called for the consideration of the proposal.

Car for Sale

Forty Days are Up

There were a good many people who made light of the theory of forty day's rain following the showers on St Swithins' Day, Thursday July 15th., but the old adage has held good, not in fancy but in fact, for with but few exceptions since that date there have been showers almost every forty-eight hours. Tuesday was the last of the forty days and it now remains to be seen whether the St Swithin's Day rain really had an influence with Jupiter Pluvius or whether we are merely having an extraordinarily wet summer. If St Swithin wants to hold his reputation, he must now give us clear sunny weather.

Sentenced to Five Years.

Robert Hornby of Wiarton vicinity, who was up on a charge of criminally assaulting a girl under sixteen years of age, appeared before Judge Greigg at the court house on Saturday morning and on being found guilty was sentenced to five years in the penitentiary This was Judge Greigg's first criminal case, and the first sentence which he meted out will meet with the approval of the populace of Bruce County. In the past some men who appeared on similar charges have been treated leniently by the court, but Judge Greigg's first sentence intimates that girls and young women can in the future look for protection from the courts of Bruce and the example made of Hornby should be sufficient warning to other men that should they be found guilty of rape, attempted rape or indecent assault, they too will receive their just deserts.

Spent Night in Lockup.

Paisley is a local option municipality and being unable to secure booze there John McNeill, a resident of that burg, came to Walkerton on Thursday last in order to satisfy his thirst of long standing with something stronger than water or local option beer. He drank too freely, however, and when night came, he had not only run out of cash, but had lost his ticket and acquired such a jag that he was refused passage on the train by the conductor. McNeill, when returning down town spied a tent near the tile yard of which he took possession and proceeded to make himself comfortable for the night. The boys who occupied the tent arrived shortly afterwards and ordered him out, but through his refusal to leave, McNeill, soon found himself in the hands of Chief Ferguson and later in the lockup. Here he spent the night, but as he was in no way disorderly he was allowed to go his way in the morning without paying the usual dollar and costs.

Attempted Suicide ?

With the rear windows as the "gods" and the back steps as box seats, some residents of the Centre ward were treated to a farce comedy in real life on a recent evening. The fun commenced when a family whose domestic life runs none too smoothly, started one of their usual and frequent "spats" The spat developed into a quarrel and the tumult increased in intensity, intermingled with harse words from hubby "the villain" which sounded something like this ! x ? !—! * * —, and soon the feminine factor of the controversy burst into tears and shouting that she was done with this world, rushed to the cistern, lifted the cover and jumped in. At this critical juncture the hero, in the person of hubby's brother appeared upon the scene and amid the applause from the rear seats, and shouts of "Let Her Drown" "Punk Stuff" from the "gods", he caught the drowning ? woman by the clothes and pulled her back to solid footing. The curtain was rung down and the final act closed when the wife's dripping form was seen in her husband's arms both asking forgiveness and promising to fight no more, and we have been informed that they have made good their promise for there have been no more scenes and no more rude noises in that domecile. The only objection which those who witnessed the comedy have, is that the hero received no reward for his act.

Military Day at Harriston.

The Town of Harriston Patriotic Committee have arranged for the celebration of a Military Day on Tuesday 14th September. The big attraction will be a full company of the 34th Battalion, commanded by Major C. E. Livingstone, now in camp at London, accompanied by a Machine Gun Section and the regimental Band. The committee also expect to have addresses by prominent military and public leaders, and will provide an interesting programme both afternoon and evening. The purpose is to raise money for patriotic purposes and to stimulate recruiting.

Injured in Lacrosse Game.

While playing lacrosse in Fergus on Wednesday last, Harry Wettlaufer of the local team received a nasty blow on the head. Harry remained out of the game for a short time and thought little of the blow, but shortly after reaching the hotel after the game he collapsed and lost consciousness. It was thought that he was suffering from concussion of the brain, and was removed to the hospital. Fortunately however his injury was not so serious and after spending a day in the hospital he recovered sufficiently to return to his home here. Harry will probably have to remain out of the game for a year or two for should he receive another swat in the same place it would undoubtedly result in a more serious if not fatal injury.

Won the District

The controversy between the Walkerton and Teeswater Northern league baseball teams was settled by the league officials last week, the clubs being ordered to replay the game on the Teeswater diamond on Monday of last week. The game was called for 4.30 and the local ball-tossers motored to Teeswater accompanied by a large number of fans. As was expected they showed their superiority over their opponents by defeating them by a score of 6-4. The game was closely contested, full of thrills from the first to the ninth. In winning this game the Walkerton nine have captured the district honors and have qualified to enter the semi-finals with the Owen Sound Greys. Walkerton plays in Owen Sound on Tuesday of next week and the return game will take place here the following Saturday afternoon Sept. 4th.

Communication

WHAT ABOUT A MACHINE GUN OR AN AMBULANCE MOTOR?

About two weeks ago there was a meeting called by the Mayor to consider the purchase of a machine gun and at that meeting a committee was appointed to devise ways and means for said purpose. And also to confer with the neighboring municipalities so as to secure their co-operation in the matter. As yet there does not seem to be anything being done, while we see by our public papers that many of the towns and villages around us are "up and doing" having raised funds for the purchase of machine guns.

Surely Walkerton should not be so slow in doing something in the matter to help our Empire in the great struggle in which it is engaged. We may think that because we are so far from the seat of war, that it will not effect us, but we must remember that what effects the Empire will also effect us, and we ought to help in some way.

The ladies and the Red Cross Society are doing their part loyally and bravely in preparing for the men in the trenches, and for the wounded in the hospitals who are disabled and need all the attention we can give.

Perhaps some would prefer assisting in getting a motor ambulance, which would certainly be the humane side of the matter, and help to convey the wounded to the hospitals.

W.

Jocelin's Penance

During Richard's reign there was no law which necessitated an Abbot being a Churchman, and as soon as Prince John discovered this he decided to give the Abbey to Geoffrey. This determination was a blow to the Prior, as it menaced his plans; for should the Prince appoint the ruler of the Abbey, custodians would be sent thither, and he would have to give a strict account of all treasure listed on the Abbey books. After some discussion, the bishop spoke to Prince John, stating that the Prior protested against an appointed Abbot, and demanded the right of electing one of their own number. John at once broke forth in a rage, "God's blood! thou pope-holy monk; dost heard me? Geoffrey, and none other, shall have St. Edmunds, and a merry life he'll lead his sons. Geoffrey, Abbas Dominus!" and the idea of the dissipated courtier as a father abbot so amused the volatile Prince that he laughed. Then the Prior ventured to beg that he speak with him. The Prince motioned Geoffery and the bishop to leave the dais, and conversed for some time with him, his face darkening at the Prior's words, and then approving, he nodded his head, and at last, smiting his knee, exclaimed, "By my halidame, 'tis the thing! A fair damsel, a great fief, and a chance to spite my brother Richard—I mean to reward my brother Geoffrey."

In short, this was what the subtle Prior whispered. Adam de Cokefield, Chief Advocate of the Abbey, had been slain in the crusade against Palestine. He left his daughter Rohese and a rich fief to the guardianship of the Abbot of Bury. Now De Cokefeld's brother Advocates would refuse to accept as guardian of these riches any Abbot of the hated Regent's appointing; and by electing one of their own number Abbot, the monks would furnish a guardian satisfactory to them, and, at some future time, the Abbot could privately transfer the ward and her fortune to whomsoever the Prince should designate.

"Is this Lady Rohese fair, Prior?"

"Truly, so they say," answered the Prior so primly that the Prince laughed again, and was in high good humor with himself and all the world. He motioned his favorite to him.

"Here, Geff," he said, "the worthy Prior offers in exchange for a worm-eaten convent, rat-ridden and wrapped in debt, with droning, snivelling monks, the fairest fief in the realm, and a maid, Rohese by name—a name that brings to mind, a red, red rose. Thou shalt pluck this red rose, Geff, and pull the tassel of its golden purse. Wilt give up being an abbot for warmer temporal blessings?"

"Aye, that I will; a fair maid, a fair fief, and leave to serve my Prince, what more could a poor courtier ask? Thou are great and generous, my brother," and Geoffrey knelt to kiss John's hand.

"Away, then to the Council, Sir Prior; marshal thy black flock before thee; and thou, my Lord Bishop, attend us to the banquet hall, for beshrew me, if my stomach lieth not it is time to sup."

The Prior and monks followed the Seneschal to a nearby chamber; that worthy waving his baton with ponderous condescension, as if it were some fairy wand with which he could bestow the Abbey and lands as he would.

When they were seated at the great carved oak table, and the tapers had been lit in the sconces, no one spoke until Samson said, in a voice of command, "Produce the names." Already the man of power stepped forward to assume the leadership. Jocelin opened his scrip and gave the parchment to the Prior. With elaborate care he unsealed it, and read in his high, singsong voice:

"Roger, Prior,
Gilbert, Sub Prior,
Samson, Sacristan."

There was no comment upon the names, save John O'Dice's contemptuous grunt as the name of Gilbert was read. In silence the monks bowed their heads, as the Prior repeated the oath binding them to vote fairly. Then, one by one, they wrote a name on a slip of parchment, all but Richard, the butcher, and John, who was unequal to their task, delegated it to the Prior. Roger then read aloud the names. He had received the greater number of votes; a few for Samson, and one for Gilbert (presumably cast by that worthy himself), completed the toll. The face of Samson was unperturbed, but Jocelin paled with disappointment.

"My brethren," the thin voice of Roger broke the silence, "I grow old and weary of service, and I tell ye now that I shall soon bid farewell to our Alma Mater and away to the Holy City to pass my days in prayer and fasting."

"Wantoning and feasting," murmured the Medicus spitefully, having in mind a slip of Roger's long before he had gained the Priorship; to which Walter aspired.

"So, mes fils, I give you thanks, and tell you that I cannot be recorded St. Edmund's Abbot."

After some show of astonishment at this news, they fell into a lengthy discussion of it. A set of childish, simple men were these, unlearned in the ways of the world, but half men at best, as men went in those times; they babbled on to no purpose, finally holding Samson's suggestion that they ballot again on the two remaining names. This they did; and, save Gilbert's vote for himself, the parchments bore the name of "Samson, Sacristan." The Prior nodded his head, and Jocelin's eyes beamed with delight. Samson rose and made obeisance to his brethren. "I thank ye," he said, his rugged features unchanged, and two by two the monks filed into the banquet hall, where the Prior made known the Council's choice. The Prince did not lay down the lark's leg he was gnawing, nor did he pause to wipe his greasy mouth upon his gold fringed napkin—"I do as ye desire. Confirming the Council, I salute thee, Samson, Dominus-Abbas of Bury. Our Lord Bishop I appoint to install thee at thine own appointed time. Prior, remember De Cokefeld's fief, and thou, Abbot Samson, see that thou govern well and snatch thine Abbey from the Jews' clutches," spitting as he spoke to express his Christian abhorrence of the race, "for if thou fail I will be upon thee like the wolf upon the fold." Samson kissed the royal hand still holding the lark's leg; then he blessed the audience, and heading his monks with a stern glance at the Prince, which somewhat disconcerted him, he marched from the hall to the chorus of the fifty-first psalm, "Miserere mei Deus," leaving the chagrined Prince to exclaim, "By the true eye of God! Me thinks that one will govern the Abbey well."

The keep of Sir Adam de Cokefeld stood on a wooded plateau with the River Lark nearly surrounding it, a natural moat for the castle. Its portcullised drawbridge led to a paved courtyard, usually thronged by bearded foot soldiers in gleaming, clanking mail, or long leathern jackets and buskins, playing at quoits among stacked lances and the chargers, which grooms were feeding and rubbing down.

In the castle yard yawned a fireplace great enough to roast an ox whole, and its walls were hung with iron-spiked clubs, heavy maces and sheaves of quarrels, with their cross-bows. This hall was the entrance to the don-jon, or keep, where were stored the arms and provisions, used during sieges; and from the keep an iron barred doorway led into the living apartments, which opened upon a turfed ballum, one side of which was faced by the chapel and soldiers' quarters, backed by walls of great height and thickness.

At Sir Adam's death, the household of Lady Rohese vainly urged her to seek asylum in the nunnery near St. Edmunds. But her first grief past, she set the keep in order and spent the year of mourning in receiving her father's soldiers, who came straggling back, a few at a time from the unsuccessful siege of Jerusalem. With the aid of her seneschal, Gilbert O'Dice, she collected her rents and governed her people well. Though her chief vassals and tenants were much scandalized when on the day of judgment they assembled in the castle hall, and found the slim figure of their lady in the great judgment chair, with her maids behind her and old Gilbert at her side, wringing his hands that a woman should dare to sit in the seat, whence the long line of the Cokefelds had governed so well. But the maiden judge went calmly about her business, and settled a dispute between two grange-holders in a way that none could demur.

Thereafter she had gone on, somewhat laughed at by her father's brother knights and a great scandal and horror in the eyes of their ladies. "She can read," Bishop Riddel's sister Alicia exclaimed to her friend and gossip, the Lady of Clare. "An' Latin, too, like a monk, by my truth!" answered the other.

"The maid will come to no good end. God ne'er intended woman to aspire to the intellects of man." And they nodded their heads sagely over their posset cups, for they often spent the night together when the good bishop was away on some expedition with my Lord of Clare.

But the maiden holder of the keep went on her way, oblivious of praise or blame, a just ruler of her people; loved by all and worshipped by her soldiers; though her maids often whispered to each other that their lady had never smiled since the news of Sir Adam's death.

"But, 'tis not all from mourning our Lord," said Mary, eldest and favorite of the attendants, as they sat in the lady's bower one rainy autumn morning. "I have lived with Lady Rohese since we two were babes together, for is she not my foster sister? And well I know what page it was who played oftenest in our bower. Henry Leicester, Sir Adam's ward, would leave many a hawk unflown to play the lute as we sat at our needles; and, growing older—a gallant squire, he still wore her glove in his cap. An' by our Lady! maids, did I not go with Sir Adam and Lady Rohese to St. Edmunds, where two years ago they fixed their spurs upon young Henry, and she gave him his helmet with her colors in the crest? Then Sir Adam laughed, as the two looked long upon each other; an' blushing, looked again, as if they could not cease, and said to my Lord Abbot,—'Dominie there will be nuptials in St. Edmunds when this popinjay comes back from the wars, and takes up his inheritance.' An' then, maids ye should have seen Henry's face, and how he kissed our lady's hand, an' how she pulled me away; until we ran into the sacristy, that the knights and monks should not see how her bosom heaved and her eyes filled. Then she fell on my neck and murmured, 'O girl, I love him; I love him!'"

"And to this day has she never spoken of him?" asked Eunice, youngest of the maids, her round blue eyes moist with sympathy.

"Never, poppet! When news came of Sir Adam's death, she turned white and sat for a moment very still. Then she asked, 'And what news of Henry of Leicester?'

"'Tis thought that he died defending his lord,' was the answer.

"An' 'twas then our Lady cried 'Ah!' as if an arrow had struck home, and pressing her hand to her heart fell back in my arms in a swoon—the first of her life."

"'Tis like some tale of Arthur's court," sighed Anne, who was very sentimental, and fancied herself pining with love for a certain burly horseman, who knew not whether her hair was white or brown, and would give any maid in Christendom for one pot of nut-brown ale.

While thus the maidens gossiped softly over their embroidery frame, the mistress sat sadly looking out on the dreary rain-soaked ballum. Her purple robe, with its loose wide sleeves, was unadorned, though her white veil fell from a purple velvet dress, richly bejewelled with rubies and diamonds. As she sat musing with her cheek on her white hand, the fair maids, their tale of gossip done, had a laughing fling or two at the expense of a fair-haired youth clad richly in minstrel's garb, who sat idly strumming his harp in expectation that his lady would bid him begin his new ballad.

But Lady Rohese was in no mood for minstrelsy. For a [illegible] weary year she had eased her aching heart by attending upon the hard duties of her position, but now that she had learned thoroughly the routine, had systematized all the household workings (to the dismay of the servants), and had mastered the details and management of her fief, from the collecting of scutage-moneys (paid yearly to the King's exchequer) to the small dribblings of the rep-taxes into her own; she found time heavy on her hands, and many a dreary hour in which to brood over the lost father and lover. She was no lily maid—this Lady Rohese—left early, without a mother, alone with the servitors in her father's keep, his companion at hunt and board; tutored by the master of Ely's schools, who twice a week rode between the castle and the town, to teach the little maid who reigned supreme in Sir Adam's hall and heart.

So she had grown learned for a woman of her time and age. Straight, tall, and lithe as a willow wand; her small auburned crowned head set well upon her tower-like neck; she was formed in classic mould; taper of limb and straight of feature, with almond shaped eyes of deepest gray, and a generous scarlet mouth closing on teeth as white as the carved ivory necklace her father had brought her from eastern countries. Her skin was of that clear, creamy tint (just tinged on the rounded cheeks with pink), rarely beheld, save in some perfect flower.

Rohese recalled herself with a start, and looking toward the minstrel, said kindly, "Now, Raoul, let us hear thy ballad. May, move my chair to the frame, and I will bestir my sluggard self," and taking up her position in the midst of her maids, she began to ply a skilful needle, as Raoul, his petulance banished by her smile, struck the chords of his harp and sang to a plaintive air:

There dwelt a Page in Castle Clare,
And O he loved his Lady so,
And yet she moved so proud and fair—
She did not care—she did not know,
She did not care, nor know.

It was one morning bright and fair,
The Lady hawking rode that day,
And by a dark and deep mill stream
Her retin'e took their way—their way,
Her retin'e took their way.

All gaily decked in cloth of gold
The Lady rode and cried,
"Unhood the hawk at yon mill race"
To the leal page at her side—her side,
To the leal page at her side.

But when her favorite hawk sunk down,
All wounded in the Race—
"Alas"—she cried—"my goshawk rave"
Whilst tears ran down her face—her face—
Whilst tears ran down her face.

Then into the deep water sprang
Sir page, her hawk to save,
But never rose he from the stream—
The mill race was his grave—his grave,
The mill race was his grave.

The Lady she shed many a tear—
"That page I'll ne'er forget,
But tell me, Steward, did he save
For me my precious pet—my pet,
For me my precious pet?"

There dwelt a Page in Castle Clare,
And O he loved his Lady so,
And yet she moved so proud and fair—
She did not care, she did not know—
She did not care, nor know."

When the last note rippled away, Raoul sat expectant of a word of praise from Lady Rohese (while the maids exclaimed at the pitiful fate of the page, and the indifference of the lady); but the minstrel was doomed to disappointment, for as Rohese lifted her head from the embroidery frame to thank him for his song, the door opened and Gilbert O'Dice entered, his mature little frame drawn to its full height, and his weazened face portentous. He was followed by a young monk, and announced in a loud voice, as he bowed before his lady, "A messenger from our Lord, the Abbot."

CHAPTER VII.

The minstrel withdrew as the monk advanced and the maids turned again to their embroidery. Buxom, brown-haired Mary; slender, sharp-featured Bertha, with flaxen ringlets and paper-white skin, Anne, swart and tall (a Spanish father's blood showing in dusky face and eyes), and little childish Eunice, gentian blue of eye, with one long plait of the palest brown hair falling to her knees. Dressed in dark, close girdled robes, grouped about their lady like so many pretty garden flowers around a regal rose, they formed a blooming background to Rohese, as she straightened herself to receive the Abbot's messenger. The messenger, Jocelin of Brakeland, paused before them, dumfounded, with a missive half extended, gazing at them with child-like wonder and delight. Save for the wenches of Bury town, he had seen no other woman, and his mother, long since dead, was the only lady he had ever known. Rohese, though impressed with his appearance, was too accustomed to the young and handsome nobles who visited her father's castle, to be moved by even such beauty as the young monk possessed, and she could but smile at his evident confusion.

As he looked at her, as if for encouragement, their eyes met, the sparkling gray of the maid and the sombre brown of the monk, for a second the gray eyes twinkled with amusement, but their long lashes flickered and fell, and a blush crept over the maid's face, for the monk's gaze seemed but all piercing to her very soul; then his look took fire, in a flash it changed to one of devouring, appealing wooing; latent passion, smouldering unexcited, had flashed into flame. Nature had completed her work. This cloister-bred youth had found his manly heritage. The recognition of sex had come to him, and the man, a sworn celibate, loved.

Of course there was no analysis of this in Rohese's mind; yet she felt an intuitive alarm and resentment at the monk's long gaze, and maidenly fever (like these timid little lizards that tremble at the shadow of a leaf) unfurled her banners on the girl's brow and cheek. But quick as it came the blush faded, and she spoke with courteous dignity:

"What is the will of our Lord, Sir Monk?"

Jocelin started at the sound of her voice, like one awakened from a pleasant dream.

"Lady, I bring thee a message from our father, Abbot Samson."

"Samson, say'st thou? I have but returned from a stay in Norfolk, and knew not of a new Abbot."

"Hugo is long since dead, Madam, and our Abbas Dominus, Samson, has for many fortnights ruled over our Abbey wisely and well, adding to our number one hundred and fifty brethren from Normandy."

"Thou art welcome, sir; what ca' they thee?"

The Oldest Warfare.

They are talking of the great wars fought in the days when this old world was considerably younger.

"But, you know," said Paul, "it always seems to me that those old warriors were very tame beside modern financiers."

"What on earth do you mean?" asked Maud.

"Well, they were always invading some one else's capital, weren't they?"—London Mail.

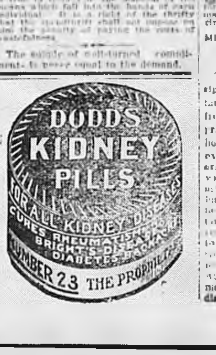
THE SPENDTHRIFT.

(Detroit Free Press)

The spendthrift assumes that in scattering the money and property falling into his hands he is exerting some sort of an inalienable right to which he was born. "It's my money," he says, "it's nobody's business what I do with it." When the money is gone and the winter of age is upon this same individual seems to think it another inalienable right to demand, and to receive support from and at the expense of other, thriftier persons, who are taxed to maintain refuges for broken-down wastrels.

Long ago the principle was laid down that "no man liveth unto himself." This is true in respect of the disposal of the means which fall into the hands of any individual. It is a right of the thrifty that the spendthrift shall not impose on him the penalty of paying the costs of wastefulness.

The supply of well-turned compliments is never equal to the demand.



DEGREES OF COOKING.

What is Meant by Rare, Medium and Well Done Meat.

Perhaps a word may be said about the degree of cooking, as indicated by the words rare, medium and well done, used in reference to the cooking of meat.

Some people interpret "rare" as meaning meat seared a little on the outside, but with the whole interior raw. This is far from a correct interpretation. The albumen should be coagulated, the fibres really cooked, but the juice may be yet red or pink. In "medium" there is still some pink left in the meat, though the red color has left the juice, while "well done" means no pink color in either juice or fibre, but not the overcooked, tasteless product so often served as "well done" meat.

The quantity and kind of meat used by any family depend upon its living habits, its appreciation of food values and the money available for food. The excessive use of meat means an unwise expenditure of money as well as an unnecessary tax upon the kidneys, and [illegible] it is a most important factor.—Woman's World.

HAVE YOU A BAD SORE?

If so, remember these facts—Zam-Buk is by far the most widely used balm in Canada! Why has it become so popular? Because it heals sores, cures skin diseases, and does what is claimed for it. Why not let it heal your sore?

Remember that Zam-Buk is altogether different to the ordinary ointments. Most of these consist of animal fats. Zam-Buk contains no trace of any animal fat, or any mineral matter. It is absolutely herbal.

Remember that Zam-Buk is at the same time healing, soothing, and antiseptic. Kills poison instantly, and all harmful germs. It is suitable alike for recent injuries and diseases, and for chronic sores, ulcers, etc. Test how different and superior Zam-Buk really is. All druggists and stores at 50c. box. Use also Zam-Buk Soap. Relieves sunburn and prevents freckles. Best for baby's bath. 25c. tablet.

Force of Habit.

"Funny things happen, even on street cars," stated old Dad Hiley. "Tother day I got on one that was entirely empty, and at the next corner it stopped and let another gent on. He was a middle aged person with a far-away look in his eye, and instead of taking his choice of seats he grabbed a strap and hung there, swaying and flapping like a fresh caught fish.

"'I don't aim to be inquisitive, podner,' says I, 'but if it's a fair question why don't you set down?'

"'Why—why,' says he, 'I could do that, couldn't I? But, oh, alas! It is too late to change the habits of a lifetime. I never saw an empty seat before!'

"So saying, he clung and swung clear downtown, and I went along just to look at him."—Kansas City Star.

Where Leaders Stand.

There is one Asiatic idea as to the right place of the commander in warfare which is altogether different from the frigid scientific Japanese principle. Sir Francis Younghusband has told us that when the British expedition to Lhasa first met the grand host of the Tibetans and a fight was provoked, with consequences disastrous to the primitive warriors, the lamas protested against the wickedness of the British attack. The Tibetans, they insisted, had never meant resistance, and for proof they pointed to the presence of the leaders with the troops. If, they said, any fighting had been intended all those in authority would of course have moved a day's march to the rear!—Manchester Guardian.

THE CUNNING OF CROWS.

In India These Birds Have Been Labeled "Shreds of Satan."

Travelers in the orient have much to say about the Indian crow, a bird that for uncanny knowingness and prankish audacity has perhaps no equal. Corvus splendens thus have ornithologists flatteringly labeled him. But a naturalist who knows the Indian crows at first hand has called them "shreds of Satan, cinders from Tartarus." To give the impish creatures their due, however, it should be said that life in India is not a little enlivened by their presence. A correspondent witnessed the following incident:

A small hawk had seized a little bird and perched on a leafless branch to devour its prey. The spectacle drew two crows to the spot. They hopped and flapped from branch to branch, noisily discussing the strategy of their intended raid.

Then one of them quietly slipped away through the surrounding foliage. At the same time its mate flew in front of the perching hawk and, hovering within a foot of his beak, maintained a bustling pretence of snatching the tidbit. That effectually compelled the attention of the hawk. His prey firmly grasped beneath his feet, he angrily hissed and lunged at the hovering nuisance. So lively was the skirmish that the human onlooker forgot the existence of the second crow. But now that wily thief reappeared some distance in the rear of his destined victim. With stealthy sidlings and short, noiseless flights, he drew near. Then he made a swift dash, seized the hawk's long, barred tail by the tip, hung on it with his full weight and toppled the luckless hawk in a complete somersault from the branch! The released tidbit was instantly seized by the first crow, and the clever pair bore off their booty with much triumphant cawing.—Youth's Companion.

Why He Was Careful.

A man who believed in pedestrianism coaxed a friend to accompany him on a little jaunt. Every time they crossed the road his friend looked first one way and then the other and refused to budge if there chanced to be a motorcar in sight.

"I've good reason to be careful," answered his friend. "The insurance policy I carry is void if I get run over by one."—Judge.

BIRD PROTECTION.

Few of Our Feathered Friends Injure Grain or Fruit.

With the increasing knowledge of the value of wild birds has come a demand for a larger measure of protection for them in their passage to and from Canada in their annual migrations as well as during their sojourn here. Numerous organizations are at work to this end, and some of our brightest minds are devoting their time and energies on behalf of the birds.

Farmers and fruit growers, almost as a unit, have come to recognize the value of birds as enemies of destructive insects. Careful investigations have shown that by far the greater number of our birds subsist on a diet of insects, and only on rare occasions do they attack fruit.

Still further education is required among the young, however, for the protection of birds and other nests. The Boy Scouts have been doing valued work in this direction.

Why He Got Up.

It was only about daybreak, but the commuter yawned. He yawned heavily two or three times.

"Got up at 6 o'clock," he explained. "Had to catch my train. When my wife waked me I said to her: 'Six o'clock? The chickens haven't begun to crow yet, have they? Why must I get up before the chickens do, I'd like to know.'

"'I don't know,' she said, 'unless it's because you're no chicken.'"—New York Press.

TIMELY TIPS.

The Ten Commandments of Summer Health.

Thou shalt not overeat, and impose too great a task upon a stomach that is naturally more delicate in the summer than in the winter.

Thou shalt not eat more than two full meals per day during the summer months.

Thou shalt not hurry thyself into a white heat, but take all things deliberately and quietly.

Thou shalt not sleep indoors if it is possible for thee to sleep in the open air.

Thou shalt not wear much clothing or tight clothing. Avoid wool fabrics and dark colors as much as possible.

Thou shalt not enter into war arguments, quarrels or other brain-heating activities.

Thou shalt not fail to let cold water run upon thy wrists when overheated, as this will reduce the temperature more quickly than anything else.

Drooping, Tired, Weary, Try This Remedy!

Don't give in to that depressed, played out, don't care sort of feeling. Better days are ahead. Cheer up, do as the other fellow is doing, tone and strengthen your blood, and you'll feel like new again. You'll dance with new found energy once you use Dr. Hamilton's Pills. They will quickly fill your system with energy, bring back the old appetite, restore that long lost complexion, make you feel like a kid again. MAKING PLANTS GROW.

The value of carbonic acid gas as a plant nutrient has been the subject of considerable recent literature, including an interesting paper by H. Fischer, describing experiments in Europe. The author found that the development of both foliage and flowers was stimulated by an excess of carbonic acid in the air, while the yield of tomatoes was doubled, and that of cucumbers increased 12.5 per cent. by carbonic acid treatment.

It has generally been held that .03 per cent. of carbon dioxide in the air is sufficient for plant growth, but Mr. Fischer thinks that more than this can be utilized, provided there is ample light, and that experiments in this direction will give valuable results.

On the other hand, Mr. I. F. Kidd, an English investigator, finds that an excess of carbon dioxide in the atmosphere retards or inhibits the germination of seeds, but without injuring them. He suggests that the production of carbon dioxide in nature by the decay of vegetable matter may play a part of analogous to that noted in his experiments.

SUMMER HEAT HARD ON BABY

No season of the year is so dangerous to the life of little ones as is the summer. The excessive heat throws the little stomach out of order so quickly that unless prompt aid is at hand, the baby may be beyond all human help before the mother realizes he is ill. Summer is the season when diarrhoea, cholera infantum, dysentery and colic are most prevalent. Any one of these troubles may prove deadly if not promptly treated. During the summer the mother's best friend is Baby's Own Tablets. They regulate the bowels, sweeten the stomach and keep baby healthy. The Tablets are sold by medicine dealers or by mail at 25 cents a box from The Dr. Williams' Medicine Co., Brockville, Ont.

The Jordan Harbor Peach Ranch will commence Sept. 1 to pack and ship 100,000 gallon hospital size sanitary cans, each containing six and one-half to seven pounds of Superba brand peaches for distribution through the Canadian Red Cross Society to overseas hospitals in British Isles, France and Belgium.

This undertaking is of great magnitude, representing fifty car loads of fresh fruits and the employment of over two hundred men and women, the peach season packing daily 5,000 large hospital cans.

These peaches are peeled, pitted and halved, then packed in large hospital sanitary cans in heavy syrup, then crated, six cans in each crate to be forwarded to destination through the Canadian Red Cross Society. The total cost is fifty cents per can. This charge includes all expenses. These fruits are packed exclusively for the Canadian Red Cross Society and cannot be purchased by the general public as they are prepared and delivered to the Canadian Red Cross Society at actual cost.

By remitting 50 cents through the Canadian Red Cross Society or direct to the Jordan Harbor Peach Ranch, Jordan Station P.O., Ont., it ensures one of these large cans of beautiful Superba brand peaches being forwarded to our sick and wounded soldiers.

Don't delay in accepting this opportunity. These fruits are urgently needed and will be much appreciated by our gallant defenders.

All subscriptions will be duly acknowledged and should be completed by Sept. 1. Remit now.

Contributions are being received from all parts of Canada. Think of our sick and wounded defenders in overseas hospitals. It's up to you to "do your bit at once." What is your answer?

THE MATTER OF RECRUITING.

The Montreal Daily Mail gives the following summary of the recruiting in Canada by Provinces, which shows that the East is lagging far behind the West, with Ontario standing between the two extremes. The following are the figures:

Province	Pop.	Vol'l'rs.	P.C.
Quebec	2,003,232	13,000	0.61
Maritime ..	937,955	7,400	0.79
Man. & Sask.	858,016	21,000	2.78
British Col..	392,480	10,000	2.55
Alberta	374,663	14,200	3.73
	7,089,650	103,700

A good deal has been said about the conduct of some French-Canadians in trying to break up recruiting meetings. But too much importance need not be attached to this. In a large city like Montreal there will be found men with Socialistic, reactionary tendencies, men to whom notoriety is the breath of life, and who will be willing at any or all times to make trouble. A look at the summary, of course, will show that Quebec's percentage is low, but not much lower than that of the Maritime Provinces, the people of which cannot be accused of disloyalty. The Quebec people, we imagine, have not yet thoroughly sensed the fact that, in the words of Lord Kitchener, the solemn hour has struck when every Britain must do his duty.

The figures for Quebec are particularly unsatisfactory because there is no province in the Dominion that has a finer type of manhood or greater unanimity as to the justice of the cause for which the two Motherlands of Britain and France are fighting. The fault must lie in the fact that the vital nature of the demand upon our patriotism has not been fully realized. It is evident that a still more stirring campaign will have to be inaugurated to bring the East to a full realization of the tremendous sacrifices that are called for, and in that campaign the best elements of our own province, both French and British, may be relied upon to join with absolute unanimity of purpose.

The Kingston Standard has seen fit to make a bitter attack on the French Canadians, or at least that turbulent section already referred to. Such notice only feed their vanity, and do no good. There are many splendid French Canadians fighting in the trenches.

THOSE WAR HORSES.

Premier Borden has solemnly promised to bring to punishment all those convicted of fraud in connection with the purchase of remounts for the Canadian forces at the front. If he is to implement his promise it is time that he was home to see that the rascals are put in jail. The story that has been coming day by day from Nova Scotia of the sort of animals bought by the Government has been an astonishing one. No horse was too old or too defective to pass the doctor, and there seemed to be no limit to the number of such horses that were bought. Horses that fell down and could not rise up without help were bought as chargers for the front. There appeared to be no age limit, horses over thirty years of age being enrolled among the forces. It was a mighty mean piece of business for anybody to sell such animals to the Government. But it would be hard to characterize the Government agents who bought them or the men who passed them. What sort of a fight could a Canadian put up when mounted upon one of these broken-winded, spavined and antediluvian specimens of horse flesh?

As a contemporary says, the whole business is a particularly squalid one. If our soldiers in going forth to meet a thoroughly armed and equipped foe were provided with flint muskets against the Mauser and the machine gun, with muzzle loading cannon against the latest quick firing Krupps, with soft iron against steel entrenching tools, and with all other inferior forms of equipment against a perfectly appointed enemy, the country would be aroused to fury at the villainous sacrifice of the men going to certain death and defeat. Yet we find right here in Canada in the full light of the twentieth century, that our heroic volunteers offering up their all for the Empire are provided with shoes unfit to wear, with inferior motor trucks, with defective field glasses, and with horses useless and worse than useless through age and physical defect. It is only when looked at in this wise that we see the real hideousness of the transactions which have been brought to light as a result of a motion persistently forced upon the Government by Hon. A. K. Maclean.

Now they are starving, and France is sending them the much needed food; and yet, says the Sun, there are persons who wonder why France achieves a sympathy that is not given to Germany.

He is a member of the Reichstag and editor of the Preussische Jahrbuecher and a personal friend of the Kaiser. After reviewing possible areas for German colonization in Africa and Further Asia, Dr. Delbruck practically concludes that they are unpromising, but sees a field for colonization in Turkey. Dr. Delbruck's own version of the object in view is as follows: "From the North Sea and the Baltic to the Red Sea and Persian Gulf there will extend, not a German sphere of lordship, but a sphere of German work, of activity for the German spirit and German talent of organization." But the forcing of the Dardanelles will shatter this dream.

THE Changeling

"She sleeps late," she thought, when breakfast was announced, and taking her accustomed seat, she bade a servant "see if Margaret were ill."

"She is not there," was the report the girl brought back.

"Not there!" cried Mr. Carrollton.

"Not there!" repeated Madam Conway, a shadowy foreboding of evil stealing over her. "She seldom walks at this early hour," she continued, and rising she went herself to Margaret's room.

Everything was in perfect order, the bed was undisturbed, the chamber empty, Margaret was gone, and on the dressing-table lay the fatal letter, telling why she went. At first Madam Conway did not see it; but it soon caught her eye, and tremblingly she opened it, reading but the first line: "I am going away forever."

Then a loud shriek rang through the silent room, penetrating to Arthur Carrollton's listening ear, and bringing him at once to her side. With the letter still in her hand, and her face of a deathly hue, and her eyes flashing with fear, Madam Conway turned to him as he entered, saying, "Margaret has gone, left us forever, killed herself it may be—read"; and she handed him the letter, herself bending eagerly forward to hear what he might say.

But she listened in vain. With lightning rapidity, Arthur Carrollton read what Margaret had written—read that she, his idol, the chosen bride of his bosom, was the daughter of a servant, the grandchild of old Hagar! And for this she had fled from his presence, fled because she knew of the mighty pride which now, in the first bitter moment of his agony, did indeed rise up a barrier between himself and the beautiful girl he loved so well. Had she lain dead before him, dead in all her youthful beauty, he could have folded her in his arms, and then buried her from his sight, with a feeling of perfect happiness compared to that which he now felt.

"Oh, Maggie, my lost one, can it be?" he whispered to himself, and pressing his hand upon his chest, which heaved with strong emotion, he staggered to a seat while the perspiration stood in beaded drops upon his forehead and around his lips.

"What is it, Mr. Carrollton? 'Tis something dreadful, sure," said Mrs. Jeffrey, appearing at the door, but Madam Conway motioned her away, and tottering to his side, said: "Read it aloud to me—read!"

The sound of his voice recalled her wandering mind, and covering his face with his hands, he moaned in anguish; then, growing suddenly calm, he snatched up the letter, which had fallen to the floor, and read it aloud, while Madam Conway, stupefied with horror, sank at his feet, and clasping her hands above her head, rocked to and fro, but made no word of comment. Far down the long ago her thought were straying, and gathering up many by-gone secrets, which told her that what she heard was true.

"Yes, 'tis true," she groaned; and then, powerless to speak another word, she laid her head upon a chair, while Mr. Carrollton, preferring to be alone, sought the solitude of his own room, where, unobserved, he could wrestle with his sorrow, and conquer his inborn pride, which whispered to him that a Carrollton must not wed a bride so far beneath him.

Only a moment, though, and then the love he bore for Maggie Miller rolled back upon him with an overwhelming power, while his better judgment, with that love, came hand in hand, pleading for the fair young girl, who, now that he had lost her, seemed a thousand fold dearer than before. But he had not lost her; he would find her. She was Maggie Miller still to him, and though old Hagar's blood were in her veins, he would not give her up. This resolution once made, it could not be shaken, and when half an hour or more was passed he walked with firm, unfaltering footsteps, back to the apartment where Madam Conway still sat upon the floor, her head resting upon the chair, and her frame convulsed with grief.

Her struggle had been a terrible one and it was not over yet, for with her it was more than a matter of pride and love. Her daughter's rights had been set at naught; a wrong had been done to the dead; the child who slept beneath the pine had been neglected; nay, in life, had been, perhaps, despised as an intruder, for one who had no right to call her grandmother; and shudderingly she cried, "Why was it suffered thus to be?" Then, as she thought of white-haired Hagar Warren, she raised her hand to curse her, but the words died on her lips, for Hagar's deed had brought to her much joy; and now, as she remembered the bounding step, the merry laugh, the sunny face, and loving words, which had made her later years so happy, she involuntarily stretched out her arms in empty air, moaning sadly, "I want her here. I want her now, just as she used to be." Then, over the grave of her buried daughter, over the grave of the sickly child, whose thin, blue face came up before her, just as it lay in its humble coffin, over the deception of eighteen years, her heart bounded with one wild, yearning throb, for every bleeding fibre clung with a death-like grasp to her, who had been so suddenly taken from her.

"I love her still," she cried, "but can I take her back?" And then commenced the fiercest struggle of all, the battling of love and pride, the one rebelling against a child of Hagar Warren, and the other clamoring loudly, that without the child the world to her was nothing. It was the hour of Madam Conway's humiliation, and in bitterness of spirit, she groaned, "That I should come to this! I should come to this! Theo first, and Margaret, my bright, my beautiful Margaret next. Oh, how can I give her up when I loved her, best of all—best of all?"

This was true, for all the deeper, stronger love of Madam Conway's nature had gone forth to the merry, gleeful girl, whose graceful, independent bearing she had so often likened to herself, and the haughty race with was the illusion dispelled? Margaret was not a Conway, nor yet a Davenport. A servant girl had been her mother, and of her father there was nothing known. Madam Conway was one who seldom wept for grief. She had stood calmly at the bedside of her dying husband, had buried her only daughter from her sight, had met with many reverses, and shed for all no tears, but now they fell like rain upon her face, burning, blistering as they fell, but bringing no relief.

"I shall miss her in the morning," she cried, "miss her at noon, miss her in the lonesome nights, miss her everywhere—oh, Margaret, Margaret, 'tis more than I can bear! Come back to me now, just as you are. I want you here—here where the pain is hardest," and she clasped her arms tightly over her heaving bosom. Then her pride returned again, and with it came thoughts of Arthur Carrollton. He would scoff at her as weak and sentimental; he would never take beyond the sea a bride of Hagarish birth; and duty demanded that she, too, should be firm, and sanction his decision. "But when he's gone," she whispered, "when he has left American behind, I'll find her, if my life is spared. I'll find poor Margaret, and see that she does not want, though I must not take her back."

This resolution, however, did not bring her comfort, and the hands pressed so convulsively upon her side could not ease her pain. Sure, never before had so dark an hour enfolded that haughty woman, and a prayer that she might die was trembling on her lips, when a footfall echoed along the hall, and Arthur Carrollton stood before her. His face was very pale, bearing marks of the storm he had passed through; but he was calm, his voice was natural as he said: "Possibly what we have heard is false. It may be a vagary of Hagar's half-crazed brain."

For an instant Madam Conway had hoped so, too; but when she reflected, she knew that it was true. Old Hagar had been very minute in her explanations to Margaret who, in turn, had written exactly what she had heard, and Madam Conway, when she recalled the past, could have no doubt that it was true. She remembered everything, but more distinctly the change of dress at the time of the baptism. There could be no mistake. Margaret was not hers, and so she said to Arthur Carrollton, turning her head away as if she, too, were in some way answerable for the disgrace.

"It matters not," he replied, "whose she has been. She is mine now, and if you feel able, we will consult together as to the surest method of finding her."

A sudden faintness came over Madam Conway, and while the expression of her face changed to one of joyful surprise, she stammered out, "Can it be I hear aright? Do I understand you? Are you willing to take poor Maggie back?"

"I certainly have no other intention," he answered. "There was a moment the memory of which makes me ashamed, when my pride rebelled; but it is over now, and though Maggie cannot in reality be again your child, she can be my wife and I must find her."

"You make me so happy, oh, so happy!" said Madam Conway. "I feared you would cast her off, and in that case it would have been my duty to do so too, though I never loved a human being as at this moment I love her."

Mr. Carrollton looked as if he did not fully comprehend the woman, who loving Margaret as she did, could yet be so dependent upon his decision; but he made no comment, and when next he spoke he announced his intention of calling upon Hagar, who possibly could tell him where Margaret had gone. "At all events," said he, "I may ascertain why the secret, so long kept, was at this late day divulged. It may be well," he continued, "to say nothing to the servants as yet, save that Maggie has gone. Mrs. Jeffrey, however, had better be let into the secret at once. We can trust her, I think."

In some anxiety Mr. Carrollton pressed on, until the cottage door was reached, where for a moment he stood gazing silently upon the poor woman before him. Upon the bed, her white hair falling over her round, bent shoulders, her large eyes shining with delirious light, old Hagar sat, swaying back and forth, and talking of Margaret, of Hester, and "the little foolish child," who, with a sneer upon her lip, she said "was a fair specimen of the Conway race."

"Hagar," said Mr. Carrollton, and at the sound of that voice Hagar turned toward him her flashing eyes, then with a scream, buried her head in the bed-clothes, saying: "Go away, Arthur Carrollton! Why are you here? Don't you know who I am? Don't you know what Margaret is, and don't you know how proud you are?"

"Hagar," he said again, subduing, by a strong effort, the repugnance he felt at questioning her. "I know all, except where Margaret has gone, and if on this point you can give me any information, I shall receive it most thankfully."

"Gone!" shrieked Hagar, starting up in bed; "then she has gone. The play is played out, the performance is ended, and I sinned for nothing!"

"Hagar, will you tell me where Maggie is? I wish to follow her," said Mr. Carrollton; and Hagar answered, "Maggie, Maggie—he said that lovingly enough, but there's a catch somewhere. He does not wish to follow her for any good—and though I know where she has gone, I'll surely never tell. I kept one secret for nineteen years—I can keep another as long," and folding her arms upon her chest, she commenced singing, "I know full well, but I'll never tell."

Biting his lips with vexation, Mr. Carrollton tried first by persuasion, then by flattery, and lastly by threats, to obtain from her the desired information, but in vain. Her only answer was, "I know full well, but I'll never tell," save once, when tossing toward him her long white hair, he shrieked, "Don't you see a resemblance—only hers is black—and so was mine nineteen years ago—and so was Hester's too—glossy and black as the raven's wing. The child is like the mother, the mother was like the grandmother, and the grandmother is like me, Hagar Warren. Do you understand?"

Mr. Carrollton made no answer, and with a feeling of disappointment walked away, shuddering as he thought, "And she is Margaret's grandmother."

He found Madam Conway in strong hysterics on Margaret's bed, for she had refused to leave the room, saying, "she would die there or nowhere." Gradually the reality of her loss had burst upon her, and now gasping, choking, and wringing her hands, she lay upon the pillows, while Mrs. Jeffrey, worked up to a pitch of great nervous excitement, fidgeted hither and thither, doing always the wrong thing, fanning the lady when she did not wish to be fanned, and ceasing to fan her just when she was "dying for want of air."

As yet Mrs. Jeffrey knew nothing definite, except that something dreadful had happened to Margaret; but very candidly Mr. Carrollton told her all, bidding her keep silent on the subject; then, turning to Madam Conway, he repeated to her the result of his call on old Hagar.

"The wretch!" gasped Madam Conway, while Mrs. Jeffrey, running in her fright from the door back to the window again, exclaimed, "Margaret not a Conway, nor yet a Davenport, after all!" It is just as I expected. I always knew she came honestly by those low-bred ways!"

"Jeffrey," and the voice of the hysterical woman on the bed, was loud and distinct, as she grasped the arm of the terrified little governess, who chanced to be within her reach. "Jeffrey, either leave my house at once, or speak more deferentially of Miss Miller. You will call her by that name, too. It matters not to Mr. Carrollton and myself whose child she has been. She is ours now, and must be treated with respect. Do you understand me?"

"Yes, ma'am," meekly answered Jeffrey, rubbing her dumpy arm which bore the mark of a thumb and finger, and as her services were not just then required she glided from the room to drown, if possible, he grievance in the leather bound London edition of Baxter!

Meanwhile Madam Conway was consulting with Mr. Carrollton as to their best mode of finding Margaret. "She took the cars, of course", said Mr. Carrollton, adding that "he should go at once to the depot, and ascertain which way she went. If I do not return to-night, you need not be alarmed," he said, as he was leaving the room, whereupon Madam Conway called him back, bidding him "telegraph for Theo at once, as she must have some one besides that vexatious Jeffrey."

Mr. Carrollton promised compliance with her request, and then went immediately to the depot, where he learned that no one had entered the cars from that place on the previous night, and that Maggie, if she took the train at all, must have done so at some other station. This was not unlikely, and before the day was passed Mr. Carrollton had visited several different stations, and had talked with the conductors of the several trains, but all to no purpose; and very much disheartened he returned at night to the old stone house, where, to his great surprise, he found both Theo and her husband. The telegraph had done its mission, and feeling anxious to know the worst, George had come up with Theo to spend the night. It was the first time Madam Conway had seen him since her memorable encounter with his mother, for though Theo had more than once been home, he had never before accompanied her, and now when Madam Conway heard his voice in the hall below, she groaned afresh. The sight of his good-humored face, however, and his kind offer to do whatever he could to find the fugitive, restored her composure in a measure, and she partially forgot that he was in any way connected with the blue umbrella, or the blue umbrella connected with him! Never in her life had Theo felt very deeply upon any subject, and now, though she seemed bewildered at what she heard, she manifested no particular emotion, until her grandmother, wringing her hands, exclaimed, "you have no sister, now, my child, and I no Margaret." Then, indeed, her tears flowed, and when her husband whispered to her, "we will love poor Maggie all the same," she cried aloud but not quite as demonstratively as Madam Conway wished, and in a very unamiable frame of mind the old lady accused her of being selfish and hard-hearted.

In this stage of proceedings Mr. Carrollton returned, bringing no tidings of Maggie, whereupon another fit of hysterics ensued, and as Theo behaved much worse than Mrs. Jeffrey had done, the latter was finally summoned again to the sick room, where she had last succeeded in quieting the excited woman. The next morning George Douglas visited old Hagar, but he, too, was unsuccessful, and that afternoon he returned to Worcester, leaving Theo with her grandmother, who, though finding fault with whatever she did, refused to let her go until Margaret was found.

During the remainder of the week, Mr. Carrollton rode through the country, making the most minute inquiries, and receiving always the same discouraging answer. Once he thought to advertise, but from making the affair thus public he instinctively shrank, and resolving to spare neither his time, his money, nor his health, he pursued his weary way alone. Once, too, Madam Conway spoke of Henry Warner, saying it was possible Maggie might have gone to him, as she had thought so much of Rose; but Mr. Carrollton "knew better." "A discarded lover," he said, "was the last person in the world to whom a young girl like Margaret would go, particularly as Theo had said that Henry was now the husband of another."

Still the suggestion haunted him, and on the Monday following Henry Warner's first visit to Worcester, he, too, went down to talk with Mr. Douglas, asking him "if it were possible that Maggie was in Leominster."

"I know she is not," said George, repeating the particulars of his interview with Henry, who, he said, was at the store on Saturday. "Once I thought of telling him all," said he, "and then, considering the relation which formerly existed between them, I concluded to keep silent, especially as he manifested no desire to speak of her, but appeared, I fancied quite uneasy when I casually mentioned it."

Gadsby Had Nothing to Say.

"Henry," said Mrs. Gadsby, "a poor man came to the house this morning and asked me if I had any old clothes to give away, so I"—

"Don't finish, don't finish!" shouted Mr. Gadsby. "I know exactly what you did. You went and gave away one of the best suits of clothes I had and probably a pair of shoes I could have worn for twelve months longer and a hat and there's no telling what else, all at a time when I can't afford to buy anything new."

"Don't be so hasty," said Mrs. Gadsby. "If you had listened to me instead of interrupting you would have saved your breath and kept your temper. The man wanted something for his wife, who is a cripple, he said, and I gave him one of my old skirts that I used to cook in."—Birmingham Age-Herald.

SUNDAY SCHOOL LESSON

LESSON IX.

August 29, 1915. God's Care of Elijah. 1 Kings, 17:1-16.

Commentary.—I. Elijah, God's messenger to Ahab (v. 1). 1. Elijah the Tishbite—The name means "Jehovah is my God." The prophet is suddenly introduced. No information is given regarding his ancestry. Authorities are not agreed as to why he is called the Tishbite. It is commonly held that he was a native of a place called Tishbe, or Thisbe, in Naphtali, and removed eastward across the Jordan, and became an inhabitant of Gilead. Others believe that he was a native of a place called Tishbeh in Gilead. In his disposition he partook of the rugged, mountainous character of the region in which he lived. His dress was a mantle of camel's hair cloth or sheepskin worn with the wool outside, and gathered about the loins with a leathern girdle. Such was his appearance as, having left his rugged, mountain home, he appeared at the splendid palace of Ahab. Said unto Ahab—The Lord had a man in training, under his own direction, for this important mission. The prophet appeared unheralded and abruptly began to deliver his message. As the Lord God of Israel liveth—"As Jehovah liveth" was an ancient form of oath in Israel. Ahab had undertaken to put away the worship of Jehovah and had denied that he was Israel's God. Elijah at once affirms the existence and power of Jehovah. Before whom I stand—As a servant stands before his master and waits to do his bidding, so Elijah waited to do Jehovah's biding. Not be dew nor rain—To the people of that country the withholding of the rain meant famine. The rainfall was comparatively scanty at best, and no more than was necessary to produce the crops. A long drought would result in great suffering. Dew is very essential in that country to the growth of crops. The dews are so abundant upon Mount Carmel that vegetation there is green during the hot, dry summer, while in other parts of Palestine it is parched. These years—Three and one half years. See Luke 4: 25 and James 5: 17.

II. Hiding at Cherith (vs. 2-7). 2. The word of the Lord—God gave directions to Elijah, but we do not know how. We know that the prophet understood them. 3. Eastward—From Ahab's palace in Samaria. Hide thyself—Since Elijah was the apparent agency in bringing about the drought, the wicked Ahab would naturally seek his life, and it was prudent that he should conceal himself. By the brook Cherith—Many scholars fix the location of this stream east of the Jordan from the expression, "before Jordan," which, they say, has that signification. The brook flowed into the Jordan, but whether from the east or the west is uncertain. Elijah was in hiding from Ahab, and it would seem that he would be less likely to be found if he should go to some point east of the Jordan, than if he remained nearer Samaria; but tradition locates Cherith as a wady, or ravine, extending from the hills of Judea eastward toward Jericho. The walls of the ravine at the point shown as Elijah's hiding-place are almost perpendicular and very high. 4. Drink of the brook—This was to be his water supply. I have commanded the ravens—Much has been said against the idea that unclean birds brought food to the prophet, and attempts have been made to substitute the terms, "merchants," "Arabians" or "Orebites" for ravens, but there is no reason why we should not accept the literal meaning of the text. 5. He went and did—His act shows faith in God and obedience to His command. 6. Ravens brought him bread and flesh—As the feeding of Elijah during this period was miraculous, it is needless to conjecture as to the source from which the ravens procured the supply. Morning ... evening—Two substantial meals a day sufficed the prophet during the time of famine. 7. The brook dried up—It was probably from six months to a year that Elijah drank of the brook before the lack of rain caused it to cease to flow. See 1 Kings, 18.1, compared with Luke 4, 25, and James 5.-17.

III. Sustained at Zarephath (vs. 8-16). 8. the word of the Lord—The prophet had believed God, and had been receiving food just as it was needed. One has said, "From hand to mouth is a comfortable way to live if it be from the hand of God to the mouth of God's child." He was not surprised to receive further directions from the Lord. 9. get thee to Zarephath—A village north of Israel, between Tyre and Zidon, now known as Surafend. Ahab had not yet been able to discover his hiding place, and now he passes out of his jurisdiction into a Gentile nation dwell there—This was Jezebel's native country, and it was supporting and harboring the destroyer of Baal. 10. the gate of the city—All villages and cities were then defended by walls. widow .... gathering of sticks—It was the widow to whom the prophet was sent, and the prospects for entertainment were by no means flattering. a little water—It is always acknowledged as a duty to give water to the thirsty in the East, even to sharing the last drops. She at once started to fulfil the request. 11. a morsel of bread—A large demand to be made of a widow in time of famine. 12. thy God—She was a Gentile, yet she acknowledged the God of Elijah, whom she probably recognized as a prophet.

13. fear not—The prophet spoke words of assurance as well as authority. His command was a severe test of her faith. If she should provide food for Elijah, she and her son must the sooner perish. 14. thus said the Lord God of Israel—He declared the authority upon which he spoke. meal shall not waste neither ... all fail—Here was to be a miracle continuing as long as the famine lasted. 15. she went and did—Here was faith on the part of a Gentile woman in this same region (Matt. 15:28). did eat many days—From two and a half to three years. In nourishing Elijah she saved herself and her son. 16. wasted not—The meal and the oil multiplied, not in the hoarding, but the spending.—Henry.

Questions.—When did Elijah appear to Ahab? Describe Elijah's appearance and character. What was his message to Ahab? Why was this famine sent upon Israel? What reason was there for Elijah to hide himself? Where was he directed to go, and how was he supported? How long was he there before the brook dried up? Where was he sent from there? In what direction? What requests did he make of the woman? What miracle was performed?

CONSTIPATION
CAN BE CURED.

There Is Nothing To Equal
Milburn's Laxa-Liver Pills
For This Purpose.

Mrs. A. Cumming, Manchester, Ont., writes: "I have been troubled with constipation for over five years, and feel it my duty to let you known that your Milburn's Laxa-Liver Pills have cured me. I only used three vials, and I can faithfully say that they have saved me from a large doctor bill."

Milburn's Laxa-Liver Pills regulate the flow of bile to act properly on the bowels, and thus keep them regular. Irregular bowels are the main cause of constipation.

The price of Milburn's Laxa-Liver Pills is 25c. per vial or 5 vials for $1.00, at all dealers or mailed direct on receipt of price by The T. Milburn Co., Limited, Toronto, Ont.

PRACTICAL SURVEY.

Topic.—Divine sovereignty vindicated.

I. To the confusion of idolaters.
II. In the safety of God's servants.

I. To the confusion of idolaters. The revolt of the ten tribes had not altered the fact of God's supremacy in Israel. Though Ahab had raised a temple to Baal and though Jezebel had gathered around her an army of false prophets, and though the people were willing to have it so, the God of Israel had in reserve a man trained and willing to go forth to proclaim his sovereignty to that crooked and perverse nation. Never was reformation more called for, and never were supernatural works more necessary. Great miracles were necessary because of great and general apostasy. The appearance of such a champion as Elijah, armed with high credentials and wielding great power, marked a crisis in the history of God's ancient church. A great struggle was impending. The very existence of the church was at stake. Elijah was summoned to the court to declare God's judgment against Israel. Drought was one of the punishments declared by the law if Israel forsook God. Elijah went directly to Ahab, who could avert the calamity by his repentance. Elijah's message threatened a terrible plague, long and protracted suffering, a great national calamity. This appalling message voiced the wrath of God. The material elements were worshipped by the heathen and at this time by Israel, while the God who made them was forgotten. It was meet that men who practically denied the living God should be practically reminded of their dependence upon him. It was well that those who held Baal to be lord of nature, should be left to discover his impotence. Elijah trusted in the wisdom of God and obeyed His command. He recognized himself to be God's representative and as such manifested utmost fidelity and loyalty. He spoke under inspiration. Looking upon the scene, we recognize the value of one noble witness in the midst of public corruption and decay, and the grandeur, as well as the necessity, of a distinct personal profession of godliness. The issue was not a combat between Elijah and Ahab. It was right against wrong, faithfulness against treachery, purity against corruption.

II. In the safety of God's servants. God made his own selection among men to meet the demand at that crisis. Elijah was in the right attitude of preparedness for his work. He had placed himself absolutely and directly under the guidance of God. Strict, implicit and instant obedience characterized his life. He went forth into the busy, wicked world to the anxious and dangerous work of a prophet. He acted promptly, faithfully and with courage. He then followed the word of the Lord and went into hiding and silence to be prepared for his future great and solemn mission in the overthrow of idolatry and the vindication of the worship of the true God. For three and one half years Israel heard no more of him. That he must hide so long showed how great was the danger to which he was exposed. Elijah's food was supplied by the ordering and special providence of God. There was positive divine interposition in Elijah's preservation. His needs were provided for, though no man knew his dwelling place. Irrational creatures were divinely directed and engaged in the service of man. The infinite Father knew his servant's destitution and sent relief by the most unexpected and seemingly impossible conveyance and as surprising to Elijah as his presence had been to Ahab. The brook dried up only to give place to greater marvels. Elijah was then sent to what seemed to be the most dangerous of all places, the territory of Jezebel's father, and to one who was an object for charity, a widow needing help. Elijah was to find a refuge and welcome. The widow was to receive temporal support and spiritual blessing. God honored the widow with his command to feed his prophet. He saw that she would believe on him if only she had a promise to authorize her faith. She was given a sharp test of faith and trust. She was to perform a generous act toward a stranger, a pious act toward a servant of Jehovah. She had to make a sacrifice and trust to a promise which seemed least likely of fulfilment. She gave her only meal to the prophet and proved God's sustaining care through two years of famine. She was a striking example of obedience and submission.—T. R. A.

John Bull.

"John Bull," a popular epithet for an Englishman, as a personification of what is supposed to be the English type, is derived from a prose political satire by Dr. John Arbuthnot, who used the name in his "History of John Bull" (1712, reprinted complete in "Pope's Miscellanies" in 1728). The subject of that history is the "Spanish succession during the reigns of Queen Anne and Louis XIV." Queen Anne is "Mrs. Bull."

"John Bull's mother" is the church of England, and "John Bull's sister Peg" is the Scotch nation, represented as in love with Jack (Calvin). The description of Bull is so close to the familiar figure in the pages of Punch that a sentence or two may be quited: "Bull in the main was an honest and plain dealing fellow, choleric, bold and of a very inconstant temper. He dreaded not old Lewis (Louis XIV.), either at back sword, single falchion or cudgel play, but then he was very apt to quarrel with his best friends, especially if they pretended to govern him. If you flattered him you might lead him as a child."

"The War Summary"

Almost from the very day the great European war began in August last, the outstanding feature in Canadian Journalism covering the conflict has been "The War Summary" daily on pages 1 and 2 of THE GLOBE. In the concisest possible form the writer has given his readers a pen picture of the developments in all parts of the world. While the details of the movements along the extended frontiers have not been overlooked, the readers of THE GLOBE have been enabled to follow intelligently and with confidence the general outlines of the stupendous conflict. "The War Summary" of THE GLOBE is reproduced daily by several papers throughout the Dominion.

The Editorial Page

THE GLOBE on its editorial page has striven to place before the public in proper perspective the broad background of the titanic struggle. This series of articles has attracted the attention not only of the Canadian people, but of leading men and journals in all parts of the world. The causes leading up to the war, the elements entering into its conduct, and the results likely to flow from the cessation of hostilities have been dealt with in that bold and clear-cut form characteristic of THE GLOBE'S editorial page.

News Service

The above features, in addition to a cable and letter service from the front unmatched in Canada, have placed THE GLOBE far in the lead of Canadian papers, and partly explain the phenomenal increase of 33-3 per cent. in THE GLOBE'S circulation during recent months.

Other Features

The sporting pages, the financial and commercial pages, the women's pages, etc., etc., with the additional pages in Wednesday's issue devoted to "Farm and Country Life," are maintained at a high standard of excellence, a standard that has justified THE GLOBE in its title of Canada's National Newspaper, and has given it by many thousands the largest circulation of any morning paper in the Dominion.

Local and City Papers

By all means take your local paper, but in the field of metropolitan newspapers THE GLOBE unquestionably offers you the greatest value to be had in Canada. Order it to-day. 20 cents per month—one dollar for four months—three dollars per year.

P.S.—According to Lord Kitchener, the big war has only begun.

AFTER PROHIBITION IN B. C.

A significant sign of the rising tide of public opinion in British Columbia against the liquor traffic is to be found in a statement issued by John Nelson, publisher of the Vancouver World, [Independent], in which he announces that his paper will undertake a definite campaign against the traffic. "British Columbia," the statement begins, "is shortly to be asked to prohibit the liquor traffic during the war. A convention is to be held in this city in a few days and a campaign will then be outlined and plans for its prosecution made."

"The present movement springs from causes, classes and interests which in the main have not hitherto been identified with temperance reform. One has only to move about in the business community of this city and Province to be convinced how comprehensive is the extent of the present sentiment. Undoubtedly the war, is responsible for many disillusionments, accounts for the present conditions.

"The present campaign will be an economic one. Throughout the province it is being fathered by shopkeepers, miners, professional men, mill hands, lumbermen, farmers and business men of all kinds.

The candid opinion of most sensible men today is unmistakably in one direction, namely, that no country that is at war has any business permitting the continuance of a trade which imposes unnecessary burdens of industry and commerce and entails worse ravages than war itself."

CONDITIONS HAVE MUCH IMPROVED

After one year of war, business conditions in Canada are quite as can be expected and indications are that there will be a steady improvement. The large orders for war materials that are being placed in the Dominion will materially help to better trade generally.

There already are signs that these orders are having a beneficial effect. Fewer unemployed men are to be seen and there is a steady call from farmers for help. During the last few days weather conditions in Ontario have brightened and the crops are splendid. Everything points to brighter days commercially, and the business men are smiling.

"ENGLAND WE HATE UND BY GOTT WE SMASH HER" IS GERMAN CRY

Gott straf uns—wenn wir England schonen [God Punish us—if we spare England]

That is the German pledge. It is the oath of a nation—one nation against the other. It is a sincere oath, appalling sincere. They have made for this hate a ritual. About it they have written their stories and poems and songs. I have heard the three terrible words—Gott Strafe England—so many times that I have come to think of them as the sounds by which I shall identify Germany. It is their morning salutation. It is never spoken with levity. I heard men exchange it as if they were pledging anew a solemn oath. I heard the waiters in the Alston say it to each other. I heard it in Munchuon when a customer came into the shop to buy. I heard it in the hospitals at Gleiwitz, a wounded man uttering it to Dr Saunders and his wound was from a Russian gun. In Berlin they have published a book, "Gott Strafe England" with a cover showing John Bull and his money bag being roasted in hell. You know the Red Cross stamps you buy at Christmas time to paste on the back of your letters? They are selling hate stamps in Germany. They read, "Gott Strafe England." They are red and black stamps and the coloring means something. The black is for hate and the red is for blood. I walked through the front line trenches in Arras. I saw cut in the dirt wall the legend of Hate "Gott Strafe England." I thought the French were in Arras? I asked the soldier, "Are there any Englishmen with them?" "No" he said "but that does not matter. You see the French are England's fools, and we have no quarrel with them. We feel sorry for them for being fools. But England we hate, and by Gott, we smash her"

Lucknow Lad Drowned

A drowning accident occurred at Lucknow on Saturday, when Charlie Lockart, 16 years of age, second son of Ezekiel Lockart, 11th con. Kinloss, lost his life in Purvis Lake, about two miles from town.

Why is it?

Why is it, it is often asked, that people in small towns can find no better business than prying into other people's business, and then exaggerating the truth in regard to the same. People who pretend to be Christians, who attend church regularly, who, in the sight of their church neighbors are generous and charitable, yet who, without the slightest provocation, pick up some little mistake, or more often at nothing will so scandalize one as to ruin his or her reputation for life. While they would not steal from them worldly goods, yet they rob him or her of what is more precious than gold—a good reputation. Why can't people practice the Christianity that they preach and "do unto others as you would have them do unto you?"

Too Many Collectors.

The Christian Guardian says: We understand that certain foreigners are going up and down the country at the present time ostensibly collecting funds for schools in Persia. The terrible devastation going on in Persia at the present time gives a sympathetic introduction to the appeal that these collectors make, but we advise our people to beware. Even though they have what appear like good credentials, the almost certain probability is that they are frauds. There are plenty of legitimate ways of helping people these days without taking the risk of handing out your money and sympathy to frauds. Any special calamity in these Eastern lands is sure to bring around some dark-skinned collector with very formidable credentials.

A Cedar Raft.

The residents of town, who look back to the good old days when the cedar tie was the standard of value in Wiarton, can stroll down to the waterfront and give their eyes a farewell feast as a reminder of old times. In front of Johnston, Hunter & Crawford's mill is a raft containing 1,500,000 ft of cedar logs, probably the largest raft of cedar and in all likelihood the last to be brought here. July 29th Capt. Graham, of Manitoulin, left here with a gang of men and the Tug Crawford with about a mile of booms to make the raft up on the south shore of the Manitoulin from eleven dumps between the Duck Islands and Michaels Bay. They gathered the timber in Providence Bay and at noon Aug. 11th it was rounded up in the storm boom ready to start for Wiarton. In Owen Channel a head current was encountered and took nine and one half hours to pull it out and one half mile. The Tug Tedwell met them at Bears Rump Island at noon Aug. 11th and better time was made from there down, finally arriving here at 1 p.m., Aug. 17th, without losing a log, which is exceptionally good luck considering they were six days on Lake Huron and Georgian Bay.—Wiarton Canadian.

Mr. Geo. Craig came home on Saturday from Walkerton hospital so fully recovered from his recent operation that he is able to attend to business about as usual again.—Paisley Advocate.

Think It Over.

With the prospects of another hard winter coming our way, a word of public caution could not be out of place. One of the best ways to produce hard times here is to patronize the departmental stores. Every dollar left at home can be used again and again, and many people are benefited, but when the departmental stores get our money it is gone for good. Think this matter over seriously, and do every cent of your buying at home this fall and winter.

THE "THIRTY-SECOND BRUCE."
17TH AUGUST, 1915.

(BY EX-QUARTERMASTER SERGEANT T. MANFRED DENVIL.)

It's a year to-day since we marched away
To the sound of the fife and drum;
And our scarlet coats were dedamped with rain
As we clambered aboard the waiting train;
But ardour undamped filled each breast beneath,
For we'd made up our minds for the victor's wreath—
For glory—or Kingdom Come!
Oh, the rousing cheers and the women's tears
And the martial strains of the band!
As, with's heaven's artillery overhead,
Away through the storm-rent morn we sped;
Away from home and sweethearts and wives,
On Freedom's altar to offer our lives—
Away—to a far-off land!
Our Captain then was proud of his men—
"H" Company, trim and spruce—
And a keener body 'twere hard to trace
Or sturdier sons of a stalwart race:
I was "Colours" then, and knew well the zeal
That each possessed for the common-weal,
And the honor of County Bruce.
It was an anxious day at Valcartier
When they picked out the "Overseas"
As some must be chosen, and some be left,
And many must go of their ranks bereft,
For, with khaki doomed in place of red,
Amateur soldiering days had fled,
And merit alone could please.
But our boys pulled through, as they meant to do—
As do they will, to the last.
For Captain Grover had captured their hearts—
Every inch a soldier, and a man of parts!
And he knew his lads would go where he led—
Follow him living, or lie with him dead!
Wherever their lot be cast.
And when, at Quebec, we'd marched on the deck
Of the transport, to cross the main,
I noted a look upon every face—
A resolute look which naught could erase,
That look—and dubbed them "The Fighting First."
Nor was that prophecy vain!
In the mire and damp of the Bustard camp
An esprit de corps was found
That filled with amazement all who had seen
The nucleus raw of that fighting machine;
(I was "Quarters" then, with another "Batt."
And, returning, mentally raised my hat
At the marvellous change all round!)
For the mud and the rains of Salisbury Plain
A history-page evolved—
With LANGEMARCK written in letters of steel—
With FESTUBERT fixed as a blood-red seal!
And were no more on that page e'er penned
Those names with Canada's aye will blend
Till earth and sea are dissolved!
It's a year to-day since they marched away—
The lads so trim and spruce.
And some fight yet; and in England some;
And Fate's hard decree just a few sent home.
And many in hospital wounded lay,
Waiting again to return to the fray:
May the God of Battles, Whose mighty Arm
Directs the conflict, protect from all harm
Our soldiers from County Bruce!

NOTE:—It will be remembered that on the morning the First Contingent left for Valcartier, a heavy thunder storm was in progress while the soldier boys were waiting at the depot and boarding the train.

Deafness Cannot be Cured

by local applications, as they cannot reach the diseased portion of the ear. There is only one way to cure deafness, and that is by constitutional remedies. Deafness is caused by an inflamed condition of the mucous lining of the Eustachian Tube. When this tube is inflamed you have a rumbling sound or imperfect hearing, and when it is entirely closed, Deafness is the result, and unless the inflammation can be taken out and this tube restored to its normal condition, hearing will be destroyed forever; nine cases out of ten are caused by Catarrh, which is nothing but an inflamed condition of the mucous surfaces.

We will give One Hundred Dollars for any case of Deafness (caused by catarrh) that cannot be cured by Hall's Catarrh Cure. Send for circulars, free.

Will Canada Carry Her Burden?

Great Britain and Europe, where productive industry has been paralyzed have months to feed, bodies to clothe, constructive operations to carry through and a thousand and one wants and needs to be satisfied—and Great Britain and Europe look to Canada in confidence for much of the needed supplies. It were folly for Canadian manufacturers and merchants to be downhearted during these terrible times in Europe. A great burden—a great duty—a great responsibility—has been imposed on Canadian manufacturers, merchants, bankers and workers. Shall Canada and Canadians shirk this burden, this duty, this responsibility?

Guelph will not renew the policies of the members of its first and second contingents. The chief reason given is that the Government has since provided pensions to look after the widows and children.

Condemn Practice

Carrying children on the handlebars of bicycles was strongly condemned by a St. Catharines' jury owing to a fatal accident that occurred in that way. This should be a warning to a good many Walkerton youths who make a practice of carrying youngsters and in some cases, mere babes on the handlebar of their cycles.

At a meeting of the Harriston patriotic committee, W. C. Chambers, M. P. P. and ex-Mayor Jno. Meikle john each contributed $500 for the purchase of a machine gun to be used preferably by the 34th battalion, in which quite a number of local officers and men are serving.

Canadian Prisoners in Germany.

REDUCED RAILWAY RATES FROM ALL POINTS

"For God's Sake, Let Me Stay!"

He pleaded with all the intensity his weakened body and soul could muster. His voice trembled. Tears lurked in his strained, anxious eyes. "I have traveled for two days on the train," he said. "I have been turned out of my boarding house. I have been turned out of a hotel in my own town. The local hospital refused me admission. Nobody wants me. For God's sake, doctor, let me stay."

This man had been a railway conductor. He had money to pay for his needs; so he applied to the Muskoka Cottage Sanatorium for treatment of the disease which held his life in its grip—consumption. But those sufferers without money and without friends, what of them? With their hopeless knowledge that people shun them, they believe it futile to seek relief. If their lives are to be snared they must be sought out and supplied with nourishment, medicine, and treatment. To do this costs money. Will you contribute a trifle to help in this effort to save lives? Please act quickly. Winter has brought keen suffering.

Contributions to the Muskoka Free Hospital for Consumptives will be gratefully acknowledged by W. J. Gage, Chairman Executive Committee, 84 Spadina Avenue or R. Dunbar, Secretary-Treasurer, 223 King Street West, Toronto.

Kill Your Own Town

The fall and winter mail order catalogues have arrived from Toronto. Fill out a long list and send it to the city if you don't care what happens to Walkerton and your own business men who pay taxes and support the town in various ways.

The farmers on the 12th Concession are negotiating with the Mildmay Electric light Company, for the extension of their lines eastward on that concession to supply them with light and power. Those farmers who are now being supplied with current consider it one of the greatest conveniences on the farm.—Mildmay Gazette.

Auto Upset.

Neck Broken by Fall.

While helping Frank Campbell draw in hay, about Tuesday noon, George Meckley, of Melancthon, fell backwards from the rack to the ground, striking on his head and shoulders and breaking his neck. Dr. Smith of Shelburne, was called, but could of course do nothing to help him, the unfortunate man living only a few minutes after the fall. Deceased leaves a widow and a large family.—Shelburne Economist.

Kincardine Plant Destroyed.

Fire believed to be of incendiary origin completely destroyed the three-storey brick building and plant of the Hunter Bridge and Boiler Company early Saturday morning of last week. The company was about to start manufacturing shells. Patterns of the special machinery being installed were burned. It is thought that German sympathizers were responsible for the fire. The loss is estimated at $20,000.

Homeseekers Special each Tuesday

For the accomodation of Homeseekers' and general tourist traffic to Western Canada through train carrying tourist sleepers and colonist cars will leave Toronto 10.45 p.m. each Tuesday until further notice running through to Winnipeg. Attention is directed to the remarkably low round trip fares in connection with Homeseekers Excursion to Western Canada via Canadian Pacific Railway. Tickets are on sale each Tuesday until Oct 26th inclusive and are good to return within two months from date of sale. Apply to any C.P.R. Agent for full particulars or write M.G. Murphy, District Passenger Agent, Toronto.

District Representative Wanted

The Echo received a phone message from a farmer Tuesday morning stating that there was work in this district for the District Representative who resides at Walkerton. It appears that the Perennial Sow thistle has made its appearance here, and as it is one of the worst known of weeds the situation demands immediate attention for if its seeds get among the rocks on the Peninsula it will require eternal vigilance to get rid of this weed. This thistle has put some farmers in Eastern Ontario out of business and is now alarming farmers in Kent.—Wiarton Canadian Echo.

Provide for Disabled.

An Ottawa despatch says: Criticism having been made that incapacitated Canadian soldiers were to be provided for under the pension system only to the extent of $5.50 per week, it is pointed out by the Militia Department that under the act allowance could be made for an increase grant in cases where it was deemed necessary and that moreover the scheme of pensions is not necessarily final. Moreover an incapacitated soldier, if friendless, can go to a convalescent home where he will be accorded every attention. Should he remain at home he will be entitled to a special allowance for an attendant

Do not need Consent of Wives.

Married men who wish to enlist need no longer have their wives' consent, and young men over 18 years of age, who wish to enlist, do not need to have the consent the consent of their parents. This regulation is now in force at the Recruiting Depot, and a number of men have already taken advantage of it. No person under eighteen years of age is allowed to join the Canadian Expeditionary Force in any capacity whatever. Young men who volunteer are required to take an oath to the effect that they are more than eighteen years of age, Warning is given that any who say that they are over eighteen when they really are not so old, are guilty of perjury, and liable to suffer the consequences.

Will be Exhibited at Toronto.

A small staff is busy this week in cleaning up and overhauling the bones of a great pre-historic mastodon, which has been the property of Mr. H. H. Harriston, of this town for years. The mastodon is being put in shape for the Toronto Exhibition where it will be sent next week to be placed on exhibition. The most interesting fact about it is that the bones were found in this district—in the township of amaranth, near Shelburne. It is said that remains of only three of these massive beasts were ever found in Canada, and this is one of them. One of the others is on view in the New York Museum of National History and the and the other at the University of Dakota. All were found in or about the township of Dufferin. Owen Sound Sun,

Cigarette users, as well as drinking men are to be barred from state employment in Kansas, under the rules promulgated by the new State Civil Service Commission.

Traffic has revived considerably on the G.T.R. For a number of months there was almost complete stagnation and the sidings were filled with empty cars, while the passenger traffic was light. Of late there has been a gradual change for the better and by fall the railway officials are expecting that traffic will be almost normal again.

Away go the Puttees.

An Ottawa despatch says: It has been practically decided by the militia authorities that the puttees worn by the Canadian soldiers will be done away with. Long boots will be worn instead. Just what type of boot has not been decided as yet. The trouble with the puttee is that in the wet weather it shrinks and binds the leg so tightly as to interfere with the circulation, and in the cold weather the feet are more easily frozen.

More Exposures.

Some shoking exposures in regard to the purchase of horses in Nova Scotia for the Canadian forces were made last week before the royal Commission which is enquiring into these matters, One man received $140 for a horse eleven years old: another got $105 for a 14-year-old; still another received $140 for a 14-year-old mare with a large ankle and a lame foot; 100 was paid for a twenty year old, with the heaves, which the owner had intended to kill in the fall. A lad was paid $165 for a horse that could not get up without help, but in this case the father of the lad asked the Commissoner to take the money back.

Another Boat Submarined.

The White Star Liner Arabic was torpedoed and sunk on Thursday by a German submarine near the place where the Lusitania went down. Of the four hundred odd people who were on board the biggest majority were saved. The Arabic was outward bound from Liverpool to New York and carried only a few passengers. She was a vessel of about fifteen thousand tons displacement.

Let the County Act.

The proposal has been made for Elderslie Tp. to provide a machinegun for our soldiers at the front. Instead of each municipality trying to raise funds by a municipal grant or private subscriptions, wouldn't it be more business like to convene a special session of the county council and purchase about 7 or 8 guns. We notice that Perth County has purchased 8 machine guns and as the county distributes the tax over a large area it would be better to call the county council together for this purpose. No doubt the Reeves and Deputies would not make a charge for their services for one day and a levy of one quarter of a mill on Bruce county property would buy 7 machine guns.—Chesley Enterprise.

Eugenia Plant Completed.

The Eugenia Power Plant is the second to be completed by the Hydro Commission and will shortly be in operation. The cost has been considerably below $775,000, and the power lines will feed eighteen municipalities between Owen Sound and Orangeville. The reception of Hydro power in the north will influence certain plans of the Commission respecting the enlargement of the scheme. The Commission has in mind some six developments along the Severn River and has some idea of a splendid development near the falls of the Saugeen, not far from Eugenia. If a good market opens for the electrical energy it is possible that all these developments will be connected, making a total production of some thirty thousand horse-power. It is not likely that any demonstration will mark the opening of Eugenia power. The power will be turned on quietly within the next few weeks.

To Panama Exposition via Rockies

At the present time there are a great many planning their annual tour. Considerable numbers visit the popular California resorts, while many prefer the unsurpassed resorts, palatial hotels and magnificent scenery of the Canadian Rockies. This year why not combine the two by a visit to the Panama Pacific Exposition? Numerous people in comfortable circumstances, well able to afford a trip have the idea that a journey of this nature is most expensive. This is not so; thanks to the Modern Railway facilities, an extensive trip, both interesting and educational, can be made with speed and comfort at a comparitively small cost. Why not investigate? Those contemplating a trip of any nature will receive full information from any C.P.R. Agent, or write M.G. Murphy, District Passenger Agent, Toronto.

80,000 Gone Overseas.

Over 80,000 men have now been sent from Canada for service at the front. There have been about 13,000 casualties, so that there are still 67,000 fighting men in England and France. This makes two army divisions. There are nearly 65,000 men in training at the present time at the various camps in Canada, and there is a proposal under consideration by the militia authorities to create four Canadian army divisions, two at the front and two to continue training in England and to act as reinforcements for the two in the fighting line. The present method of sending reinforcements from Canada has been found disadvantageous chiefly owning to the breaking up of units. It is felt more desirable to send reinforcements as complete units and this will be easier of accomplishment when the reserve troops are in England.

A Columbia Grafonola

will return you dividends of pleasure for a lifetime.

Until Columbia Grafonolas were brought within reach of us all, folks who lived in country towns and rural districts hadn't the same opportunity for hearing good music that city folks have.

But the Columbia Grafonola has changed all that. Now, the Columbia Grafonola will play, perfectly, records of all the music of all the world. You can sit home in your parlor or living room and hear famous opera selections by the greatest of living artists.

You can listen to famous bands—such as Creatore's, Prince's, H. M. Scots Guards and others. You can hear magnificent symphony orchestras—famous violinists like Ysaye and Kathleen Parlow, old English, Irish and Scotch Ballads sung by such artists as David Bispham—or all the up-to-date light song and dance music of the day.

All this the Columbia Grafonola makes possible for you, and at a small cost.

You can buy a superb instrument for $15.00. Others as low as $20.00 or as high as $60.00. One for every taste and every purse and on easy terms

Come see and hear any Columbia Grafonola play Columbia Records. We will gladly play them for you.

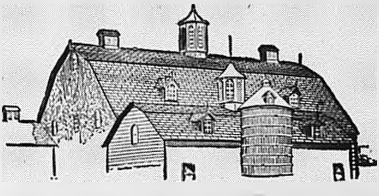
FARMERS!

Why Metallic Roofing and Shingles are not as durable as "Brantford Slates"



Brantford Asphalt Slates

For Houses and Barns

We are making colored and plain Asphalt Slates suitable for roofing any class of building, particularly farmers' buildings.

SPECIAL OFFER We are making a special offer to roof the first house or barn in your locality at about cost price and guarantee it's lifetime for ten years against leakage.

Electricians will tell you that Asphalt, from which Brantford Asphalt Shingles are made, is an excellent insulating material, and does not deteriorate when exposed to the elements, being proof against acid, salt, alkali, rust and corrosion.

Galvanized iron is subject to all these agents of destruction, as well as other enemies, viz., rust and moisture from the inside of the barn, produced by the heating of grain, moisture from cattle, etc. It is also open to attacks from the elements without, and both processes are working toward its ruin at the same time. In other words, condensation is causing the destruction of Metal Roofing and Shingles, while Asphalt Slates retain their wearing qualities indefinitely.

Therefore, Asphalt Slates are, in the end, the cheapest roofing material you can buy, and, as they are now made, the most attractive in appearance, as well as being waterproof and practically fireproof.

LOW PRICES We have succeeded in producing them at about the same price as wood shingles. Let us figure with you at once. There is no reason why the farmers of our country should put up with leaky roofs when we have acres of material we can supply quickly, at moderate prices.

ROOF-LEAK PAINTS (in Red, Green and Black) This splendid material is especially adapted for old Shingles and Metal and Felt Roofing of all kinds. In fact, any material that will take paint, can be made to last years longer by an application. Put up in large open-mouth cans of 1, 2, 3 and 5 gallons.

OLD COUNTRY NEWS

FOUR MORE V. C.'s.

The announcement was made lately of the bestowal of four Victoria Crosses, two in respect of gallantry in Gallipoli, the recipients being two commissioned and two non-commissioned officers.

Captain Eustace Jotham, 51st Sikhs Frontier Force), for most conspicuous bravery on January 7, 1915, at Spina Khaisora (Tochi Valley).

During operations against the Khostwal tribesmen, Captain Jotham, who was commanding a party of about a dozen of the North Wazisistan Militia, was attached in a Nullah and almost surrounded by an overwhelming force of some 1,500 tribesmen. He gave the order to retire, and could have himself escaped, but most gallantly sacrificed his own life by attempting to effect the rescue of one of his men who had lost his horse.

Second-Lieut George Raymond Dallas Moor, 3rd Battalion, the Hampshire Regiment, for most conspicuous bravery and resource on June 5, 1915, during operations south of Krithia, Dardanelles. When a detachment of a battalion on his left, which had lost all its officers, was rapidly retiring before a heavy Turkish attack, Second-Lieut. Moor immediately grasping the danger to the remainder of the line, dashed back some 200 yards, stemmed the retirement, led back the men and recaptured the lost trench. This young officer, who only joined the army in October, 1914, by his personal bravery and presence of mind, saved a dangerous situation.

No. 465, Lance Corp. Albert Jacka, 14th Battalion, Australian Imperial Forces, for most conspicuous bravery on the night of 19-20 May, 1915, at "Courtney's Post," Gallipoli Peninsula. Lance-Corporal Jacka, while holding a portion of our trench with four other men, was heavily attacked. When all except himself were killed or wounded, the trench was rushed and occupied by seven Turks. Lance-Corporal Jacka at once most gallantly attacked them single-handed, and killed the whole party, five by rifle fire and two with the bayonet.

No. 10073, Lance-Corp. Joseph Tombs, First Battalion, the King's Liverpool Regiment, for most conspicuous gallantry near Rue du Bois, on June 16, 1915. On his own initiative he crawled out repeatedly under a very heavy shell and machine gun fire, to bring in wounded men who were lying about 100 yards in front of our trenches. He rescued four men, one of whom he dragged back by means of a rifle sling placed around his own neck and the man's body. This man was so severely wounded that unless he had been immediately attended to he must have died.

EDINBURGH MARKSMAN'S FEAT.

The Edinburgh King's Prizeman, Quartermaster-Sergeant Dewar, of the 4th Battalion the Royal Scots, has received the thanks of the General Officer Commanding the 52nd Lowland Division for an excellent piece of work he has done in the trenches in the Gallipoli.

The incident is described as follows in the Divisional Orders:

"Major-General C. G. A. Egerton, C. B., commanding 52nd Lowland Division, congratulates and thanks Company Quartermaster-Sergeant Dewar, 4th Battalion Royal Scots, on the good work performed by Sergt. Dewar in discovering and killing with the first shot a Turkish sniper in rear of the firing line on June 21st, 1915, thereby proving that Sergeant Dewar's skill and proficiency as King's Prizemen was of eminent value to his country in the field.

"Major-General Egerton has been further desired by Lieutenant-General Hunter Weston, C.B., commanding 8th Corps, to add his congratulations, and to say that Sergt. Dewar never made as good a bull's-eye at Bisley as he did on this occasion.

Quartermaster-Sergeant Dewar gives some details of the incident in a letter to his wife. He says:

"I don't fancy trench warfare much at all—it seems very slow to sleep and eat and lie about the trench all day, with never a sight of an enemy, unless an odd sniper. I pinned one on Monday morning, and went out and got his rifle to-day. It is really wonderful the way they conceal themselves, and I can assure you one has to be wide awake to spot them. This chap was actually in the rear of our trench, and might have done a big lot of damage. He had a canvas bag with provisions and any amount of ammunition beside him, and, judging by the empty cases, must have fired a great number of rounds. The only thing I fancy might have been taken off him was his fez, which was made of green silk. I couldn't bear to touch any of his belongings, but his rifle proved too much of a temptation."

FAMOUS FOOTBALLER KILLED.

News has been received from France that Mr. Frank N. Tarr, only son of the late Mr. Frederick Tarr (who died under sudden circumstances some 12 months ago), has been killed by a shell at Ypres. Deceased, who was born at Ironville, Codnor Park, Derbyshire, was 29 years of age. He was a lieutenant in the Leicestershire Regiment, and at the time of his death was acting adjutant. He was educated at Uppingham, and for some years was a famous and popular three-quarter back player of the Leicestershire Rugby fotoball team. He developed his football at Oxford University, and received his blue from W. W. Hoskins in 1907, and he formed one of a great scoring line who, amongst them, scored the 17 points by which the Oxonians defeated Cambridge. He played in 1908 and 1909, and had the satisfaction of never being on the losing side in the inter-'Varsity match. In the same season he was honored by England, playing first of all against the Australians, at Blackheath. He also took part in the Welsh and French matches at Cardiff and Leicester.

NOTES.

There has just died suddenly at Norton Clatten, Mr. Geo. Brown, 71 who, after 50 years' work as a journalist, retired about three years ago.

The death has taken place at Wombwell of Mr. Oliver Bird, a well known and old resident. For a long number of years deceased ran a wagonette service between Wombwell and Houghton Main Colliery.

Though rescued by fellow workmen, Edward Kirk, aged 38, of Wharfe-street, Barnsley, who was partly buried by a fall of stone at the Monk Bretton Colliery, near Barnsley, died shortly after admission to the hospital.

The charge of attempted murder against two Hull schoolboys for tying a playmate in a sack and rolling him into a dyke, was reduced to common assault. The eldest boy, Stanley Easterby, 12, was remanded for a week and John Suggitt was placed on probation.

Ernest Wragg, 22, was remanded by the Nottingham magistrates on Wednesday on a charge of attempting to murder his wife at Lenton, in June. It was alleged that he fired at the woman with a revolver, and then shot himself. Prisoner since the occurrence had been an inmate of the Nottingham General Hospital.

The Prince of Wales' war relics are being stored for him in Windsor Castle.

Sir Robert Borden, Prime Minister of Canada, has been invited to attend the forthcoming National Eisteddfod of Wales at Bangor.

The London Gazette states that the King has appointed the Rev. William Keatinge, Chaplain of the Forces, to be an additional member of the third class, or Companion of the Order of St. Michael and St George, in recognition of distinguished service in the field.

Transvaal coal owners have offered the Imperial Government a gift of 100,000 tons of coal.

The total amount subscribed to the Lord Mayor of Liverpool's Serbian Relief Fund is £246.

A soldier of 14, Pte. A. H. Walters, R. A. M. C., has volunteered for foreign service.

The fifth week of Newcastle's tent recruiting campaign concluded on Saturday week. Five hundred men joined during the week, bringing the total up to 2,000.

The Rev. J. J. Merry, vicar of Cundall, Yorks., who has a family of seven, has three sons in the army and three daughters working as nurses in military hospitals.

The Exchequer returns from April 1 to July 24 show: Receipts £66,868,561; expenditure £340,213,422. In the corresponding period of last year the receipts were £52,697,278, and the expenditure £59,229,236.

A juvenile trick has had terrible consequences at Grimsby, where Geo. Harold Brown, a boy of 17, while walking on top of a fence to show his companions the art of balancing, missed his footing and fell astride the fence, sustaining internal injuries and succumbing in the local hospital.

Dutch mussels, which had for generations been imported into England till last season, when the danger of submarine attacks kept the ships back have now arrived.

It was stated at Bridlington Town Council, Yorkshire, that up to July 17 the estimated loss to lodginghouse keepers in Bridlington owing to the war was £60,000.

Hook, near Surbiton, Surrey, has a population of 470, of whom 250 are children, yet, says the rector, 57 men are with the colours, including a son of thirty-five and his father of "thirty-eight."

Marlborough School has 2,284 Old Marlburians serving with the forces. Twenty-five of them have gained the D. S. O., 162 have been mentioned in despatches, and 130 have given their lives in the war.

A million men eligible for military service, whose places should be filled by women or men above military age, are, according to Brigadier-General Sir Eric Swayne, living within the area of the Northern Military Command.

Three boys, Joseph Margolis, Jacob Sulheese and Reuben Copstack, aged six and seven, of Oldham-road, Manchester, were found drowned in the Rochdale Canal, Newton Heath. It was thought that two were drowned trying to save the third.

Sergeant O'Leary, V. C., before leaving for the front, saw Lord Kitchener at the War Office and afterwards had an interview at the House of Commons with the Prime Minister, who shook hands with him cordially and congratulated him on his gallantry.

Having been contradicted by the Secretary of the Irish Recruiting Committee on his statement that the Warrenpoint recruiting demonstration cost £1,500 and only brought six recruits at £250 a head, the Lord Primate of Ireland now states that his informant on cost of the meeting was in error. He adds that the broad fact remains that those who listened to the speeches at a meeting organized with such pains and skill made a poor response to the appeal addressed to them from an All-Ireland platform.

Ernest Blythe, a "Sinn Fein" organizer was arrested at the house of the Rev. O. Osteran, Rockcorry, County Monaghan, for refusing to obey General Friend's order to leave Ireland. He was remanded by a special court and taken to Belfast. Four men were ordered out of Ireland. All of them disobeyed and have been arrested. Herbert Pim, a Belfast author, was remanded on a similar charge. Sinn Fein has been agitating against recruiting.

Samuel Coushall Balden, a solicitor, of Newhall street, was remanded at Birmingham on a charge of converting £1,200 to his own use. Mr. Balden was in the uniform of a private in the Army Service Corps. It was alleged that apparently the total defalcations would be over £10,000.

The marriage of Miss Violet Mary Ashburner Lodge, eldest daughter of Sir Oliver Lodge, principal of Birmingham University, to Mr. Rowland Waterhouse, son of Mr. and Mrs. William Waterhouse, of Newport, Essex, took place on Wednesday week at St George, Edgbaston.

An old-age pensioner, Laurence Hayden, and his sister, Mary Anne Hayden, sixty-nine, found dead in their burning house at Collon, Co. Kildare, are believed to have been murdered. Neighbors who put out the flames forced an entrance and found brother and sister lying in their bedrooms with their skulls fractured. A box in a bedroom, supposed to have contained over £300, was empty.

The house-fly campaign has attracted much attention among medical health officers in Scotland, and on Tuesday week a novel exhibition was opened at the Scottish Zoological Park in Edinburgh.

Mr. Arthur Turner, of Camberwell, was killed while riding in his motor-car on the Farnborough road between Aldershot and Farnborough. Along with three other men and a boy he was thrown out of the car, which skidded on a hole in the road, leapt over a twelve-foot pathway into a ditch beyond, and turned over. Turner was pinned under the car.

During a severe thunderstorm on Friday last six Territorials were struck by lightning near Ipswich. One was killed and four seriously injured. Others took shelter under trees, but those who had no coats remained in the open. The Territorial who was killed appeared to have been struck on his cap badge, which was bent upwards, all the buttons of his tunic were ripped off and one boot torn off the foot.

It was reported to the Kent Education Committee on Monday week that up to the end of June 1,276 children in the county schools had been released to help farmers.

Growers agree that the Kentish hop crop must be poor; few expect the yield to be more than half last year's. Rains have caused much damage to fruit.

When boys were bathing in a disused pond near the old Vulcan Works, Barrow-in-Furness, Lancs, one named Beckett got into difficulties on entering the water, which contained a lot of stringy weeds. His friend Blakeborough, a lad of seventeen, tried to rescue him but sank, Beckett could be seen floating just under the surface of the water. Another swimmer brought him to the side. Artificial respiration was tried but without success.

Mr. J. B. Tattersall, who has been elected to the presidency of the Federation of Master Cotton Spinners' Associations, controlling 50,000,000 spindles, in succession to Sir Charles Macara, who recently retired, began work as a "little piecer" and was afterwards a trade union delegate. He is a director of several Oldham spinning mills.

Corporal Upton, V. C., Sherwood Foresters, was quietly married at Lincoln recently to Miss Mary Chamber. The secret had been well kept. After the ceremony Corporal Upton took his bride to meet Corporal Sharpe, V. C., who, unable to attend the civic welcome given to Corporal Upton and Lance-Corporal Keyworth, two of Lincoln's V. C.'s, had a reception "all to himself" on Tuesday week.

The new bridge over the Medway at Wateringbury, rendered necessary by river improvements between Maidstone and Tonbridge, was opened last Thursday. The improved waterway will let 150-ton barges reach Tonbridge and facilitate hop and fruit transit.

Mr. Jose Diaz, a magistrate of the Gore division of Middlesex, has been found dead at his residence, Ferndean, Kingsbury. He had been greatly upset by the death of his wife a few months ago. Mr. Diaz was chairman of the Kingsbury Urban Council and a member of the Hendon Guardians. A Spaniard by birth, he was a near relative of Porfirio Diaz, President of Mexico from 1877 to 1911, who died in Paris on July 2nd.

It was reported at a meeting of Nottingham lacemakers that while other branches of the trade were depressed plain it had greatly benefited through the Government demand for mosquito nets for the Dardanelles and Egypt.

By the death of Mr. W. R. Raper in college Oxford loses one of its smallest and most familiar figures. Mr. Raper, who was 73 years of age, was vice-president and bursar of Trinity College. He played a great part in Oxford life and was famous for the public spirit which led him to protect well known viewpoints from enclosure. His taste as a scholar was exquisite; his Latin verse was faultless.

For illuminating his garden at night with fairy lamps in honor of a wedding, Arthur Buckett was fined 10s. and costs at Southampton under the Defence of the Realm Act. It was stated that the lights caused a glare in the sky.

Evidence at a Southend inquest on the Rev. R. de Mayne Dodsworth, 68, of New Hearlston, Pleasley, Mansfield, showed that he went out to bathe and was seized apparently with cramp. His daughter said he was a good swimmer.

On his first experience of fishing, Mr. Cecil Harrington, of Egham, has caught at Staines a golden tench, stated to be the first caught in the Thames for the last twenty years. It is 14 inches long and weighs 1 lb. 14 oz.

Mr. Thomas Downey, solicitor, has been appointed town clerk of Stockton-on-Tees, at a salary of £700 a year.

Lord Howe's estates in Essex and Suffolk will be sold by Messrs. Knight, Frank & Rutley in the autumn. The Suffolk estate near Long Melford is about 2,000 acres, the Cavendish estate 1,380 acres, and the Newton property about 472 acres. The Essex estate, close to Sudbury, includes three important farms and woodland.

Second Lieutenant F. W. Brian, 1st Welsh Regiment, awarded the Military Cross, is one of seven Chertsey brothers serving in the army. He joined the Scots Guards as a private and gained two medals in the South African War.

A Pickford motor-lorry hired by Messrs. Isler, of Bear lane, Southwark, London, was taking goods to Limpsfield, Surrey. When descending Titsey Hill, near Limpsfield, the vehicle got beyond control and crashed into a telegraph pole at the foot of the hill. The driver, Sydney Newman, of Kennington road, Kennington, and William King, a Woolwich shell turner, also of Kennington, were instantly killed.

A hand grenade which had been brought as a trophy from the trenches by Corporal Sidney Williams exploded in his house at South Wraxall, Wilts, when one of his children lifted it from the mantel shelf. The room was wrecked. A baby in a perambulator had a narrow escape. Both children were injured and were taken to hospital.

Returning from police drill at Saltburn, Yorkshire, Sergeant Walker and Constable Bell, of the East Cleveland police walked together through the woods between Saltburn and Skelton. They were examining an automatic pistol, which was accidentally fired, the bullet striking Bell. He died almost immediately.

Feather Toque in White

The toque of white is featured in many attractive styles and shapes. This one of white breast, showing a deep brim slightly flared at the top, is trimmed with a daring feather ornament. It is perched on the centre front and furnishes smart trimming. Many of these hats are feathered in heckle guinea-hen feathers and often a series of ostrich tips. These feather toques are new and suitable for wearing with suits of smart summer dresses.

THE WORLD'S WHEAT SUPPLY

An article, which should prove of interest to Canadians, is one appearing in the Bakery number of The Weekly Northwestern Miller. This article deals with the wheat supply of the world, and touches on a item or the advancing markets in the present, the quiet demand in [illegible], the heavier world shipments, the outlook for the world, and the prospects for this year's harvest of wheat. In the United Kingdom there is a further improvement in prices, which in the case of La Plata [illegible] ranges from 1s. 6d. to 2s. 3d. per qr.

The improvement is partly due to the advance in the United States and reports of unfavorable harvest weather in that country. Indian [illegible] ment quotations having advanced on the difficulty in obtaining wheat for shipment on the other side also [illegible] the market, and Karachi [illegible] on this side of the Suez canal were withdrawn from the market. Later the demand became sluggish on heavier shipments, especially to the United Kingdom and for orders, and buyers are again showing a decided power of reserve. The indisposition to buy is largely due to the increased supplies, and it is a notable fact that the Indian shipments this week were 586,000 qrs., against 88,000 in the previous week. This might have been expected to reduce Indian quotations, but the other circumstances previously noted were an effective preventive. As regards the supply outlook for the year, there is no material alteration, but the preliminary report of the area sown with winter wheat in Russia, and the estimate of the probable yield, have attracted some attention. Under war conditions it is naturally expected that the acreage would show some diminution, but the preliminary statement indicates an increase of no less than 2,200,000 acres. This would indicate that in Russia the draft for military purposes has not been equal to expectations, and the high prices current and prospective of wheat have encouraged the Russian farmer to take advantage of every possibility of harvesting the area. In addition, the Government has rendered considerable assistance, and to this some measure of the success must be ascribed.

It seems probable that the quantities to come forward from India during the coming weeks will be considerable, and the fact noted a week ago were 225,000 qrs. in excess of the estimation has, apparently, had no further effect on the actual situation. The shipments to Europe last week were 25,000 qrs. in excess of the estimate of requirements, and 115,000 above the previous week. The increase in the quantity on passage, however, was small, so far as the whole of Europe is concerned, but that to the United Kingdom increased 275,000 qrs. The supply position is, therefore, again bearish, and hopes that in due course the re-opening of the Dardanelles will admit of shipments from Russia and Roumania.

In Great Britain the wheat crop looks fairly well all around, but the beneficial rainfall has not extended to the whole area, and in places more moisture is needed. In France, after a spell of unsettled weather, with some heavy rains, the weather is cloudy in parts, but generally dry, and it is hoped that there will be no further rainfalls for some time. The outlook, on the whole, remains fairly promising, but it is feared that in some sections damage has accrued from excessive moisture. In Germany, abundant rains have removed the fears about the crops, and official reports are now optimistic, the area sown being alleged as equal to last year. In Austria the wheat condition is above the average, and rye is developing well. In Hungary, winter wheat is in very good condition, and the area of autumn-sown crops is about at average. In Switzerland the condition is excellent, the spring season having seldom been so favorable, and recent estimates give an increase of 15.1 per cent. in the crop. Within the last few days, however, heavy rains have undoubtedly compromised the situation. In Italy the weather has been of late rather unfavorable for maturing and harvesting the crop, and in the Riviera there was serious damage from floods. The Agricultural Institute gives the yield as 19.3 per cent. above last year. In Spain the yield of wheat is good, the sheaves are heavy in weight, but there are apprehensions of bad weather, and the harvest is being pushed as rapidly as possible. In Bulgaria the area sown is considerably larger, owing to the war, and the harvest promises to be exceptionally abundant. In Roumania the acreage is greatly increased, and the yield will probably be double that of last year. In Russia there are prospects of a fine harvest, and prisoners of war are being largely utilized as harvesters. Their labor is quite satisfactory, and there are said to be about 120,000 employed in the work of agriculture. Reports of winter wheat are favorable, and rye is above the average. The weather in European Russia has been rather cool, with heavy rains in parts, but there are sections which still need moisture. The International Agricultural Institute gives the yield of wheat as 52,653,000 quintals, which is 10.3 per cent above last year.

In North Africa the harvest is in progress under fairly favorable conditions. The outlook in Egypt is good, and there has been a ministerial decision authorizing the exportation of wheat without limit or restriction, but a record is to be kept in order to preclude any ultimate shortage in the country. Bombay, India, cables that the monsoon proceeds favorably, with rain in all districts. During the past week 26 inches have fallen in Bombay. It is expected that the monsoon will this week be normal. The International Agricultural Institute gives the crop as 23 per cent above last year. Showery weather continues in Victoria and in the Riverina district of New South Wales, which will further improve the position. In South Australia the season is exceptionally good, and agricultural areas have greatly benefited by the rain. In Queensland, however, there are only patchy thunderstorms. In Argentina the good weather has enabled the sowings of wheat to be continued under most favorable conditions. A new estimate of the 1914-15 crop gives it as 47.9 per cent. above that in the previous season.

FRUIT AND FLOWERS IN PROFUSION.

So varied are the styles in garden party hats that it is difficult to class them under that heading. Some are large and flat, others with drooping brims and still others in slightly poked effects. It is not so much the shape of the hat that brings it into the "Garden hat" class, as it is the trimming. Flowers, fruit and foliage serve as appropriate trimming, as will be noted in the illustration. Natural colored hemp is used in this hat, with facing of embroidered georgette crepe. An elaborate wreath of glazed fruit and flowers afford dainty trimming.

PROVERB OUT OF DATE.

Modern Science Makes Dead Men Tell Tales.

Science now opens the lips of dead men and virtually makes them tell who killed them. Science has become the greatest detective in the world, now is illustrated by Davina Waterson in the Alienist and Neurologist, with some most interesting examples from recent French criminal records.

A man was found walking away from a spot where the dead body of a man he was known to hate was discovered; and he had bloodstains on him and on his pocketknife. He explained these by saying he had stolen a rabbit, made a stew of it, and burned the skin and bones to escape detection. The story seemed too slender, and he was convicted. Then along came a physician and proved that the bloodstains on man and knife were really rabbit's blood and not human blood.

The American professors E. T. Reichert and A. P. Brown are the discoverers of the distinct characteristic chrystallization of the blood of each species of anical. They can even differentiate with certainly between the blood of men and women and of persons of the several races.

A mother was accused of killing a little girl. The coroner's jury, for lack of evidence, rendered a verdict of "murder by persons unknown." A suspicious neighbor a year later found a bloodstained knife hidden in a well. The mother said she had "used the knife to kill a rabbit last week." An expert tested the blood and pronounced it human blood shed a year ago. The terrified mother confessed her guilt.

The method of determining the age of a bloodstain was discovered by the Italian physicist, A. Lecaanazzo.

A son killed his father, cut his body into 130 pieces, buried them separately in the garden, and gave out that he was visiting friends in Paris. Six months later a farm laborer dug up a human hand. A medico-legal expert examined it and noticed several rather unusual callosities on the palm. He asked the son to give him his father's stick as a memento. The handle of the stick was a curiously-carved knob, and this fitted exactly the calloused palm. The son was convicted of the murder.

In a similar way the mutilated body of a woman was identified as that of a missing nun who had spent much time in prayer.

If a man is found shot through the head and with a pistol in his hand what more rational than a verdict of suicide? In real suicide the weapon is held so firmly that force is required to dislodge it. Several experts have tried to make the hand of a corpse grip a weapon, but have never succeeded, and their knowledge of this fact has often opened the avenue to detection of murder.

A man rushed frantically to his neighbors, saying he had found his wife burned to death in their home. A doctor examined the body and pointed out that burns made before death always contained serum, while those made after death contained none; that the burns of this woman's body contained no serum, and that therefore she had been killed and then set on fire. The man subsequently confessed that he had strangled her and set her body on fire in the hope of concealing his crime.

The Prussian Guards.

Frederick the Great originated the Prussian Guards. His ambition was to form a royal bodyguard of giants, and every country was ransacked by his agents to supply recruits. The most extravagant sums were offered to men of exceptional inches, and it is said an Irishman more than seven feet high, who was picked up by the Prussian ambassador in London, received a bounty of £1,300.—London Mail.

Was Constantly Troubled With Boils.

HAD NINE ON HIS ARMS AT ONCE.

Burdock Blood Bitters
CURED HIM.

Boils are caused by bad blood, and unless the blood is made pure you cannot expect to get rid of them.

Ointments and salves will do you no good. You must get at the seat of the trouble by using a good internal blood purifying medicine such as that grand old remedy Burdock Blood Bitters.

Mr. Samuel Buckler, Tatamagouche, N.S., writes:—"Last summer I was constantly troubled with boils. I had nine on my arms at once. I thought it was caused from bad blood so I got two bottles of Burdock Blood Bitters, and before the first bottle was done I began to feel a great deal better, and before the second one was finished I did not have a boil, nor have I had one since. I cannot recommend B.B.B. too highly."

HAD CHOLERA INFANTUM.

Doctor Said He was In a Very Dangerous Condition.

Mothers cannot watch their children too closely for signs of cholera infantum as this disease carries off thousands of infants during the hot summer months.

Mrs. Geo. W. Garland, Prosser Brook, N.B., writes: "Last summer my boy Joe, then a year old, was taken sick with cholera infantum. He was so bad the waste matter from the bowels looked as if it had come from a broken boil. I sent word to the doctor who was at a neighbor's, about a mile distant, and he said my boy was in a very dangerous condition. He sent me some tablets which made the child vomit, and when he learned that they caused vomiting he sent me more tablets to stop it. In the meantime I had been giving Dr. Fowler's Extract of Wild Strawberry, which I continued using, and when the bottle was all used my baby was cured. I though it only fair to let you know about it."

Dr. Fowler's Extract of Wild Strawberry has been on the market for the past 70 years, and is known from one end of Canada to the other as a positive cure for all bowel complaints.

When you ask for "Dr. Fowler's" be sure you get what you ask for as there are many rank imitations on the market.

Coffee a la Brazilian

The coffee of Brazil is the lowest priced in the world's market. Knowing this fact, I was the more surprised at the exquisite flavor of the coffee served in the public cafes of Brazil. I called this apparent anomaly to the attention of an old Anglo-Brazilian with whom I dined in Santos one evening, and he advanced the opinion that the Americans, Germans and French, the principal coffee drinkers, did not know how to have the beverage.

"You are all too free with water and too sparing with coffee," he said. "You spare your coffee and, I suppose —um—well, yes, possibly your nerves." Then he summoned the head waiter, held a short conversation with him in Portuguese and finally induced him to escort us to the kitchen in the rear and inaugurate for my benefit the ceremony of preparing a fresh tank of coffee.

The chef desired it particularly explained that coffee as generally used in Brazil was not roasted to the crispness of that treated in the United States. This insures against any but the most delicate of the flavoring essence being extracted in the boiling and thus imparts smoothness to the beverage. He also called attention to the fact that the bean is not ground fine. Each grain is cracked into not more than six or eight pieces by being run through a wide set mill and then carefully blown and sifted to get rid of the dust and small fragments.

But the main divergence from our procedure lies in the quantity of coffee used. An extract of meat advertisement defines its product as "a bull in a teacup." With no more exaggeration might the modern Brazilian nectar be styled "a plantation in a coffee cup."

The chef took four liter measures of the cracked coffee and added it to just twice that quantity of water, but not boiling water in a shallow copper pan. Here he allowed it to soak for five minutes before turning on the burners, quickly bringing the water to a boil so violent that pieces of the coffee were thrown out on the stove.

This agitation was followed by ten minutes' cooling on a side table, at the end of which time the chef added a half dozen drops of a pungent liquid from a slender green vial, the nature of which he refused to divulge, but which my friend told me was some kind of a neutralizing agent to eliminate a certain rawness, impalpable to other than trained palates. Almost immediately a nickel siphon was introduced just under the surface of the liquid, and about six liters of it was drawn off from the pan into a boiler.

Nothing now remained but the boiling down, which took half an hour and reduced the liquid to a volume of three liters and the consistency of thin maple syrup. In the boiler it was inky black, but when poured showed a stream which was amber bright and crystal clear. Thus the four liters of coffee beans made only three-quarters of that quantity of liquid coffee.

If you are not of a nature impervious to the appeals of the appetite your first cup of coffee in a Santos cafe will be an experience. You enter and seat yourself at one of the tables scattered in refreshing aimlessness over the cool marble pavement. Hidden in a tangle of shrubbery an orchestra is playing something with a catch and a sob in it that you are sure you have heard in another incarnation, while an electric fan placed in a palm tree sets a frond aquiver just above your head.

Even the rattle of the street sinks to a heavy hum and comes to your ear all peacefulness. Lulled by a veritable lotus eater's spell of content, you are about to drowse away and loose your fancy of the familiar but elusive melody that is still pulsing in the jungle in the patio when somehow you become aware that the mozo has set a little cup before you, which, from the pleasant odor and the thin curl of smoke above it, might be full of a fragrant incense.

You lift it to your lips and feel that strange stir of anticipation, that mysterious foretaste, called by sentimentalists "the soul of the drink," which steals over your preliminary to sipping a rare and pungent liquor. Now it touches your tongue, and you are willing to swear that the capsule of liquid life is dissolving in your mouth. In a moment more the fumes have risen to your brain, a thrill of energy goes tingling through your nerves, and you straighten up with the feeling that you are able to go out and build a railroad single handed. If you can go to sleep in the next twenty-four hours you deserve a gold medal.—New York Sun.

FARM AND GARDEN

SOME VETERINARY NOTES.

Applying a poultice may seem a simple matter to the man of inexperience; but it is not so simple as it seems. We know of a man who put a hot poultice on his dog's foot, and an hour afterward searched everywhere for it in the yard. The dog had eaten the poultice, of course, and experience teaches that this would occur.

Experience is necessary to prevent accidents and insure the proper doing of even simple things for sick people and animals. The man who puts a big hot poultice upon a horse's jaw or throat for the first time, knows that something is wrong when an hour or two afterward he finds the poultice cold and sagged away from the skin. A flaxseed-meal poultice is heavy from the presence of water and will sag unless properly applied. It is commonly used and beneficial in strangles (colt distemper) when an abscess under the jaw is coming to a head.

To put such a poultice in place, so that the hot flaxseed-meal will stay in contact with the skin, use a "many-tailed bandage." To make one, tear eight or ten tails six or eight inches long on each end of a strip of new unbleached linen, one and one-quarter yards long and half a yard wide. The cloth may be smaller or slightly larger than this, according to the size of the animal to be treated. Put the cloth in place by tying opposite tails together over the face, in front of the eyes, back of the ears and on top of the neck. Make the poultice as thick as soft clay or putty, adding a little wheat bran to keep it from sticking when dry. After the cloth is in place, unfasten or loosen two tails in front of the ears, and two others behind them; then pack the poultice material into place through this opening, mould it snugly upon the part needing the material and retie the tails to keep the poultice in place. This is the only plan that "works" perfectly.

To poultice a foot make the poultice material as before, lay it on a large square of new gunny sacking, or canvas, set the sore foot down upon it, bring up the corners of the sacking and fasten them in place with a strap passed through several holes in the sacking and then buckled around the pastern. It is better still to use a square of gunny sacking to be covered in turn by a square of canvas. Always tie a horse up short when such a poultice is applied, else he may tear it off with his teeth. If he is so sore and lame that he cannot stand up, he will have to be supported with veterinary slings or allowed to lie down. In the recumbent position he will leave poultices alone.

A many-tailed bandage should also be used when applying a poultice to the knee, hock or ankle. Before applying a poultice to the knee or hock, put a soft straw or hay rope as a bandage on the leg below; then put on the poultice or other dressing secured in place by a many tailed bandage. The straw bandage will help to support the poultice. Further support the poultice from above with strips of new unbleached muslin, or with straps fastened to a breast collar, or breeching strap, as the case may require. When a poultice cloth or other bandage is applied to a hock joint, remember to omit the point of the hock, else the bandage will not remain in place.

A horse should be tied up short in his stall when a knee or hock is poulticed. The standing posture is also necessary for the successful treatment of a cut ("broken") knee, or for a hock that is cut in front. Best results [illegible] obtained and [illegible] by such care. If the horse is allowed to lie down, the motion of getting up and down keeps the wound open and irritated. A horse should also be tied up after stitches are put in a large wound of the skin and muscles of the croup, at one side of the tail, commonly caused by the kick of a stable mate.

[illegible] POOR SEED CORN.

Bad germination in seed corn, combined with prolonged cold weather at time of planting, has been the cause of much disappointment this season to ensilage growers. The seed corn growers of south-western Ontario were almost equally disappointed, through being unable to find a market for their thoroughly-dried corn of strong vitality. Many samples were taken by seed inspectors, and the investigations made indicate clearly that at least 75 per cent. of the cause for a poor stand can be traced to the ensilage growers buying low priced seed.

Unfortunately, high priced seed is not always a guarantee of high quality, but low priced seed is possible only with corn that has had no special care in curing for seed. The farmer who gets $1.25 per bush. of 70 lbs. on the ear for corn taken out of his corn crib in the spring has more profit than the farmer who receives $2.50 a bush. of 70 lbs. on the ear for corn that has been kiln-dried or rack-dried in special corn-drying buildings.

If harvested in dry weather and kept in narrow cribs through the winter, the cheap corn may give a fairly satisfactory stand of plants with thick seeding and good soil and weather conditions. But too many farmers have learned to their sorrow the very serious risk they take in using corn wintered in this way. It is always advisable for growers to procure seed corn on the ear as during moist weather shelled corn in transportation or storage will absorb moisture and mold within a very few days, thus destroying its vitality.—Seed Branch, Ottawa.

Farmers' Clubs in Ontario now total over 30.

Ontario's Horticultural Societies have 13,000 members enrolled.

Onion Smut is reported in Ontario for the first time, and means have been adopted to keep it under control.

Foul Brood among Bees, while held in check by the methods of the Department, does not seem to be disappearing.

Seventy-five per cent. of the farm help placed through the Ontario Department of Agriculture have been placed on yearly engagements.

Yellows and Little Peach diseases have been practically eliminated in Ontario, and measures have been adopted for the control of the cherry fruit fly.

Alfalfa is being grown in various parts of the province under the direction of the department, in order to supply farmers with seed suited to this climate.

In the acre-profit competition last year 500 bushels of potatoes were raised on one acre by a Middlesex competitor at a cost of $[illegible], and with a net profit of $167.15.

The average net profit of the five leading [illegible] last year in the acre-profit competition for potatoes totalled $124.[illegible], and that of the lowest five was $15.45.

Vegetable growers in Ontario are warned of the necessity of developing a home seed supply, since the former sources of supply, chiefly Germany and Holland, have been cut off.

There were 102 dairy factories in operation in Ontario in 1914, with [illegible] patrons; 161 creameries, with [illegible] patrons, and a total output of about 23 million pounds of butter.

In the dairy herd competition, conducted by the Dairymen's Association of Western Ontario in 1914, the first prize herd produced 7,922 pounds per cow for the six months from May to October.

Experiments at the Ontario Agricultural College continue to show that the variety of oats known as O. A. C. No. 72 is still at the front in all tests and is being more generally grown by the farmers of the province.

To clear Ontario of "scrubs" and undesirable sires, the Department is proceeding to enforce the law which regulates the compulsory inspection of stallions. This law provides that no grade stallion shall be allowed to stand or travel after August, 1918.

Farmers' sons take great interest in the Feeding Hogs for Profit Competition and in the 20 competitions last year the average net profit of the [illegible] was $[illegible], while the average of the first five winners was $10.10 per hog, and that of the lowest five $[illegible].

Experiments being carried on at the Experimental Fruit Farm at Vineland include one to determine the value of plant foods for the peach under certain conditions, another in pruning, in which 200 [illegible] trees are being used, one to determine the value of [illegible] bees; others to test varieties of strawberries, plums, pears, cherries, currants and gooseberries.

BEARS' TERRIBLE COMBAT.

Fought to the Death in Cage in Edinburgh Park.

As the result of an unequal fight waged in the bear pit at the Scottish Zoological Park, Edinburgh, the small [illegible] brown bear, a favorite among the juvenile visitors to the park, was killed.

Seven bears in all—five brown and two black—were accommodated in the pit, and the fight occurred between the small brown bear guarding a [illegible] which a larger bear considered was intended for it. The beast attacked the smaller one with deadly fury.

Some laborers hurled stones at the attacker, but the stones had little effect, and an attendant, who was hastily summoned, gamely went into the pit to the assistance of the overborne animal. He got hold of one of the large bear's hind legs, but was unable to pull the bear off its victim.

With a heavy club the keeper drove off the attacker, but only for a moment or two. The keeper also used a heavy whip until it broke.

In deadly grip the two bears rolled into the water, but the fight continued for some time, until the big bear was eventually beaten off. Badly mauled, the victim got into a cage, and its wounds were dressed and restoratives applied, but without avail, for the animal died later in the evening.

An examination of the carcass showed the terrible power in Bruin's claws. From the manner in which the big bear continued to hug from the spectators immediately after the fight had ended, the unequal nature of the combat was evident, for he appeared to have suffered little hurt.

Straws show which way the wind blows, but that isn't why drowning men clutch at them.

THE POULTRY WORLD

SELECTION OF A ROOSTER

The time has now come when almost every farmer desires to make improvements in his strain of layers. Most men have learned that the rooster of the breeding pen has a great deal to do with the egg-laying ability of next season's layers. This influence of the rooster has been believed in, to some extent, for years. But not until late years have we come to form definite ideas of his value and intelligent conceptions as to his selection and use. For many years the general farmer or ordinary keeper of poultry has from time to time every year or so, introduced into his flock roosters of strange blood with the hope of improving the flock and its activity as to egg production. In the selection of these roosters there were no rules laid down, except that they of course must be of good, healthy vigorous stock, and perhaps of the same breed. The result is that the average flock is a lot of mongrel-bred hens, without a characteristic so planted in the family as to breed true.

In the selection of a rooster I would seek among no flocks outside those of your breed. If your flock be Plymouth Rocks I would not think of looking for a rooster among anything but Rocks. I would want to know that he was of an egg-laying strain. I would want to know that the parties of whom I purchase make regular use of the trapnest and that this rooster's family has a good egg-laying record. I would want to know that in his general build-up [illegible] has not been sacrificed in weight and constitutional vigor.

It will pay you to get in touch with some good breeder. Tell him the condition of your flock and let him stock you with roosters next fall. By [illegible] the breeders one or two may be all you need.

One reason I have taken up the rooster question just now is that, by beginning now, you can so manage your old roosters as to have enough [illegible] to buy good roosters. This is done by disposing of your old roosters right now before the weather gets warm. As the breeding season is over you will have no more use for them until next year. The average cost of keeping a fowl is about [illegible] dollar per year. While your [illegible] are [illegible] and so are [illegible] for a whole year, [illegible] you will not only [illegible] but you will [illegible] the damage the roosters do in the way of fertilizing the eggs. The [illegible] production and handling of the nation's [illegible] is due to the farmer's neglect to remove the males from the flocks as soon as the hatching season is over. [illegible] part of this loss [illegible] roosters and it will be [illegible] saving a sum with which to buy a good rooster or two from [illegible] breeders. [illegible] If your local [illegible] I would [illegible] and after a [illegible] a feeding [illegible] for a [illegible] It will [illegible] the hens during the [illegible] If they are not good [illegible] would like to have I would take a reasonable amount [illegible] and buy good choice stock for [illegible] hatchings.

If you do not do this then you will [illegible] enough [illegible] to have bought the new roosters. Then why wouldn't this plan of selling the roosters now be the same as getting new roosters without cost? But before you select your next season's roosters be sure and read the foregoing article on selection.—Oklahoma Farmer.

FACTS AND RULES.

Facts and rules which you should observe:

1. Red mites multiply most readily during warm weather, and in dark, damp, dirty houses.
2. Avoid all the hiding places possible. Change nest material often. Don't allow any decayed or broken eggs to remain in the nests.
3. When a house is once infested, very thorough treatment is required in order to get rid of them.
4. Any one of three methods may be used: (a) Whitewashing and painting with kerosene or crude carbolic acid; (b) fumigating with sulphur and painting with cresol emulsion; (c) spraying with lime sulphur solution.
5. To prevent mites, keep the house clean and paint the roosts and interior of nests every two weeks with kerosene and crude carbolic acid.

It is found that young chickens can take a greater proportion of animal food in the form of fish meal than as [illegible]. This is no doubt due to its being more readily digested. Some recently have reared perfectly on 5 per cent. of this food from the shell.

INDIAN RUNNER DUCKS

Indian Runner ducks are growing rapidly in popular favor and in some sections are competing with hens for favor among poultrymen. Remarkable records for egg production have been made by the Indian runners, which are good foragers, grow rapidly and reach maturity early.

Full grown specimens weigh from four to four and a half pounds. This is about the weight of Pekins, but is not too small for profitable marketing since the ducklings can be rushed to marketing size quickly. The old fowls are good foragers and the heaviest laying breed of ducks known.

The market is far from being supplied and duck farmers are finding this a profitable branch of the business. The heaviest laying ducks necessarily are the most profitable, and duck growers are finding the Indian Runners, both colored and white, very satisfactory for this purpose.

The White Indian Runner duck makes a better appearance when dressed than the colored Indian Runner. It has every other quality of the Indian Runner and its spreading popularity bids fair to result, in a very few years, in the supremacy of the White Indian Runner duck over its sister with colored feathers.

The Largest Reptile.

The largest existent reptile is the man-eating salt water crocodile of southern Asia and Australia, which, when full grown, measures thirty feet in length from end of nose to tip of tail (the man makes hardly more than a mouthful for this fearsome creature.

She that always complains is never pitied.

TOUCH AND GO WITH DEATH

Fell On Bale and Floated Till Relieved.

A man who is now at the head of one of the largest establishments for dyeing silks in this country tells a story of a strange and thrilling adventure that he passed through when he was still only the superintendent of the "boiling room."

"Silk," he says, in telling the story, "has been the means of my living and once it saved my life. Have you ever been in a room where they boil the raw silk? It's a hot, steaming place, with great bubbling vats that are sunk to a level with the floor. The raw silk, in bales, all fluffy and sticky, comes in on rolling trucks, and is dumped into the vats. The mass has to be stirred about a good deal before it gets soaked through and goes under.

"'Dump them into No. 6 vat,' I told the men. 'I'll stir them if you fellows want to go to dinner.'

"When they had gone I began to look around for the stirring fork. I couldn't find it anywhere. 'Confound Bill!' I said to myself. 'He loses everything.'

"I had hardly got the words out of my mouth when my foot went off the edge of the vat. I felt myself falling, and I was seized with the full conviction of death.

"I had time to think over just how terribly hot the boiling water would be and to wonder how much of me would be left when the men came back from dinner. Then I felt myself land flat on my back on the mass of floating silk.

"To this day I can see the very look of the old smoky roof as I lay on the island of silk with the boiling water on all sides. It was horribly hot there. The perspiration started out all over me, and I felt that I must move.

"First, however, I shouted as loudly as I could. When no one answered I cautiously tried to turn on my side. The bale of fibre began slowly to roll over. Nearly paralyzed with terror, I threw out one arm. It was just enough change in balance. I felt the rolling motion stop. Then I knew it wouldn't do to move. I lay on my back, poised on the middle of the bale, and waited for help. After a minute or two I began to realize that the silk was slowly sinking into the vat.

"You could hardly notice the motion. At first I could look out of the corner of my eyes and see the edge of vat No. 6. A little later, when I looked again, it was out of my line of vision. I couldn't move without having the bale roll over and if I remained still I would go down inch by inch into the scalding water below.

"I can remember that I became a little hysterical. It's funny what tricks the mind plays.

"'This is dyeing with a vengeance,' I said aloud, and I even laughed as I said it.

"It was growing hotter. Steam had begun to percolate through the silk, and I was wet through with the stifling clouds that rose from the surface of the water. I had no idea of time. By and by, however, some one answered my shouts. The door opened and two men came running across the room.

"'Get a pole!' shouted one.

"I knew that would be fatal: the slightest push and I would roll over into the steaming stew.

"'Boys,' cried I, 'don't touch me or it will be all over. One of you turn off the feed pipe.'

"I could hear the chug, chug of the steam being cut off from the vat. A moment later I could see the wet rim that broadened round the edges, and I knew the water was falling. It took half an hour to empty No. 6. For a while the two men ran round like excited June bugs. Then they got a rope and sat on the edge of the vat watching me with great staring eyes.

"As the water ran out the silk sank now on one side, now on the other. Could it start to roll! Both the men grunted and sat up very straight. Suddenly one of them cried out:

"'There's the bottom!'

"I felt the mass of silk settle against something. I heard the last water gulp as it ran out. Then I fainted away."—Youth's Companion.

Winding Puttees.

There are two kinds of puttees, the spiral and the straight. The former are cut in the shape of a half circle, and they fall in natural folds when wound round the calf. It is the straight military puttee which sometimes troubles the raw recruit, but its adjustment should present no difficulties if the following simple rule is carried out. In commencing to roll the cloth round the leg the end should be first placed against the one the inside of the foot. When the puttee has been twice wound round the leg it should be turned completely over. That is to say, the back of the cloth should be twisted round to the front. The cloth should then be wound in the ordinary way until the fifth turn is reached, when the puttee should be twisted as before. The effect of reversing the cloth at the third and fifth turn is to neatly fold the straight puttee round the calf without fear of it slipping when the wearer is running or marching.

Squeaky Shoes.

The "squeak" in shoes is caused by the inside and outside soles rubbing together in walking. To overcome this disagreeable trouble make an opening at the edge of the inside of the shank of the shoe and work a screwdriver between the soles to the tips, thereby loosening the inner and outer soles. Then work in a little French chalk, soapstone or talcum powder through the opening. By bending the soles back and forth or slightly tapping the edges the powder will work itself between them. The opening can then be closed with one or two tacks, and the squeaking will be permanently stopped. Such an emergency repair is very much better than the soaking or oiling frequently resorted to and yet does no harm to the shoes, provided the job is done by a competent shoe repairer.—Technical World.

CROP CENSUS

Latest Bulletin as to Wheat, Hay, Clover and Alfalfa.

The Dominion Census and Statistics Office issued recently a bulletin giving a preliminary estimate of the yield of fall wheat, of hay and clover, and of alfalfa, based upon appearances at the end of July, as estimated by correspondents, and a report on the condition of other field crops at the same date.

Fall Wheat, Hay and Clover and Alfalfa. The preliminary estimate of the average yield per acre of fall wheat in Canada for 1915 is 25.10 bushels, as compared with 21.41 bushels last year, and with 21.79 bushels, the average of the five years 1910 to 1914. The harvested area of fall wheat in the five provinces of Ontario, Manitoba, Saskatchewan, Alberta and British Columbia amounts in 1915 to 1,208,700 acres, as compared with 973,300 acres in 1914, and the total estimated yield to 33,987,800 bushels, as compared with 20,837,000 bushels in 1914, an increase in total yield of 63 per cent. In area harvested, in average yield per acre and in total yield the fall wheat harvest of 1915 is therefore expected to be the largest on record. In Ontario the total estimated yield is 27,030,000 bushels from 172,000 acres, an average of 27.86 bushels per acre, and in Alberta, the other large fall wheat province, the total yield is 6,225,000 bushels from 215,500 acres, an average of 28.88 bushels per acre. The estimated yield of hay and clover in 1915 is 10,549,500 tons from 7,875,000 acres, as compared with 9,206,000 tons from 7,997,000 acres in 1914, the average yield per acre being 1.34 tons, as compared with 1.15 tons in 1914. Alfalfa shows a total yield of 154,765 tons from 92,665 acres, as compared with 129,750 tons from 90,385 acres in 1914; the average yield per acre is 1.71 tons, as compared with 1.44 tons.

Condition of Spring-Sown Crops.—Spring-sown grain crops continue to show an excellent average condition, all being for Canada above 90 per cent. of the standard representing a full crop. Beans, buckwheat and flax are 88 per cent. of the standard; potatoes and turnips are above 90, and the remaining crops are as follows: Corn 82, mangolds 89, hay and clover 91, alfalfa 87, sugar beets 89, and pasture 91. Converted into a standard wherein 100 represents the average yield per acre of the seven years 1908 to 1914, the condition of the principal grain crops at July 31, 1915, is as follows: Fall wheat 120, spring wheat 112, all wheat 113, rye and barley 111, oats 108, flax 107. That is to say, the yields per acre of these crops, according to their appearance on July 31, are expected to be above the average yields of the previous seven years to the extent of 20 per cent. for fall wheat, 12 per cent. for spring wheat, 13 per cent. for all wheat, 11 per cent. for rye and barley, 8 per cent. for oats and 7 per cent. for flax.

The Ancient Greek.

No greater gift could be made to our modern world than the rediscovery of the Greek physical supremacy. The secret of the method by which, for one brief period, they realized perfection was lost since [illegible]; no one knows how. At present so little do we understand the principles of training which guided the Greek in the arena, in the battle and in the dance, and so little the proportions of his figure different from ours of to-day, that Greek sculpture is in reality a puzzle to us. Certain postures fixed by the Greek sculptor seem to us contortions, bordering on physical impossibilities. There is always a terrific controversy over the restoration of Greek sculpture, and even when the arms and heads and legs we supply never look right.—New York Times.

Prize List Correction

A mistake was made in printing the prize list for the Flower Show which will be held on Friday evening. No. 15 read, "Collection of Annuals in pots, three varieties." This should have read "Collection of Annuals." Exhibitors are asked to take note and govern themselves accordingly.

Nearly a Crash.

Confused by the presence of a buggy between them on the road, the autos driven by Messrs W.J. Hyde and Hank Irwin almost ran into eachother head-on while passing on Queen St. South, on Saturday. It was the instantaneous decision of Hank to take the ditch that averted a collision that would have meant a fatality in all probability as Mr. Hyde had his wife and a couple of others in the car with him. Mr. Irwin's car went to the fence in front of Mr. J. B. Fleming's residence, doing no more serious damage than uprooting a shade tree and bending a panel on the fence.—Paisley Advocate.

Won W.F.A. Championship.

In the final game for the W. F. A. championship played in Listowel on Friday, the Mildmay football team surprised their most ardent admirers by defeating Listowel and carrying off the championship by a two goal margin, scoring four while the home team notched but two. Armond Whitehead was the star in the Mildmay lineup, scoring two goals. This win by Mildmay gives them the championship of Ontario. The champions are:—Goal C. Wendt, backs, W Berry, W. Diebel; half backs, G. Weber, G. Taylor, F. Schmidt, forwards, A. Whitehead, G. Schefter, C. Patton, H Godfrey and W. Schnurr.

Lost the Trophy.

After finding a resting place here for over two weeks, the Bowman Trophy has been won from the local bowlers, a rink of Paisley kitty tossers having captured the coveted silver dish after a closely contested game on Thursday evening. In the afternoon a rink of Arthur bowlers attempted to lift the trophy but failed to do so, Klein's rink defeating them by sixteen shots. The rinks were:

WALKERTON	ARTHUR
McConnell	Howson
Hunter	Brocklebank
Pye	Brocklebank
Klein (sk) 26	Keatus (sk)10

The next challengers being Paisley, a game was arranged for the evening, and the visitors emerged victorious by the close margin of two shots after a closely contested twenty-two end game. The rinks:

WALKERTON	PAISLEY
Reed	Muir
Eidt	Ray
Rourke	Shoemaker
Sieveright 19	Allen 21

The War Situation

The situation along the battlelines in France, Belgium, Russia and the Dardenelles, from the standpoint of view of the Allies, has considerably improved in the past two weeks and is now brighter than it has been for three months.

The main event of recent date was the declaration of war against Turkey by Italy on Monday and the immediate action of the Italian Government in sending troops to the assistance of the British and French at the Dardenelles, following out a campaign arranged in July.

The greatest naval battle of the war took place in the Gulf of Riga on Sunday when the German fleet attempted to force an entrance and were met by the Russian squadron with British submarines co-operating, and were forced to retire with heavy loss. A British submarine torpedoed and sank the Moltke, Germany's largest battle cruiser, and besides this three cruisers and ten smaller vessels were destroyed. Three German transports were captured and the troops they had landed on Russian territory were either killed or taken prisoners.

In the north, although the Russians are still retreating they are retiring very slowly and are said to be preparing for a final stand.

Latest despatches from the Dardenelles, report great gains for the British and it is declared that the victory is near at hand.

The French and British in the north of France are now on the offensive and several decisive victories are reported.

"A new big peace scheme" is being developed in Berlin, it was reported on Tuesday. The scheme will be disclosed to the world within a fortnight, if the German plans do not miscarry.

The Bowling Tournament

The final arrangements are being made this week for the Walkerton Bowling Tournament which will be held on Labor Day, Sept. 6th and following days. The officers of the club are confident that this year's event will be the most successful in the history of the club, and are preparing for a record crowd. Twelve greens have been put into shape and excellent prizes are being offered for the winners and runners-up in the three competitions. The Daughters of the Empire are taking charge of the refreshment tent.

Bilingual School Question Settled.

It is asserted on good authority that the Ontario bilingual school question is on the eve of settlement as a result of important conference held last week at which the Ontario Government, the new Seperate School Commission and and French and Irish elements were represented. The basis of agreement is thought to be the pratical abandonment by Ontario Government of the famous regulation seventeen which has been the cause of so much controversy, since it was promulgated some five years ago.

Cancels Tour.

According to Mr. J. B. Roberts organizer for the Speakers' Patriotic League, the league has been paying Professor F. W. Reidorf's a German by birth but a naturalized Canadian, to deliver patriotic addresses and arouse the patriotism of Canadians. Complaints in regard to Professor Reithdorf's nationality have been received and the professor has decided to cancel his engagements and return to Toronto. He is at present staying in Muskoka.

MANY THOUSAND MEN REQUIRED

Thousands of Men will be required from Ontario to help in the great work of harvesting the Western crop, and practically the entire task of transporting this great army of Harvesters to the West will fall to the lot of the Canadian Pacific Railway.

Excursions from points in Ontario to Manitoba, Saskatchewan and Alberta will be run, and special trains operated, making the trip in about thirty-six hours and avoiding any change of cars or transfers.

Drunk and Disorderly

John McCosh, an umbrella repairer who struck town on Saturday was gathered in by Chief Ferguson on a charge of being drunk and disorderly. He was remanded until Monday afternoon and on appearing before Magistrate Tolton was given his liberty, providing he shake the dust of the town from his feet in one hour which he apparently did This procedure of the magistrate is a commendable one, for as this gent had no money. it relieved the county of giving him free board for a month, which would have been the case had a fine been imposed upon him.

Odd Fellows Attend Funeral

A number of members of the Walkerton lodge of Odd Fellows attended the funeral in Hanover on Sunday afternoon of Charles Hunziger a young man who formerly was employed in that town. The deceased met death at Penetanguishene on Thursday last when he fell from the top of a water-tank which he was assisting to build. In the drop of one hundred feet, he broke five telephone wires and plunged through a scaffold, almost every bone in his body being broken. The unfortunate young man was only 25 years of age and was married but three months ago to Miss Krueger of Hanover. The funeral was the largest seen in Hanover for many months.

Lost Valuable Horse

Mrs. Thick's address can be secured at this office by anyone who wishes to call or who desires to send it to a friend in England.

Patriotic Celebration, Monday

Don't forget the patriotic celebration on the afternoon of Labor Day at the exhibition grounds, under the auspices of the Knechtel Furniture Company's employees. The program includes lacrosse match, baseball match, races and patriotic addresses by R. E. Truax, M. P., W. D. Cargill, M.P.P. Senator J. J. Donnely and others. The proceeds will be devoted to the purchase of a machine gun for the Canadian Army. Refreshments will be sold on the grounds. Admission Adults, 15c, Children 10.

Flour Drops, Why Not Bread?

When the price of flour was raised last winter, the local bakers almost in twenty-four hours raised the price of bread, but although the price of flour, has recently dropped, almost two dollars per barrel, the advanced price of bread remains. While flour was at the high price the bakers were entitled to a higher price for their bread, but now that the decrease has came, after the harvest. the consumer and particularly the working man is entitled to a square deal which means that he should be able once more to purchase the five-cent loaf.

Won at Owen Sound

The Walkerton Baseball team journeyed to Owen Sound on Tuesday to play the first game in the semi-final series and practically cinched the series by defeating their opponents right on their own diamond by a 5 to 4 score. The game was hotly contested throughout. Walkerton scored one run in the first innings and Owen Sound four in the second, which ended the scoring until the eighth when Walkerton notched two and in one of their favorite ninth innings rallies, with two men down, McCartney knocked out a three-bagger, bringing in two men and winning the game. The final game of the series will be played at the exhibition grounds on Saturday afternoon and will doubtless be the game of the season as the Owen Sound boys are coming here determined to overcome the lead against them.

Broke into Car.

An umbrella repairer giving his name as William Reilly who blew into town Saturday was caught in the act of breaking into a caboose at the local C. P. R. yards that evening by Mr. Polly the car inspector and was later arrested by Chief Ferguson. He was remanded until Tuesday for trial and was then sent up by Magistrate Tolton the nominal charge of trespass being changed to that of attempted burglary. Prior to his arrest the prisoner in soliciting work claimed to have been in the British army fighting in France and to bear out his assertion, would present a likeness of himself in uniform with two sons whom he claimed were still in the trenches. This game evidently brought him a good deal of work for he managed to buy quite a jag with the money he made. He knew, better, however, than to attempt the returned soldier game at the police court and was as mum as a clam in that respect. He is the first man to work that game on the public and is just a forerunner of many to come when the war is over, for then there will be scores of faker's with the sob story working the easy marks for a living. Reilly appeared before Judge Gregg on Wednesday morning and on electing to be tried by the Judge, was remanded to gaol until today for trial. He will be given a hearing at 10 o'clock this morning.

BORN

IRWIN—At the Bruce County Hospital Walkerton, on Wednesday, September 1st, to Mr. and Mrs. Robt Irwin, a son.

CARD OF THANKS

Mr. Everett Truax desires to express his sincere thanks to his friends and neighbors for their many kindnesses shown him during the illness and demise of his wife, who died on Thursday July 29th. He also desires specially to thank his fellow employees of the R. Truax & Son's factory and others for their kindly assistance.

Messrs Dr. Fred Robertson of Vancouver, Eric of Milton, Dr. Harry of Richmond, Va., and Miss Ruth Robertson also of Richmond spent Saturday, Sunday and Monday with their parents, Mr. and Mrs Norman Robertson. The family reunion was arranged for the purpose of bidding farewell to Mr. Eric Robertson who is training in the aviation Corps and who will be called to the front in the near future.

Attended Wedding

Among those who attended the Thompson-Clarke nuptials on Tuesday were—Mr. and Mrs. Rattle and Mr. and Mrs. Weiler and son of Guelph, Mr. and Mrs. C. V. Haydon and Miss Clarke of Wingham. Capt E.R. Clarke of Tobermory, Miss Roland of Toronto, Mr. George Clarke of Toronto, and Mr. James Clarke of Galt.

Celebration at Formosa

A large number of Walkertonians attended the patriotic picnic in Formosa on Tuesday, which was held to celebrate the turning on of the electricity on the new power line, which was but recently completed. During the evening addresses were delivered by Mr. R. E. Truax, M P, Jno Purvis, Senator Donnelly, W. D. Cargill M. P. P., Jno Rowland and several other prominent men. A baseball match was also played between Teeswater and Formosa the game resulting in a win for the home team by a close score.

Thompson—Clarke

Two of Walkerton's well-known and popular young people were united in the holy bonds of matrimony at high noon on Tuesday, in the persons of Mr. Wm. Thompson, of the office staff of the Walkerton Electric Light & Power Company and Miss Martha Clark, daughter of Mrs. Forbes Clark. The ceremony was performed at the home of the bride's mother by Rev. Thos. Wilson of Knox church, The bride and groom were unattended. The bride was attired in a wedding dress of white embroidered net over brocaded satin and carried a boquet of cream roses and maiden hair fern. After the ceremony the wedding party and guests who were the immediate relatives of the contracting parties, only, partook of a sumptuous wedding dinner, The newly married couple left on the afternoon G.T R. train on a trip to Toronto, Hamilton, and Niagara, the bride being attired in a travelling suit of navy serge. The bride was the recipient of many beautiful and costly presents which attest the popularity of both Mr. and Mrs. Thompson. On their return from their wedding trip they will take up their residence in the flat recently occupied by Dr. Reed, above Pinsky's store.

Should Join the "Nutt" Brigade

In an article last week which was published in the Herald and Times, our contemporary had several criticisms of the Telescope scribe to make and no doubt thought that he had struck a heavy blow when he said that "we would look better with a gun on our shoulder than going about the province to bowling tournaments." In regard to bowling tournaments the matter is scarcely worth paying heed to, but we have attended two this season, and to one were accompanied by a junior brother of the Herald-Times man, and therefore if going to tournaments is a sin, he has sinners nearer home. As is the case with all his articles, the dirty streak in the Times man shows through when he attempts to raise the question of shouldering a gun. The recruiting question is a decidedly personal one and in his jibe in this respect, Artie has struck us below the belt and taken us at a disadvantage. for we are prohibited by law from discussing it in a public journal. However we thank the Herald and Times man for saying that we would make a good soldier, and we regret that we cannot return the compliment, for such is the case, for like others we are aware that mentally deficient creatures are not accepted to the ranks of the Canadian or any other army. The only chance to become a soldier which Artie has, is to be number 18, of Company 23 of the "Nutt" Brigade which patrols the asylum grounds at Hamilton bringing down imaginary Zeppelins with pea-shooters.

Starting Cash System

As we intend to start the cash system. after the 1st. Sept, we ask all those indebted to us to kindly call and settle their accounts before that date. —McCarter Harness Co.

Knox Church

Rev. Thos. and Mrs Wilson and child returned on Tuesday from Hamilton Beach where they have spent the past few weeks and Mr. Wilson will resume his duties as Pastor of Knox Church on Sunday.

Old Veteran Dead

The second death within a week at the House of Refuge occurred on Tuesday when Peter Reilly an aged veteran of the Crimean war, who has been an inmate of the institution for some time passed away. The funeral was held from the R. C. church on Wednesday morning.

Brought to Hospital

The nine-year old son of Mr. Jos. Stroeder of Greenock was brought to the hospital this week in a precarious condition. The young lad had the misfortune to fall out of the mow in his father's barn about two weeks ago and was badly injured, It is reported that there is little hope for his recovery.

Bob Likes Game of War.

Pte. Bob Rowland, son of Mr. and Mrs. John Rowland of Walkerton, who left Niagara some time ago and is now in the trenches in France has taken a liking to the game of war, and expressed his view to a friend thus "This is a great game, has football beaten a mile.

Paid Dollar and Costs

The youth who got boisterous on the streets on Monday evening of last week, following the Teeswater-Walkerton baseball match, appeared in the court on Friday to answer to the charge of being drunk and disorderly. He was found guilty and assessed the usual one dollar and costs.

Charges Are Groundless.

A rumor has been in circulation recently to the effect that Indian listers have been securing booze at the Savoy Cafe. Mr. Seales, the proprietor however, emphatically denies this and challenges anyone to prove the accusation that he has been guilty of illicit selling. His premises, he states, are open for the inspection of License Inspector White or Chief Ferguson at any time.

Merchant—Scanlon

On Wednesday, August 25th., in the Formosa R. C. church, was solemnized the marriage of Lenora C. Scanlon, daughter of Mr. John Scanlon of Brant to Mr. Albert W. Merchant of Cargill, Rev. Father Brohman officiating. The bride, who was attended by her cousin Miss Annie Scanlon, was becomingly attired in a dress of cream satin with pearl trimming and carried a boquet of bridal roses. The groom was assisted by Mr John Graf of Chepstow. After the ceremony, a large number of neighbors and friends repaired to the home of the bride's parents, "Beaver Glen" where a wedding dinner was served. In the evening a supper and reception was given at which a large number of guests were present from Pinkerton, Cargill, Walkerton and Formosa. The bride received many useful and valuable presents.

Special Session of County Council

The Warden has called a special meeting of the Bruce County Council to be held in Walkerton on Thursday of next week, September 9th. The purpose of the meeting is to consider the proposed additional grant for patriotic purposes. It was at first proposed to purchase a number of machine guns for the Canadian overseas forces, but the local committee has received a communication from the Acting Minister of Militia stating that the response to the call for these guns has been so generous that there has been sufficient funds received to purchase all that can be manufactured within a reasonable time. It is therefore necessary to divert the contribution into other channels. A meeting of the recently appointed Patriotic Committee was held in the council chamber on Friday evening to deal with the situation and it was decided to urge the County Council to make a grant or grants to the Patriotic Fund, a fund for the benefit of the disabled Canadian soldiers and the Red Cross Fund. Although the County has already made a grant to the Patriotic Fund, of this Fund there is distributed throughout Canada, monthly, the sum of $350,000.00, so it will be seen that the money already subscribed for this purpose will soon be expended. In Bruce County about $500 is paid each month to the wives and children of the sons of Bruce who are fighting the battles of the Empire, and the Patriotic Fund is considered to be worthy of a second grant. The Committee has been in communication with all the municipalities in the county and all of the councils agreed that another grant should be made by the county. Thus the members of the County Council should feel that they have the sanction of the people in this matter and It is hoped that they will see fit to make a large grant so that in the future it cannot be said that Bruce is not doing her share.

Jocelin's Penance

"Jocelin de Brakelonde, lady, and the Abbot commands that I bring back thy answer ere to-morrow's sunrise."

"Truly, ere sunrise, Brother Jocelin. 'Tis far to go alone and a darksome way by evening. Yea, I now bethink me. Each forest hath its John Scarlet and Robin Hood these days, and by my Christendom, an unarmed monk would little avail against such sturdy robbers."

"Alas, madam, methinks they would not care for the rough serge of a monk's robe, and I have naught else, for poverty is the vow of the Benedictine; yet though I wear no mail, and carry no sword, I fear not. God protects His own—they need no steel."

This doctrine was new to Rohese; reared among men whose sole aim in life was war; who learned early the motto "Mine honor and mine good sword," and she rather cavilled at such sentiments, though she could but admire the uplifted look with which Jocelin voiced his faith.

"Yet sunset or sunrise, Brother Jocelin," she said, "thou must have food and rest; so let us offer thee fair water for thy toilet, and a cup of wine and pasty for thy stomach's sake; whilst I read the will of the Abbot, and write me an answer to it. Nay, look not so wonderful that I should say 'write,' for I am not the only woman in the realm who can both read and write, and perhaps construe their bit of Latin, too."

"By my troth," she murmured to her maids, as Jocelin followed Gilbert O'Dice from the bower, "but these Abbey lubbers are but green goslings—but half men; and yet I would not dub ye dolts by saying he was half made."

"Set away the 'broidery frame, girls, and leave me; save thou, Mary; bring parchment and inkhorn." Rohese arose, and, moving to a desk near the row of windows which lighted the bower, sat there turning over in her hand the letter sealed with the oval seal, bearing the imprint of a steed (the Abbot's insignia), and tied with a purple cord; her thoughts strayed to the monk and his strange behavior, and she murmured, "Now, Pardie! I wonder what his meaning is?"

"Perhaps if thou wouldst open it, madam, thou wouldst know," Mary said, smartly, as she placed the ink and parchment on the desk.

"Tut, thou art pert; get thee gone to thy mates, and see that thy tongue prove not the unruly member." The girl gone, Rohese broke the seal and read, in the Abbot's crabbed script:

"Greeting to Rohese, Lady de Cokefield: As thou art the daughter of my chief Milite, and of my cousin, the Lady of Framlingham, it behooves me, now that thou art at marriageable age, to give thee in marriage as befitteth thy rank and station. Because thou art ward of our Abbey, I would that ye come to me that I might know thy will concerning the wedding. Jocelin of Brakelond, who bears this missive, will convey thy answer. So I bid thee set a time to visit me at Bradfield house. Our Lady's benison on thee.

"Samson, Abbas."

Rohese's face was scarlet ere she had finished, and when she had done she flung the letter from her, and stamping her foot with rage, cried, "Zounds! And am I to be parcelled off to some lout, who shall govern my people and rule my castle? Shall any Pope-holy Abbot put man into the bed or at the board where Henry of Leicester should have been? O, my love! And had not some cursed infidel's spear laid thy proud crest low, I should have been a happy wife, the proudest lady in the realm, whereas, now I am the dolourest maid in all Christendom. Parentless and husbandless," and laying her head on her arms, she sobbed bitterly.

Then she dashed the tears from her face. "Yet, let me think. How says the Abbot?" taking up the discarded letter, "Thy mother's cousin. Aye, I have oft heard old nurse tell of the rude Norman baron who, for love of my mother, his cousin, sought the cloister. Surely, then, if this be he, he will not force a hateful marriage on me when he knows how my poor heart is widowed. I'll to him, and tell him all my mind. Yet, Abbot though he be, let him beware if he cross me; the De Cokefeld will bends not." Rohese blew a silver whistle, suspended from her neck, and a page appeared. "Mordred, send Mary hither, and tell the monk when he has finished his repast I'll speak with him i' the hallum. 'Tis after the mid hour and the rain is past, is it not so?"

"Aye, my lady."

Mary returned, rather sulky after her mistress' reproof, but her face soon lost its pout in her delight at the news.

"Mary, we go to the Abbey on the morrow; our lord, the Abbot, hath invited me to visit him at Bradfield house. See to it that our apparel is ready, and that Gilbert prepare fit escort."

"Wilt thou take sad colored robes, madam?"

"Nay, wench; the gay 'broidered ones, as thou lovest me; the Abbot is a man, girl, an' I've a favor to ask of him."

Mary smiled appreciatively, and hurried away upon her errands. Rohese drew her cloak about her, and passed through the arched doorway which led from the tower into the hallum. The rain was over, the air was damply sweet, and the noon sun shone warm and bright on the steaming walk. By the keep wall some asters were flaunting their purple sprays in the sunshine, all rain-bejeweled. Jocelin, advancing up the walk, thought she was as beautiful as an angel, as she stood outlined by the gray stones, the jewels of her headdress not more sparkling than her eyes; her robe, as she stooped to pluck a flower, moulded to her exquisite figure. She raised herself as he came near.

"Ah, Brother Jocelin, is this not a day to warm thy monkish blood? Dame Nature hath finished her family wash and hung it out to dry in the sunshine."

"In truth, Lady, it sendeth forth a fragrant steam. But pardie! why mock at me for being a monk? I am a man, no less." A resentful note quivered in his voice, and Rohese saw that her careless jibe had pricked him.

"Nay," she said, kindly, "I meant no harm; many a lord of the church hath led his men to victory. 'Tis said that thy Abbot, Samson, fought with my father on the field of Flemmings."

"Aye, madam, so he did. But brute force and fighting valor are not all that is desirable in a man. Wisdom, learning, gentleness, to my mind, are more to be desired than fame in joust or journey. It will not be many years, Lady Rohese, till every man of quality shall be learned in our lore, and no one shall be called 'gentleman' who hath not this knowledge."

"Poor monk," she thought. "He prates of what he knows not," and resenting Jocelin's superior air, she said rather haughtily, "we have been trained in different schools, sir. 'Dieu et mon droit' is, to my mind, the only fit motto for a gentleman. Yet, 'God and my book' may serve thy turn as well. But a truce to these cross-questionings; my lord the abbot, commands my presence at Bradfield house, and I will go to-morrow."

"I will bear thy message, madam," said Jocelin, bowing coldly, for she had vexed and wounded him by her open contempt.

"Yet stay, Brother Jocelin," she called, as he moved slowly toward the donjon entrance, reproaching herself for her lack of courtesy, and wishing to make amends. He turned, and she came up to him somewhat hurriedly, her cheeks flushed by her generous impulse.

"Forgive me if I were rude, and go not from De Cokefeld to-night. The way is long and darkness will o'ertake thee. I fear for thy safety in the forest. Delay for the morrow, and ride with me to the Abbey." And she put out her hand and touched him on the arm. Jocelin was young, in love, the hand of the woman he loved lay lily white on his sleeve, sending a thrill through his veins. He looked deep into her eyes, with a smile like a caress on his delicate red lips; then he broke the first rule of his order—"Obedience."

"Lady I will not go to-day. Do as thou wilt with me," and he hurried from the hallum.

"Grammercy," murmured Rohese, gazing after him half smiling. "'tis the strangest monk I ever saw; yet methinks he is a man after all."

CHAPTER VIII

The morning dawned bright and clear and Jocelin awoke upon a soft couch, as different from his own straw pallaise as his thoughts and feelings differ from those of yesterday. Through his chamber window there came a great hullaballoo from the courtyard: a neighing of horses, barking of hounds, and the seneschal's shrill voice calling out orders. Within the castle all was bustle and preparation. Tittering maids paused in their skurry by his doorway to greet some saucy page on his way to unleash the dogs.

"There is like comparison to be made of the life of monk and knight," he muttered bitterly, as he donned his robe and sandals; "one all bareness, coldness and desuetude, the other all light, life and action, crowned by fame and love. Love! Beshrew me! What hath a monk to do with love? He has taken the church to spouse, and 'tis a deadly sin for him to adulterate his conjugal thoughts. Yesterday me-thought I knew what love meant: a calm, sweet regard, strong in affection and admiration; such an emotion as one feels for parents, or the abbot. But now, wretched wight that I am, love hath slit me unawares; too late hath he opened my blinded eyes and vouchsafed to me a dazzling vision of his joys. Tantalus' feast spread to mock my unable heart. Love, life's fire with hope, fear, joy, sorrow, pleasure and pain, its components, hath wrapped me in longing and desire, and I—I am so weak that for a woman's smile I cast aside my good respect; break my vows and turn to a chitty-faced coward who trembles and dares not look his Lord in the face for fear his traitorousness will beam from his eyes, and announce, 'Here is a monk forsworn, a renegade.' How say the Scriptures? 'Whosoever hath looked upon a woman—' Aye, I am forsworn. This woman hath bewitched me. It is sorcery.

'O care me Jesu
Nunc libera me!'

And Jocelin fell upon his knees to tell his rosary. But as the beads slipped through his fingers he seemed again to feel the slight, warm pressure of Rohese's hand; and with every "Ave" came the tones of her voice, or the tinkling of her coldly sweet laughter. The monk was betrayed by the natural man within him; and as he arose from his fruitless endeavor to pray, and passed from his chamber, he realized with shame and delight that his heart beat faster, his pulse throbbed quicker, his eyes shone brighter, and his whole being seemed reanimated, enlarged, made stronger, more ready to do and dare, by this mysterious baptism of "Heavenly fire which men have called love."

When Jocelin had broken his fast in the great hall, he went out into the courtyard, where the retinue was already assembling, impatient to be gone; the dogs straining at their leashes, baying their delight at the prospect of a long scamper over hills and downs. Raoul, his gorgeous dress half covered by a cloak of green and gold brocade, a feathered cap on his head, was on his horse with a hawk upon his wrist; and Mordred, the page, behind him on a pillion, holding his harp carefully wrapped in a samite covering. Gilbert O'Dice was mounting a gentle old mule, grunting and groaning as he drew his furred cloak about his old limbs.

"Good morrow, Brother Jocelin," he said; "Zounds, but the air nips keenly, it benumbs the limbs."

"Nay, old shrew, not if there be blood in them," interposed Nicholas, the Master of Horse, from among his twenty odd horsemen, who sat mounted with lances at rest, while behind them were half a score of foot soldiers, armed, some with bows, and some with guisarmes; all grinned at this sally, for Gilbert O'Dice was no favorite in the household.

"Yea," said Raoul, in his clear, boyish treble, "we all well know that Master Gilbert hath sawdust for blood, and dull Sheffield whittles in place of bones." This had reference to the fact that Gilbert presided at the retainers' table, cutting the meat. The Seneschal moved uneasily in his saddle, and looked wrathfully from one tormentor to the other; but reinforcement now appeared in the person of Mistress Mary, who came forth from the keep, bustling and rosy, in blue kirtle and hood, bewitching the hearts of all beholders.

"At least, varlet," she said sharply to Raoul, as she superintended the strapping of a huge bundle upon a sumpter mule, "at least, Master Gilbert hath not two left legs and Judas-colored hair, as have some jack puddings we ken of."

This thrust went straight home, for Raoul was slightly lame and possessed that red hair accredited to the betrayer of our Lord. So the discomfited young minstrel sat biting his lip, with tears of rage and mortification in his eyes, while loud guffaws resounded through the courtyard at this sally, and Mistress Mary, well pleased with her retort, went forward with smiling face to greet her mistress, who just then emerged from the doorway of the castle, wrapped in a pelisse of rabbit skin over a red gown of richly brocaded satin. Rohese went up to her palfrey, which stood near by neighing with joy at sight of his lady. She laid her jeweled embroidered glove lovingly upon his mane, and declining the proffered aid of Master Nicholas, turned a dazzling glance on Jocelin, who stood staring, awkward, not knowing what was expected of him.

"Mary's eyes!" exclaimed the impatient beauty, frowning haughtily. "Art, flesh and blood that thou standest there dumb and still as a stone? I tell thee, Sir Monk, belted earls have sued for such a privilege."

"Gosling," whispered Mary, giving him a dig in the side with her rounded little elbow, "lift her to the saddle." Jocelin, with blazing face, lifted the soft, fragrant burden in his arms with a contrite murmur, "I did not know, Madam," and as for one blissful moment its sensuous sweetness brushed his breast, he felt that heaven could give no greater joy. Rohese, in the saddle, relented when she saw his face, and dimpling with smiles, extended her hand graciously.

"Well-a-day, of course thou did'st not know, thou cell-bred fellow. I forgot me thou hast never been to court, nor learned aught of chivalry. Mount, Brother Jocelyn, and ride beside me." Jocelin, with a pang of humiliation at the lowliness of his steed, mounted his mouse-colored jennet; and Mary being swung up with right good will behind Master Nicholas, with a small protesting squeak against the pressure that burly squire brought to bear upon her waist, the train moved through the portcullis and down the path leading to the ancient Roman roadway, which wound through Suffolk, close by De Cokefeld castle, and led almost direct to St. Edmundsbury. At its head rode Rohese and Jocelin, followed by Gilbert, Nicholas and Raoul. On either side the horsemen trotted, the foot soldiers bringing up the rear with several pages, who often brake away from the cavalcade into the coppice to join their hounds' exciting chase after some skurrying hare, and Raoul, too, sometimes lagged behind to fly his hawk when prey was sighted.

The autumn sunlight fell athwart the roadway as they passed, glowing upon the motley hues of their dress, and gleaming upon gold, silver and steel, until silhouetted against the dark woodland, the gay company moved like some bright pageant illumined by a master hand upon a russet background. As they rode, Jocelin had much to do to keep his jennet by Rohese's side, but she kindly restrained her palfrey; and falling behind the others, they moved slowly, deeply engaged in conversation. While ever and anon Mistress Mary, from her pillion behind Nicholas, looked backward with many an arch smile and nod at her lady, as if to say, "On to it, Madam; make him curse the day he took monkly vows." But to do Rohese justice, she did not think of conquest, and whatever coquetry she displayed toward Jocelin was but the inherent preening and speaking all creatures of her sex naturally fall into, in the presence of the male of their species; and if her voice took on a softer tone, and her blushes came and went under the ardent glances of her companion, she was conscious of no desire to attract or enthrall one whom she could consider neither eligible nor desirable either as suitor or admirer; indeed, she felt for the young monk a kindly condescension one feels towards a child, mingled with a touch of reverence for his calling.

Thus their intercourse was dangerously sweet, for Rohese, throwing aside the hauteur of a dowered lady, and the jibes of a maid familiar with the extravagances of chivalry, fell into a simple, joyous mood, as seductive as it was insignificant. And poor Jocelin, while marveling at her wit and evident knowledge of things he knew not the existence of, could but thrill at her warm tones and friendly glances, and fall more in love than ever.

St. Edmunds was but a day's journey from De Cokefeld castle, and the cavalcade, after a short noon rest, pressed briskly onward, until at sunset they wound down the chain of chalk hills which surround St. Edmunds; past several granges, skirting the village wall; and the forest behind the Abbey. As they passed beneath the prison tower, Rohese asked:

"What is yon grim turret?"

"The Abbey prison, Madam," Jocelin answered, and as the two rode by, its shadow lay across them in the fast gathering twilight. Rohese shivered.

"Doth its shadow not strike a chill to thy marrow?" she cried, urging her horse forward as she spoke.

"Yea, Madam, it would, were thou not beside me. Cold and darkness cannot abide where thou art."

CHAPTER IX.

The afterglow shone golden through the laced branches of the forest, and within the Abbey walls a bell rang, mellowed by the distance. The monk and maid rode on in silence. Behind them, the cavalcade indulged in interchange of speech and song, but Mistress Mary leaned on Nicholas' broad shoulder fast asleep, and he, for fear of losing so pretty a burden, spoke not to his companion, the Seneschal; who jogged on, numbed, cold and drowsy with his long ride in the keen air.

The glow of the sunset faded; shadows gathered about their pathway, faint stars shone in the gray-blue of the sky; and a hush seemed resting over all the world, as if each creature had sought its nest, its den, or home; and lay there close curled, or sat there by the cheery hearth fire basking in its domestic love and its homely joys. This thought was in Jocelin's mind as they rode so close in the narrow, dusky lane, as he watched the graceful, swaying figure beside him.

UNUSED R. R. TICKETS

A matter of importance to the public and the railways has been settled by the Government. A nice point has been raised as to the possibility of refund of the war tax in case a person should change his or her mind in regard to the contemplated trip by train or boat. If the railways insisted upon the tax in such cases of changed intention, it was altogether likely that the public would set them down as extortioners.

Accordingly the railways submitted the questions to the Government—what should be done in case unused tickets presented for refund to agent before the train starts; to agent or general office after train departs; the same or some following day; in the case of passenger tickets; in the case of sleeping car tickets; in the case of parlor car tickets; in the case of steamship tickets. The answer which the railways received was as follows:

There can be no refund of the tax under any circumstances. Once the ticket is sold and the tax collected, it is as though it were in the Dominion coffers and nothing but an act of Parliament can get it out again. It was explained by the Dominion authorities that in order to prevent the confusion that would arise in applying literally the millions of tax stamps that would have been required on railway tickets, and the consequent difficulties that would have ensued owing to delay in affixing and cancellation of stamps, the present method has been adopted, and, that as none of the public would have reasonably expected a refund of a stamp that had been affixed and cancelled, if ticket were refunded upon, so also no refund may be expected wherever a tax has been collected, and the ticket used and refunded upon. In other words, the act of purchase of the ticket in accordance with the Tax Act is a completed transaction so far as the collection is concerned, and under no circumstances as the law now stands could it be refunded. To make a refund of the tax possible a special act would have to be passed by parliament.

Noyon Cathedral.

Noyon, in France, held peculiar attractions for Robert Louis Stevenson because of its cathedral, where he heard the "Miserere" sung one summer afternoon. Of the place itself he wrote: "It is but a stack of brown roofs at the best, where, I believe, people live very reputably in a quiet way, but the shadow of the church falls upon it when the sun is low, and the five bells are heard in all quarters telling that the organ has begun. If ever I join the church of Rome I shall stipulate to be bishop of Noyon on the Oise."—Pall Mall Gazette.

Ruffles.

Some are fluffy.
And some are flat.
They are wide or narrow.
They are straight or circular.
They are selvedge, fringed or bound.
They are scalloped, battlemented or Van Dycked.
They are set on a foundation or each cord often joins them.
Though they appear on headgear and parasols they riot on skirts.

Heated Bearings.

Sometimes when a bearing becomes heated and requires oil it will be found that the oil will not flow down in the oil hole. Either the hole is clogged with dirt or the heat may cause the air to rise and prevent the oil from entering. Where a wire cannot be used effectively the following remedy, although it is not infallible, is almost sure to make the oil reach the bearing.

Fill the hole with oil and quickly place the thumb over it to prevent the air from escaping, and if the oil cup does not leak the heated air inside will rise above the oil, and in two or three minutes it will be forced into the bearing, even if it has to pass considerable dirt.

When a bearing cannot be reached in this way, and when light oils, such as kerosene, are ineffective, try placing a little money in the oil hole and allow it to remain a few minutes, then use oil.—World's Advance.

The Lands of Yesterday.

If one could only find the way
Into the land of yesterday!

How I would thrust the miles aside,
Rush up the quiet lane and then,
Just when her roses laughed in pride,
Find her among the flowers again.
I'd slip in silently and wait
Until she saw me by the gate.
And then * * * read through a blur of tears
Quick pardon for the selfish years.

This time, this time, I would not wait
For that brief wire that said: "Too late."
If I could only find the way
Into the land of yesterday.

I wonder if her roses yet
Lift up their heads and laugh with pride,
And if her phlox and mignonette
Have heart to blossom by their side.
I wonder if the dear old lane
Still chirps with robins after rain,
And if the birds and banded bees
Still rob her early cherry trees * *

I wonder if I went there now
How everything would seem, and how
But no, not now, there is no way
Back to the land of yesterday.

Unnecessary Alarm.

When Frederick the Great, at the beginning of the Seven Years' War, was in possession of Dresden, he went to view the works of art in the royal picture gallery. The gallery director, Reidel, took the king through all the rooms and explained each picture as they went along. Frederick expressed his unreserved admiration for all the pictures, but when he came before a certain painting by Corregio he stopped, viewing it with particular interest.

"If you are willing," he said, suddenly, "I should like to have that picture—"

Reidel gasped, for he expected the king to say that he wished the picture for himself. But the king noticed his anxiety, and striking him on the shoulder, said, laughing:

"If you are willing I should like to have that picture copied!"—Youth's Companion.

BAD EGGS AND STAGE.

Pelting Unpopular Performers is a Very Ancient Custom.

The practice of hurling bad eggs at actors who displeased them has been in vogue with audiences ever since there has been a stage and a dramatic production. Chinese, Greeks and Romans ran to this sort of unfragrant criticism, and two stories told by a collector of odd things connected with the theatre are worth repeating.

A number of New York rowdies in the fifties threw a number of bad eggs at a pallid and trembling performer. He advanced to the edge of the stage, commanded silence and said:

"Noble sirs, deign to throw me but one good one—just one. I care not if it break over me, I shall manage it. I have eaten naught in two days. Pelt me with good eggs, I beseech you."

A man went to Shakespeare's theatre in the day of the great bard to throw bad eggs at an actor he disliked. Some one jostled him unduly, and he punched the jostler. The jostler whipped him, however, and finally sat him down in the bad eggs, which broke. So the would-be egg thrower was thrown out because of the odor and called a bad egg in the bargain.—New York Sun.

Crack of Bullet.

That bullets neither whine, hiss, howl, hum nor whisper, novelists to the contrary notwithstanding, is information given by Edward C. Crossman in Outing. With one possible exception—when at certain conditions of open country modern military bullets [illegible] to those standing back of the firing line—nothing is audible except a sharp crash of air closing around the bullet's base when it travels at high speed. At a velocity of 1,500 feet a second or more, the noise is "like nothing so much as a loud and very violently cracked blacksnake whip." Those who stand far enough from the rifle hear the bullet's crack and later the dull, thudding noise of the rifle itself, which has been outspeeded. Jack London makes a soldier hit at 600 yard range first hear the sound of the modern rifle and then feel the blow of the bullet. But the bullet would have killed him half a second before the sound from the rifle reached him.

Literary Controversies.

Famous controversies over the authorship of poems include the following: "Laugh and the World Laughs With You," claimed by four or five different authors, is now credited to Ella Wheeler Wilcox. Her chief opponent was John A. Joyce.

"Rock Me to Sleep" was claimed by two different authors.

John J. Ingalls, the great Kansas statesman and writer, had his authorship of "Opportunity" disputed many times.

Walt Whitman and Mary Mapes Dodge had a stirring dispute about a little poem, "The Two Mysteries."

The authorship of Shakespeare's plays has been ascribed to Francis Bacon (Lord Verulam), Christopher Marlowe, Sir Walter Raleigh and other contemporaries.—St. Louis Republic.

A Pound of Cure.

"My son," said the family man, "is anxious to become a pugilist. I'm doing my best to prevent him."

"Let him go ahead," said the friend of the family, "and have some one pound him. You'll find a pound of cure worth more than an ounce of prevention."—Philadelphia Record.

THURSDAY, SEPT. 2, 1915.

KEEPS IT DARK.

Had Sir Robert Borden come boldly out at the beginning of the war and declared, as did Premier Asquith, that there would be no election while the war lasted, this country would have given its undivided attention to the successful carrying on of the war. But he did not do this. Even after Boards of Trade, city and county councils and many other public bodies had petitioned him against holding an election, he gave no sign, no promise, that one would not be held. Instead his lieutenant, the Hon. Robert Rogers, insisted that the people were clamoring for an election, and ought to have one. To show what was in the Premier's mind he forced Parliament to pass an Act giving the soldiers at the front a vote, and the ballots are now either in Britain or France ready to be handed out to the men on voting day. Yet we are told that Sir Robert is not thinking of an election, and that it is only the Liberals who are nominating candidates, and preparing for battle. Of course this is all non-sense. Most of the Tory candidates have already been nominated, and in Hamilton the Tories have already organized in anticipation of an election and are ready whenever the word is given. All this time the country has been kept on the anxious seat. Sir Robert will soon return home, and it is to be hoped that he will feel it to be his duty to give the people some kind of an assurance.

Under the circumstances the Liberals cannot be blamed for making some preparation for fight and for warning the people to be on their guard against whatever move the Government may make. The Liberals are more anxious to fight the Germans than to fight the Tories, but if they should foolishly force a contest the Liberals will be prepared to meet them. They have no fear of the consequences either.

EDITORIAL NOTES

The Kaiser's conspiracy in the United States is another reminder to the people there that the Germans are their enemy also.

A Government that bought thirty-year-old horses for the soldiers to ride upon when they go to war should beware of the khaki election.

The Vancouver Sun suggests that Sir Robert Borden and Sir Wilfrid Laurier together tour the country in a recruiting campaign. Sir Wilfrid is willing.

The United States would be wise to overlook any little infringement on her rights, caused by the British blockade. The U. S. will be a winner should Britain win.

Instead of Germany starving Britain by her submarine blockade, in the seven months that have elapsed since the submarine got busy, her imports have increased over the corresponding period in the previous year by $850,000,000.

Twenty-seven million persons in Britain registered under the registration act, and the Government is now in possession of complete data concerning practically all the inhabitants. It is said that this registration gave a boom to recruiting.

The N.Y. Sun publishes a letter from a Philadelphian, who suggests that "in order to solve the question of creating a large British credit in this country; if England would consent to sell a portion of Canada to our Government, say the three western provinces, a very large credit could soon be arranged." This man must think that this is the Philippines.

The Pittsburg Gazette-Times notes that the battle-ship that brought over the $2,000,000 gold dollars was protected by cruisers, torpedo destroyers, etc., asks "Why don't the British take equal precautions for the protection of human life when there is no gold aboard?" Winston Churchill has already answered that question. They haven't enough ships.

Americans returning from London, we are told, agree that hosts of Britons require some shock to arouse them from their apathy. The thousands of youths to be seen enjoying themselves in public places apparently are not shirkers in the sense of being afflicted with cold feet. Rather they give the impression of not being able to grasp the magnitude of the struggle in which their nation is engaged. The censor is blamed for this state of affairs.

The Chicago Tribune, discussing the lynching of Leo M. Frank, says that "The south is backward. It shames the United States by illiteracy and incompetence, its hill men and poor whites, its millions of feared and bullied blacks, its ignorant and violent politicians, its rotten industrial conditions and its rotten social ideas (also) in circumstances which disgrace the United States in the thought of Americans, and in the opinion of foreigners." This may be true, but we would hate to say so.

The Buffalo Express says that if the States were to declare war with Germany they could

Sever diplomatic intercourse;
Send their fleet to the Irish coast;
Make immediate provision to raise an army and to enlarge their fleet;
Seize the German shipping in U. S. ports;
Stop all trade with Germany.

This, of course, would solve all the problems now existing between Britain and the States as to contraband or orders in Council. The U. S. fleet could also be used in keeping open the trade routes. But this is getting ahead of events.

We are living less luxuriously than we did before the war. The imports of carriages, automobiles, etc., were over eleven millions less for the twelve months last recorded than they were for the preceding twelve months, the totals being $7,420,000, as compared with $18,560,000. Importations of silks fell off by two millions; of tobacco by over a million; of precious stones by $1,[illegible],000; of watches by $600,000; of books, periodicals, etc., by over a million; of electric apparatus by three millions; of fancy goods by $1,800,000; of furs by $1,300,000; of trains by $2,[illegible].

Russia will be better served with railways after the war is over. The Maryland Steel Company has just received an order for 100,000 tons of steel rails. Russia has already bought largely of rails and rolling stock in the States. The report that Russia has contracted for [illegible] shells, at an aggregate cost of about $2[illegible],000,000, is confirmed by the statement of the president of a company that has got a part of the work, which has been divided up among at least five concerns, one of which is the Baldwin Locomotive Company. That does not look as if Russia was preparing for peace.

The British War Inventions Committee has been completed, with Lord Fisher as President. It will comprise (a) a central committee; (b) a panel of consultants composed of scientific experts who will advise the main committee on questions referred to them. The central committee will consist of Lord Fisher of Kilverston, G. C. B., O. M. president; Sir J. J. Thomson, O. M., F. R. S., Hon. Sir C. A. Parsons, K. C. B., F. R. S., G. T. Beilby, Esq., F. R. S. The consulting panel will comprise the following list, which will be added to from time to time as necessary: Prof. H. B. Baker, F. R. S., Prof. W. G. Bragg, F.R.S., Prof. H. C. H. Carpenter, Sir William Crookes, O.M., F. R.S., W. Duddell, Esq., F.R.S., Prof. Percy Frankland, F.R.S., Prof. Bertram Hopkinson, F.R.S., Sir Oliver Lodge, F.R.S., Prof. W. J. Pope, F.R.S., Sir Ernest Rutherford, F.R.S., G. Gerald Stoney, Esq., F.R.S., Prof. the Hon. R. J. Strutt, F.R.S.

The Tories are playing their old game of criticizing Sir Wilfrid Laurier in Quebec for being too British, and pillorying him in Ontario on the charge of being disloyal. Sir Wilfrid is making some notable recruiting speeches, and newspapers, like the Toronto Telegram, instead of giving credit for the same, are knocking him on general principles. It's a rascally piece of business, and has compelled the Ottawa Citizen, which is not a supporter of the Liberal leader, to protest. It says:

"But at least there is no leading statesman in the public life of Canada to-day more loyal than Sir Wilfrid Laurier to the British tradition of freedom. The ignoble political game of crushing him between the millstones of nationalism in Quebec and Jingoism in Ontario would not be tolerated for long if the Canadian people understood it. There should be an end of it. Hon. P. E. Blondin might do something to end it by making a recruiting tour through the provinces."

Blondin is the Tory who wanted to [illegible] in the British flag.

Many Troubles Arise From Wrong Action Of The Liver.

Unless the liver is working properly you may look forward to a great many troubles arising such as biliousness, constipation, heartburn, the rising and souring of food which leaves a nasty taste in the mouth, sick headache, jaundice, etc.

Mr. Howard Newcomb, Pleasant Harbor, N.S., writes: "I have had sick headache, been bilious, and have had pains after eating and was also troubled with a bad taste in my mouth every morning. I used four vials of your Milburn's Laxa-Liver Pills, and they cured me. The best praise I can give is not enough for them."

Milburn's Laxa-Liver Pills are 25c. per vial, 5 vials for $1.00; at all dealers or mailed direct on receipt of price by The T. Milburn Co., Limited, Toronto, Ont.

Could Not Bend Down On Account of Backache.

Mr. J. A. Lubiniecki, Dauphin, Man., writes: "It is my pleasure to write you in regard to Doan's Kidney Pills which I have been using for some time for kidney trouble, which used to affect my back so that at times I could not bend down, nor could I walk straight. I learned about your pills from your Almanac, and I bless the happy hour I thought of buying this medicine. One time a druggist persuaded me to buy —— s Kidney Pills, saying they were just as good, in fact he guaranteed they were. I yielded to his advice, and what was the result? I had bearing down pains in my back for two days, so I took the balance of the pills unused to the druggist, and told him to give me Doan's Kidney Pills as they would stop the pain in 12 hours at the outside. He told me he was sorry I did not use more of the pills, and lengthen the time to await results. I told him there is no need of waiting with Doan's Pills, they go right to the spot. No substitute for me."

Doan's Kidney Pills are 50c a box, 3 boxes for $1.25 at all dealers or mailed direct on receipt of price by The T. Milburn Co., Limited, Toronto, Ont.

When ordering direct specify "Doan's"

THE Changeling

Thus was that matter decided, and while not many miles away Maggie was watching hopelessly for the coming of Arthur Carrollton, he, with George Douglas, was devising the best means for finding her, George generously offering to assist in the search, and suggesting finally that he should himself go to New York City, while Mr. Carrollton explored Boston and its vicinity. It seemed quite probable that Margaret would seek some of the large cities, as in her letter she had said she could earn her livelihood by teaching music; and quite hopeful of success, the young men parted, Mr. Carrollton going immediately to Boston, while Mr. Douglas, after a day or two, started for New York, whither, as the reader will remember, he had gone at the time of Henry's last visit in Worcester.

Here for a time we leave them, Hagar raving mad, Madam Conway in strong hysterics, Theo wishing herself anywhere but at Hillsdale, Mrs. Jeffrey ditto, George Douglas threading the crowded streets of the noisy city, and Mr. Carrollton in Boston, growing paler and sadder as day after day passed by, bringing him no trace of the lost one. Here, I say, we leave them, while in another chapter we follow the footsteps of her for whom this search was made.

CHAPTER XXIII.

From the seaside to the mountains, from the mountains to Saratoga, from Saratoga to Montreal, from Montreal to the Thousand Isles, and thence they scarce knew where, the travelers wended their way, stopping not long at any place for Margaret was ever seeking change. Greatly had she been admired, her pale, beautiful face attracting attention at once; but from all flattery she turned away, saying to Henry and Rose, "Let us go on."

So, onward still onward they went, pausing longest at Montreal, for it was there Arthur Carrollton had been, there a part of his possessions lay, and there Margaret willingly lingered, even after her companions wished to be gone.

"He may be here again," she said; and so she waited and watched, scanning eagerly the passers-by, and noticing each new face as it appeared at the table of the hotel where they were staying. But the one she waited for never came, "and even if he does," she thought, "he will not come for me."

So she signified her willingness to depart, and early one bright July morning, she left, while the singing birds, from the treetops, the summer air from the Canada hills, and, more than all, a warning voice within her bade her "Tarry yet a little, stay till the sun was set," for far out in the country and many miles away a train was thundering on. It would reach the city at nightfall, and among its jaded passengers was a worn and weary man, Hopeless, almost aimless now, he would come, and why he came he scarcely knew. "She would not be there so far from home," he was sure of that, but he was coming for the sake of what he hoped and feared, when last he trod those streets. Listlessly he entered the same hotel, from whose windows for five long days a fair young face had looked for him. Listlessly he registered his name, then carelessly turned the leaves backward—backward—backward till, the only one remained between his hand and the page bearing date five days before. He paused and was about to move away, when a sudden breeze from the open window turned the remaining leaf, and his eye caught the name, not of Maggie Miller, but of "Henry Warner, lady, and sister."

Thus it stood, and thus he repeated it to himself, dwelling upon the last word sister, as if to him it had another meaning. He had heard from Madam Conway that neither Henry Warner nor Rose had a sister, but she might be mistaken; probably she was, and dismissing the subject from his mind, he walked away. Still the names kept haunting him, and thinking at last that if Mr. Warner were now in Montreal he would like to see him, he returned to the office, asking the clerk if the occupants of Nos. — were there still.

"Left this morning for the Falls," was the laconic answer, and without knowing why he should particularly wish to do so, Mr. Carrollton resolved to follow them.

He would as soon be at the Falls as at Montreal, he thought. Accordingly he left the next morning for Niagara, taking the shortest route by river and lake, and arriving there on the evening of the second day after his departure from the city. But nowhere could a trace be found of Henry Warner, and determining now to wait until he came, Mr. Carrollton took rooms at the International, where after a day or two, worn out with travel, excitement and hope deferred, he became severely indisposed, and took to his bed, forgetting entirely both Henry Warner and his sister, whose name he had seen upon the hotel register. Thoughts of Maggie Miller, however, were constantly in his mind, and whether waking or sleeping he always saw her face, sometimes radiant with healthful beauty, as when he first beheld her, and again pale, troubled and sad, as when he saw her last.

"Oh, shall I ever find her?" he would sometimes say, as in the dim twilight he lay listening to the noisy hum which came up from the public room below.

And once, as he lay there thus, he dreamed, and in his dreams there came through the open window a clear, silvery voice, breathing the loved name of Maggie. Again he heard it on the stairs, then little tripping feet went past his door, followed by a slow, languid tread, and with a nervous start the sick man awoke. The day had been cloudy and dark, but the rain was over now, and the room was full of sunshine—sunshine dancing on the walls, sunshine glimmering on the floor, sunshine everywhere. Insensibly, too, there stole over Mr. Carrollton's sense a feeling of quiet, of rest, and he slept ere long again, dreaming this time that Margaret was there.

Yes, Margaret was there. There, beneath the same roof which sheltered him, and the same sunshine which filled his room with light had bathed her white brow, as leaning from her window she listened to the roar of the falling water. They had lingered on their way, stopping at the Thousand Islands, for Margaret would have it so; but they had come at last, and the tripping footsteps in the hall, the silvery voice upon the stairs, was that of the golden-haired Rose, who watched over Margaret with all a sister's love and a mother's care. The frequent jokes of the fun-loving Henry, too, were not without their good effects, and Margaret was better now than she had been for many weeks.

"I can rest here," she said, and a faint color came to her cheeks, making her look more like herself than she had done before since that night of sorrow in the woods.

And so three days went by, and Mr. Carrollton, on his weary bed, dreamed not that the slender form, which sometimes through his half-closed door cast a shadow in his room, was that of her for whom he sought. The tripping footsteps, too, went often by, and a merry, childish voice, which reminded him of Maggie, rang through the spacious halls, until at last the sick man came to listen for that party as they passed. They were a merry party, he thought, a very merry party, and he pictured to himself her of the ringing voice; she was dark eyed, he said, with braids of shining hair, and when, as they were passing once, he asked of his attendant if it were not as he had fancied, he felt a pang of disappointment at the answer, which was: "The girl the young gentleman hears so much has yellow curls and dark blue eyes."

"She is not like Maggie, then," he sighed, and when again he heard that voice a part of its music was gone. Still it cheered his solitude, and he listened for it again, just as he had done before.

Once, when he knew they were going out, he went to the window to see them, but the large straw flats and close carriage revealed no secret, and disappointed he turned away.

"It is useless to stay here longer," he said; "I must be about my work. I am able to leave and I will go to-morrow. But first I will visit the Falls once more. I may never see them again."

Accordingly, next morning after Margaret and Rose had left the house he came down the stairs, sprang into an open carriage, and was driven to Goat Island, which, until his illness had been his favorite resort.

Beneath the tall forest trees which grow upon the island there is a rustic seat. Just on the brink of the river it stands, and the carriage road winds by. It is a comparatively retired spot, looking out upon the foaming water rushing so madly on. Here the weary often rest; here lovers sometimes come to be alone; and here Maggie Miller sat on that summer morning, living over again the past, which to her had been so bright, and musing sadly of the future, which would bring her she knew not what.

She had struggled to overcome her pride, nor deemed it longer a disgrace that she was not a Conway. Of Hagar, too, she often thought, pitying the poor old half-crazed woman who for her sake had borne so much. But not of her was she thinking now. Hagar was shriveled and bent, and old, while the image present in Margaret's mind was handsome, erect and young, like the gentleman riding by—the man whose carriage wheels, grinding into the gravelly road, attracted no attention. Too intent was she upon a shadow to heed aught else around, and she leaned against a tree, nor turned her head aside, as Arthur Carrollton went by!

A little farther on, and out of Maggie's sight, a fairy figure was seated upon the grass; the hat was thrown aside, and her curls fell back from her upturned face as she spoke to Henry Warner. But the sentence was unfinished, for the carriage appeared in view, and with woman's quick perception, Rose exclaims: "'Tis surely Arthur Carrollton!"

Starting to her feet, she sprang involuntarily forward to meet him, casting a rapid glance around for Margaret. He observed the movement, and knew that somewhere in the world he had seen that face before—those golden curls—those deep blue eyes—that childish form—they were not wholly unfamiliar. Who was she, and why did she advance toward him?

"Rose," said Henry, who would call her back, "Rose!" and looking toward the speaker, Mr. Carrollton knew at once that Henry Warner and his bride were standing there before him.

In a moment he had joined them, and though he knew that Henry Warner had once loved Maggie Miller, he spoke of her without reserve, saying to Rose, when she asked if he were there for pleasure: "I am looking for Maggie Miller. A strange discovery has been made of late, and Margaret has left us."

"She is here—here with us," cried Rose; and in the exuberance of her joy, she was darting away, when Henry held her back until further explanations were made.

This did not occupy them long, for sitting down again upon the bank, Rose briefly told him all she knew; and when with eager joy he asked "Where is she now?" she pointed toward the spot, and then with Henry walked away, for she knew that it was not for her to witness that glad meeting.

The river rolls on with its heaving swell, and the white foam is tossed toward the shore, while the soft summer air still bears on its wing the sound of the cataract's roar. But Margaret sees it not, hears it not. There is a spell upon her now—a halo of joy—and she only knows that a strong arm is around her, and a voice is in her ear, whispering that the bosom on which her weary head is pillowed shall be her resting-place forever.

It had come to her suddenly, sitting there thus—the footfall upon the sand had not been heard, the shadow upon the grass had not been seen, and his presence had not been felt, till, bending low, Mr. Carrollton said aloud "My Maggie!"

Then indeed she started up, and turned to see who it was that thus so much like him had called her name. She saw who it was, and looking in his face, she knew she was not hated and, with a moaning cry [illegible] forward to the arms extended to receive her.

* * * *

Four guests, instead of one, went forth that afternoon from the International — four guests homeward bound, and eager to be there. No more journeying now for happiness; no more searching for the lost; for both are found; both are there—happiness and Maggie Miller.

CHAPTER XXIV.

Impatient, restless and cross, Madam Conway lay in Margaret's room, scolding Theo, and chiding Mrs. Jeffrey, both of whom, though trying their utmost to suit her, managed unfortunately to do always just what she wished them not to do. Mrs. Jeffrey's hands were usually too cold, while Theo's were too hot. Mrs. Jeffrey made the head of the bed too high; Theo altogether too low. In short, neither of them ever did what Margaret would have done had she been there, and so day after day the lady complained, growing more and more irritable, until at last Theo began to talk seriously of following Margaret's example and running away herself, at least as far as Worcester; but the distressed Mrs. Jeffrey, terrified at the thoughts of being left there alone, begged of her to stay a little longer, offering the comforting assurance that "it could not be so bad always, for Madam Conway would either get better or something."

So Theo stayed, enduring with a martyr's patience the caprices of her grandmother, who kept the whole household in a constant state of excitement, and who at last began to blame George Douglas entirely as being the only one in fault. "He didn't half look," she said, "and she doubted whether he knew enough to keep from losing himself in New York. It was the most foolish thing Arthur Carrollton had ever done, hiring George Douglas to search!"

"Hiring him, grandma!" cried Theo. "George offered his services for nothing," and the tears came to her eyes at this injustice done to her husband.

But Madam Conway persisted in being unreasonable, and matters grew gradually worse until the day when Margaret was found at the Falls. On that morning Madam Conway determined upon riding—"fresh air would do her good," she said, "and they had kept her in a hot chamber long enough."

Accordingly, the carriage was brought out, and Madam Conway carefully lifted in; but ere fifty rods were passed the coachman was ordered to drive back, as "she could not endure the jolt—she had told them she couldn't all the time," and her eye turned reprovingly on poor Theo, sitting silently in the opposite corner.

"The Lord help me, if she isn't coming back so soon," sighed Mrs. Jeffrey as she saw the carriage returning, and went to meet the invalid, who had "taken her death cold," just as she knew she should, when they insisted upon her going out.

That day was far worse than any which had preceded it. It was probably her last, Madam Conway said, and numerous were the charges she gave to Theo concerning Margaret should she ever be found. The house, the farm, the furniture, the plate, were all to be hers, while to Theo was given the lady's wardrobe, saving such articles as Margaret might choose for herself, and if she never were found, the house and farm were to be Mr. Carrollton's. This was to much for Theo, who resolved to go home on the morrow at all hazards, and she has commenced making preparations for leaving, when to her great joy her husband came, and in recounting to him her trials she forgot in a measure how unhappy she had been. George Douglas was vastly amused at what he heard and resolved to experiment a little with the lady, who was so weak as to notice him only with a slight nod when he first entered the room. He saw at a glance that nothing in particular was the matter, and when toward night she lay panting for breath, with her eyes half closed, he approached her and said: "Madam, in case you die——"

"In case I die," she whispered, indignantly, "It doesn't admit of a doubt. My feet are as cold as icicles now."

"Certainly," he said. "I beg your pardon; of course you'll die."

The lady turned away rather defiantly for a dying woman, and George continued: "What I mean to say is this. If Margaret is never found, you wish the house to be Mr. Carrollton's?"

"Yes, everything, my wardrobe and all," came from beneath the bedclothes, and George proceeded: "Mr. Carrollton cannot of course take the house to England, and as he will need a trusty servant, would you object greatly if my father and mother should come here to live? They'd like it, I ——"

The sentence was unfinished. The bunches in the throat, which for hours had prevented the sick woman from speaking, disappeared; Madam Conway found her voice, and, starting up, screamed out: "That abominable woman and heathenish girl in this house, in my house! I'll live forever first!" and her round, bright eyes flashed forth their indignation.

"I thought the mention of mother would revive her," said George aside to Theo, who, convulsed with laughter, had hidden herself behind the window curtain.

Mr. Douglas was right, for not again that afternoon did Madam Conway speak of dying, though she kept her bed until nightfall, when an incident occurred which brought her at once to her feet, making her forget that she had ever been otherwise than well.

In her cottage by the mine, old Hagar had raved and sung and wept, talking much of Margaret, but never telling whither she had gone. Latterly, however, she had grown more calm, talking far less than heretofore, and sleeping a great portion of the day, so that the servant who attended her became neglectful, leaving her many hours alone, while she, at the stone house, passed her time more agreeably than at the lonesome hut. On the afternoon of which we write she was, as usual, at the house, and though the sun went down, she did not hasten back, for her patient, she said, was sure to sleep, and even if she woke she did not need much care.

Meanwhile old Hagar slumbered on. It was a deep, refreshing sleep, and when at last she did awake her reason was in a measure restored and she remembered everything distinctly up to the time of Margaret's last visit, when she said she was going away. And Margaret had gone away, she was sure of that, for she remembered Arthur Carrollton stood once within that room and besought of her to tell if she knew aught of Maggie's destination. She did know, but she had not told, and perhaps they had not found her yet. Raising herself in bed, she called aloud to the servant, but there came no answer; and for an hour or more she waited impatiently, growing each moment more and more excited.

SUNDAY SCHOOL LESSON

Lesson X. Sept. 5, 1915.

Elijah and the Prophets of Baal.—1 Kings 18: 16-40.

Commentary.—I. Elijah meets Ahab (vs. 16-20). The time came when the Lord would put an end to the drought which had brought great distress to Israel. Ahab and his servant Obadiah had started out in different directions in search of pasturage to save the flocks and herds from starvation. Elijah met Obadiah on the way and announced that he would meet Ahab. Obadiah knew that the king had sought for the prophet and feared that, if he told Ahab where he was, he would disappear and still further elude his search. Elijah assured Obadiah that he would meet Ahab, and Obadiah told the king, who at once went to meet the prophet. Upon meeting him he accused Elijah of bringing the drought and the accompanying distresses upon Israel. The prophet boldly told the king that his sins and those of his father's house had brought the trouble on the nation. Elijah immediately became the master of the situation and told Ahab to summon the prophets of Baal and those of Asherah, the female deity corresponding to Baal, to Mount Carmel, and Ahab gathered the prophets there. The place of meeting was on the eastern part of Mount Carmel, from which point the Mediterranean Sea can be seen to the west, and the beautiful plain of Esdraelon to the east. Jezreel, Ahab's capital, was in plain sight, as also the scene of several of Israel's historic battles.

II. A test proposed (vs. 21-24). Not only had the prophets assembled at Mount Carmel, but also the people came. Elijah called upon the people to cease halting, or limping and staggering about between the worship of Jehovah and that of Baal. It was to be definitely determined which was the true God. He was the only representative of the true religion, and the prophets of Baal were many, but he proposed the test of an answer by fire to show the people the truth. No one but an Elijah could put forth such a challenge, and he did it in the fear of the Lord and in faith in him. The people could only declare the test to be a fair one. The followers of Baal claimed much for the power of their deity. He was the sun-god, and consequently was in touch with the powerful agency, fire; hence he would be expected to respond to Elijah's challenge and send fire to consume the sacrifice.

III. Baal proved powerless (vs. 25-29). Elijah called upon the prophets to choose their bullock for a sacrifice and prepare it, and then call upon their gods for an answer by fire. He thought best to caution them to put no fire under the sacrifice, for he doubtless knew the trickery to which the followers of false gods sometimes resorted. He gave them the first chance to show what their deity, Baal, the sun-god, could do. There was no lack of earnestness on the part of the worshippers of Baal. They called loudly, and exercised themselves violently in the hope that fire might fall to consume the sacrifice. There is a tradition that a man was concealed under the altar that he might kindle the fire at the proper time, but he was smothered before he lighted it. This is only a tradition and cannot be depended on. With all the frantic efforts of the Baal worshippers no fire fell. Elijah held them up to ridicule in the taunts which he hurled at them and this spurred them on to cry more loudly and to leap more frantically. They even cut their flesh with knives until the blood flowed. They tried from morning until the time of the evening sacrifice, or 3 o'clock, to get an answer, but their efforts were all in vain. Elijah was certain that this would be the outcome, but the priests of Baal had exerted themselves to the utmost with the hope that he would apply fire to their sacrifice. They had occupied nearly the entire day. They had called upon their god with loud voices. They had inflicted pain upon themselves. There was nothing more that they could do. They had signally failed. It was deeply humiliating to them to acknowledge that Baal was either unstable or unwilling to do what they most earnestly desired. Their only hope, after his failure to answer, was that Elijah's efforts would be equally unsuccessful. It would then appear that the God whom Elijah served was no more powerful than was Baal!

IV. The answer by fire (vs. 30-39). 30. Come near—There was a calmness in the prophet's manner that was in strange contrast to the frenzy of the Baal-worshippers. The people were invited to witness all that was to be done. Repaired the altar—Not the altar of Baal but an altar of Jehovah that had been used long before this time. 31. Twelve stones—It is noticeable that Elijah recognized Israel, not as two kingdoms, but as composed of twelve tribes. See Gen. 35. Israel shall be thy name—Israel means "prince of God," and was the name given to Jacob at Peniel (Gen. 32. 28). 32. In the name of the Lord—This expression characterizes all of Elijah's acts. It was for the honor of Jehovah that the people and the priests were called together at Carmel. A trench—To catch the water that was to be poured upon the sacrifice. Two measures—The measure was the "seah," containing from one and one half to three gallons. Some think the depth of the trench was as great as the height of the two-seah measure. 33. Put the wood in order, etc.—Thus far the preparations made were similar to those of the priests of Baal. Fill four barrels—The water-jars such as were used for carrying water and containing from three to five gallons each. Pour it. There must be no occasion to say that there was fire hidden somewhere about the altar. False religions have resorted to deception to establish their claims to supernatural power, but it must be made clear that there is no trickery here. 34. Third time—Twelve jars were used, "corresponding to the twelve stones of the altar, and for the same symbolic reason."—Edersheim. 35. Filled the trench—Divine power was to be displayed in a remarkable way. To explain the source of the supply of water during the drought, Tristram says, "Close by the place of sacrifice, shaded by a noble old tree, is a large, natural cistern of sweet water, which the people say is never exhausted." The river Kishon flows by the base of the mountain and water might have been procured from there if the fountain or cistern was empty. It is reasonable to suppose that water had been carried to the place of sacrifice before Elijah was ready to use it. 36. Came near—In calm and trustful boldness. Lord God of Abraham, Isaac, or Israel. Elijah's address to God was made so complete that no one could doubt to whom he was appealing. Let it be known—The prophet wished two things made clear; first, that there was a God in Israel, and second, that he was God's servant. 37. Hear me, O Lord—Elijah's outburst to God finds most pronounced expression in the words of this brief prayer. The answer was not delayed. Turned their heart back again. His great desire was that the people should turn from idolatry to God. 38. The fire of the Lord fell—There was no mistaking its direction nor its power. It came from above and burned downward, commencing with the sacrifice and ending with the water in the trench. 39. Fell on their faces—They were not only convinced that it was the work of God, but fell down before him in an act of worship. The Lord, he is the God—The test had declared the existence and power of Jehovah, and the victory of Elijah over the prophets of Baal were taken down to the river Kishon and slain. This was in accordance with God's law that idolaters were to be put to death. The vindication of Jehovah showed that Baal worship was false-worship, and that the followers of Baal were either deceived or themselves deceivers.

Questions.—To whom was Elijah sent? What was the feeling of the king toward Elijah? Who arranged for the assembly at Mount Carmel. What test was to be made? Who represented the true God, and who represented the false gods? Describe the efforts of the priests of Baal. Describe Elijah's course after the failure of the priests of Baal. Describe the results of Elijah's prayer. What was remarkable about this prayer? What truths does the lesson teach?

PRACTICAL SURVEY.

Topic.—The claims of deity.
I. Revealed the cause of calamity.
II. Demanded the devotion of Israel.
III. Required the overthrow of idolatry.

I. Revealed the cause of calamity. Our lesson takes up the controversy between Ahab and Elijah, as to the cause of the trouble which had come upon Israel. The alternative lay between Jehovah and Baal, and the object of a national gathering was to decide which was to be Israel's God. Elijah insisted upon the distinction which existed between the worship of Baal and the worship of Jehovah. It was not a matter of argument, but of demonstration. The ordeal proposed was peculiarly appropriate and marked a great occasion. Jehovah had often answered by fire. Baal was the heathen god of fire. The test which alone met Israel's need could alone prove Israel's God. The claims of deity must be established in deeds that only God could perform. Elijah would have the decision of the people spring from real convictions, based on sufficient proof. He would end the dishonor of God by the overthrow of idolatry, everywhere visible in Israel. Ahab had not paused to ask what moved Elijah to call for a drought or why his God should send it. Elijah charged Ahab with the ruin of his country. He charged him with complicity in the sin of Jeroboam, which had plunged the chosen nation into deepest degradation. With a clear insight Elijah touched the secret of the nation's sorrow. The root of the menacing evil, the desolating misfortune, lay in the broken altar.

II. Demanded the devotion of Israel. Elijah stood alone, undaunted, a witness for Jehovah appealing to the multitudes to cease their unworthy hesitation between unreconcilable services. Israel's inconsistency lay in an attempt to blend the claims of Jehovah and Baal. In wavering between them, an attempt to accomplish an impossibility, an insult to the authority and character of God. The reconstruction of spiritual life in Israel must begin at the point of its incipient overthrow. The drought and famine had prepared their stubborn hearts for Elijah's appeal and disposed them to consider.

III. Required the overthrow of idolatry. Elijah proved to be the man of the hour. To be zealous, to be a reformer, to seek to restore truth and religion to their former rule, when the alternative was ruin or revival, extirpation or reform, made his task most arduous and important. Nothing less than earnest consecration and strong courage on Elijah's part could have enabled him to endure his task at Mount Carmel. He gave precedence to his opponents at every point. He reduced his own resources to a minimum to show that truth was stronger than error. The people were all the more impressed by the final victory because of the marked inequality of the conflict. The priests of Baal exhibited passionate earnestness, furious, persistent prayer and an agony of entreaty. Full opportunity was given to show the worth of their idolatries and superstitions. When evening came they gave up the contest in despair. Then Elijah called the people to the broken altar, a sad evidence of the wicked zeal of Jezebel and a significant sign of the times. The repair of the altar appeared incidental. It meant to Israel the retracing of their steps of disobedience until they stood at the point of their departure from the precepts of the Lord. Calamity and disaster had come as a result of national departure from the worship of Jehovah. In itself the altar was nothing, but it was the place of sacrifice, the centre of fellowship and the sign of the covenant. Elijah's prayer stood in contrast to the clamor of Baal's priests. It was offered at the time of the evening sacrifice and pleaded for the honor of God and for mercy upon the penitent. When Elijah's faith was expressed in words, there came at once the answer of the living God. The demonstration was irresistible. The conflict with idolatry was settled. The claims of the living God were sustained. Retribution upon Baal's prophets was visited according to the law of God. Their destruction was the removal of temptation from Israel.

Saluting Getting Bore.

"I walked along the Strand yesterday," a Londoner said, "behind an officer in uniform. Between the top of Arundel street and Charing Cross railway station he was saluted, and had to salute 30 times. This sort of thing is going on all over the town, and I have it on the authority of a colonel that it is considered by the commanding ranks as a beastly bore."

"The War Summary"

Almost from the very day the great European war began in August last, the outstanding feature in Canadian journalism covering the conflict has been "The War Summary" daily on pages 1 and 2 of THE GLOBE. In the concisest possible form the writer has given his readers a pen picture of the developments in all parts of the world. While the details of the movements along the extended frontiers have not been overlooked, the readers of THE GLOBE have been enabled to follow intelligently and with confidence the general outlines of the stupendous conflict. "The War Summary" of THE GLOBE is reproduced daily by several papers throughout the Dominion.

The Editorial Page

THE GLOBE on its editorial page has striven to place before the public in proper perspective the broad background of the titanic struggle. This series of articles has attracted the attention not only of the Canadian people, but of leading men and journals in all parts of the world. The causes leading up to the war, the elements entering into its conduct, and the results likely to flow from the cessation of hostilities have been dealt with in that bold and clear-cut form characteristic of THE GLOBE'S editorial page.

News Service

The above features, in addition to a cable and letter service from the front unmatched in Canada, have placed THE GLOBE far in the lead of Canadian papers, and partly explain the phenomenal increase of 33 1-3 per cent. in THE GLOBE'S circulation during recent months.

Other Features

The sporting pages, the financial and commercial pages, the woman's pages, etc., etc., with the additional pages in Wednesday's issue devoted to "Farm and Country Life," are maintained at a high standard of excellence, a standard that has justified THE GLOBE in its title of Canada's National Newspaper, and has given it by many thousands the largest circulation of any morning paper in the Dominion.

Local and City Papers

By all means take your local paper, but in the field of metropolitan newspapers THE GLOBE unquestionably offers you the greatest value to be had in Canada. Order it to-day. 25 cents per month—one dollar for four months—three dollars per year.

P.S.—According to Lord Kitchener, the big war has only begun.

Belgium has published another official book in answer to Germany's charges. Belgium need not worry so much, since Germany's charges invariably answer themselves.

Part of the rope that lynched Leo E. Frank was sold for $1 an inch so Atlanta, Ga. What sort of feelings did the purchasers possess?

A special session of the Bruce County Council has been called to fix the amount to be donated by the county to the purchase of machine guns for the Canadian overseas forces.

The machine gun campaign of the Knechtel Furniture Company's employees is a commendable one and their celebration on Labor Day, to raise money for this purpose should be well attended. Those who cannot attend should buy a tag and thus help the men attain their mark.

Canadian soldiers at the front continue to write cheerful letters, which express confidence in the outcome of the war. These communications breathe the same spirit as is contained in the speeches of French and British statesmen, who are convinced that victory for their side is assured. It is the spirit that helps the fighter to win.

Figures of the voting in Alberta on the Liquor Act, which among other things propose to abolish the bar, show that 95,804 ballots were counted, of which 58,295 were for and 32,509 were against the measure; The majority for the "drys" was 20,786. The vote recorded was a large one, exceeding that cast in the parliamentary contest in 1911 by 26,029. The experiment represented by the act will start with more moral force behind it than is often the case with attempts at sumptuary legislation.

RIGHT WINS IN LONG RUN

The enemies of humanity are nearly always better organized than the friends of humanity. The enemies of humanity, knowing that their cause is bad, use every weapon of tyranny and brute force. We must not be discouraged because they win some temporary victories. Every man and every nation striving for peace and freedom has been defeated and discouraged for a time. The blood of the martyrs is the seed of humanity and civilization. But in the long run humanity and civilization keep on forging ahead

AGAINST BONUSES

The ratepayers of Collingwood have evidently come to the conclusion that it is poor business to grant a bonus to any manufacturing concern if the adverse majority recently given the Bryan Manufacturing Company by-law may be taken as an indication. Coming, as it did after a payment of a heavy tax bill on the Steel and Wire Mill which had been idle for some time and for which the ratepayers voted a loan only about a year ago the ratepayers were in no mood for further venture. The bonusing idea, once so widely practiced, is now far from popular, almost every town and city having one or two and perhaps more white elephant monuments to their folly in this respect. The mad race for industries has come to a halt and the ratepayers have assumed more than ever an attitude of the Missourian in respect to propositions which come before them.

NO TRADE WITH THE YANKEES?

Our ultra loyal, "no truck nor trade with the Yankees" government at Ottawa are sorely tried these days. Not long ago they were fain to borrow $40,000,000 in New York. They still find that exchange is heavy against getting money from London, and grumble greatly because to do so would cost them three per cent or more. But it is all right for Canadian citizens to pay a whole lot more than three per cent more for things that they want because of the defeat of the reasonable reciprocity proposals of the Laurier government. When Sir Robert Borden and his colleagues have to wear the tight boot they squeal. They also go right back on their loudly proclaimed anti-free-trade professions. Sauce for the goose [which is to say the Canadian electorate] does not seem to be sauce for the gander, that is, our Tory Government.

Former Walkertonian Enlists

Pte. "Dutch" Dopfer of the London Camp, now wears a stripe on his right sleeve, having been promoted last week. "Dutch" who is every inch a soldier in his khaki suit, expects to leave for England with a portion of the third expeditionary force in the near future. The Canadians are gradually dribbling over to Shorncliffe Camp, near Dover, and all the men up to date have been landed safely, thanks to England's sea power.—Palmerston Spectator. Pte. Dopfer is a former Walkerton boy and is well known here.

Talking of Raising the Lusitania

Engineers in England are discussing the possibility of raising the Lusitania. She lies at a depth of three hundred to four hundred feet on a bottom which is supposed to be hard enough to have prevented her becoming packed in the mud and grown into the sea's floor. The Lusitania and her cargo are estimated to weigh about 40,000 tons, which is a greater weight than has ever been dragged up from the sea's bottom. The depth at which she lies is perhaps also 100 feet greater than that at which divers have operated successfully but it is suggested that greater power and bigger forces might cope with the heavier weight. While there have been recent improvements in diving paraphernalia, which might make the work possible at such a great depth. It is wondered though, if the cost of the work might not be greater than the value of the salvage.

Denial from the Peninsula.

In reply to an article which recently appeared in the Herald & Times, stating that the Bruce Peninsula was a pool of vice, the Bruce Peninsular News at Lion's Head has the following to say in answer to it and to other statements made by Rev. D. McLennan, Sec'y of the Children's aid Society —"The misleading article, we believe is nothing but a lie, just as Secretary McLennan's epigram "that there is no religion north of the Sauble" is a lie of the Smart-Alec variety. The Bruce Peninsula is that portion of Bruce County lying north of Wiarton, and we venture to say that more "cess-pools of vice" will be found under Mac's very nose than he will find on the Peninsula. If things are so bad here, and so good in Wiarton and south, his duty is here rather than down in the "religious" quarter and no number of foul epigrams will serve as an excuse for not getting his hands dirty in a "moral" campaign. Answer to the following questions might wake him up.—

1. How many hours have you spent on the Bruce Peninsula during the past year?

2. How many prisoners from the Bruce Peninsula are in the Walkerton gaol and how many from the other part of the County?

3. As there may happen to be a prisoner from the Peninsula will you please state how long he had lived here before arrest? He will probably be found to be some of the social flotsam of some other portion of Bruce or Ontario.

Rochon P.Q., Jan. 14th, 1915.

"I suffered for many years with terrible Indigestion and Constipation. I became thin and miserable. I had frequent dizzy spells and became so run down that I never thought I would get well again.

A neighbor advised me to try 'Fruit-a-tives'. I did so and to the surprise of my doctor, I began to improve and he advised me to go on with 'Fruit-a-tives'. I continued this medicine and all my Indigestion and Constipation was relieved. I consider that I owe my life to 'Fruit-a-tives' and I want to say to those who suffer from Indigestion, Constipation or Headaches, try 'Fruit-a-tives'. Give this lovely fruit medicine a fair chance and you will get well the same as I did".

"For God's Sake, Let Me Stay!"

He pleaded with all the intensity his weakened body and soul could muster. His voice trembled. Tears lurked in his strained, anxious eyes. "I have traveled for two days on the train," he said. "I have been turned out of my boarding house. I have been turned out of a hotel in my own town. The local hospital refused me admission. Nobody wants me. For God's sake, doctor, let me stay."

This man had been a railway conductor. He had money to pay for his needs; so he applied to the Muskoka Cottage Sanatorium for treatment of the disease which held his life in its grip—consumption. But those sufferers without money and without friends, what of them? With their hopeless knowledge that people shun them, they believe it futile to seek relief. If their lives are to be spared they must be sought out and supplied with nourishment, medicine, and treatment. To do this costs money. Will you contribute a trifle to help in this effort to save lives? Please act quickly. Winter has brought keen suffering.

Contributions to the Muskoka Free Hospital for Consumptives will be gratefully acknowledged by W. J. Gage, Chairman Executive Committee, 84 Spadina Avenue, or R. Dunbar, Secretary-Treasurer, 347 King Street West, Toronto.

Did it ever occur to you when trying to get someone on the rural line that some people must rent the line by the year and use it by the hour.

As a precaution against having their factory burned by German sympathizers while they are engaged in the shell making business, the Hurter Bridge & Boiler Co at Kincardine, are having electric lights installed around the place and will engage night watch men.

Some newspaper men are terrible liars. In writing of a cyclone out west one of them said it turned a well inside out, a cellar upside down moving a township line, blew the staves out of a whiskey barrel and left nothing but the bung hole, changed the day of the week, blew the mortgage off a farm blew all the cracks out of a fence and knocked the wind out of a politician.

I've licked a dozen stamps for telegrams I've sent, I licked and stuck one on the cheque with which I paid the rent. I licked a stamp to paste upon a note which I renewed, and then I licked one to make the mortgage good. I've licked these stamps to show that I respect my country's will, and now I'd like to lick the men who introduced the bill.

Travers Pardoned

Sometime in June a movement was inaugurated for the release of William R Travers, formerly general manager of the Farmer's Bank. He has served nearly four years of his sentence in Kingston Penitentiary in connection with the failure of the above institution. The immediate cause of his pardon, was the fact that he has three sons on the firing line good patriotic self-denying boys.

Tax Rate 25 Mills.

The Reeve called a meeting of the Council on Monday night and the members were all present. The principal business was striking the tax rate for 1915. The Clerk provided estimates of the amount that would have to be raised and the Council fixed the rate at 25 mills on the dollar. Mr. Wm. Collins was appointed tax collector for 1915. A communication was received from Mr. D. Robertson, of Walkerton, re providing machine guns for the soldiers. The Council considered that the best way to raise the funds for same would be through the County Council and requested the Reeve to urge the Warden to call special meeting of the County Council at an early date so that the matter can be dealt with without delay.—Tara Leader.

War Pictures

Under the authority of the War Office, arrangements have just been completed for taking a complete moving-picture record of events of the war in the British lines, both at the front and along the lines of communication. The leading film producers and exhibitors, it is announced, have been brought into a co-operation scheme, so that no single firm shall have a monopoly of the pictures. The first photographs will be taken in about a week. One complete set of the pictures will be retained by the War Office for historical records and instruction. This set will eventually be placed in the British Museum. The Board of Education is expected to co-operate in a scheme for the use of the films in the public schools.

Child Seriously Injured.

Last Friday afternoon, while playing in the hay mow in company with a number of other children, Gertie, the six year old daughter of Mr. and Mrs. John Schmidt of the Elora road, met with a very serious injury. The children were sliding down the hay mow to the barn floor, and Gertie in her rapid descent was thrown into the hay chute, and went through to the stable. She was rendered unconscious by the terrible fall, and it was thought at first that life was extinct. Dr. Wilson was hurriedly summoned and upon examination found that the little girl has fractured her leg in two places above the knee, but was not otherwise dangerously injured. The fractures were reduced and her wounds dressed, and the child is making satisfactory progress toward recovery. Mildmay Gazette.

Fair Grounds Blaze of Light.

The electrical arrangements for the Canadian Exhibition should prove a pleasant surprise for visitors to the grounds. The handsome Gooderham Fountain has been equiped with colored lights, submerged in the fountain, that will flash and play on the falling waters in a manner that will greatly enchance the beauty of the Grand Plaza. Flags of the Allies in color will be stretched across the roof of the Manufacturer's Building and at night will be brilliantly illuminated. Another new feature will be the strings of colored globes strung about the grounds in all directions, while an artificial moon has been erected north of the grand stand in the outdoor agricultural section. The sphere is eight feet in diameter, contains 1,800 globes and when illuminated the supporting column will be invisible, giving the effect of a huge ball of fire hanging suspended in mid air. The interior of the buildings have been equipped with vacuum or nitrogen lights of high power, and these will add greatly to the brilliance of the indoor illumination. The grounds themselves never looked more beautiful. The floral arrangements are unsurpassed, while the lawns are a deep green and show no indication of the presence there this spring of the thousands of soldiers who were encamped over the winter.

The Western Fair

The Prize List offered this year by the Western Fair Association is the most liberal in its history. In the Live Stock Departments the prizes are exceptionally large. The horse stables have been disinfected very thoroughly under the direction of Dr. Tomblyn, V.S., and everything put in first-class condition. In the cattle barns there will be increased accomodation, as last years tents had to be brought into service. A new sheep barn is being erected where accomodation has been provided for a very large sheep exhibit, as it is felt that the increase in the prize list will bring out all the large flocks. The Poultry Prizes are increased and should bring out all the best birds of Ontario. The prizes for grain and vegetables are also higher this year and there should be a large exhibit in this department. Prize lists entry forms, programs and all information from the Secretary, A. M. Hunt, London, Ontario.

Fatal Accident Near Glamis.

The 13-year-old son of Mr. John McLean lost his life through an accident in the harvest field. On Friday last he was helping his father to haul in and in driving through the field the wagon jolted into a watter furrow, when the front part of the load slid forward, carrying the lad with it on top of the horses. The team ran away and the boy was terribly injured by the wheels passing over him. The doctors found his internal organs very badly torn and bruised. The most scientific and skilful surgical treatment was administered and and the patient rallied so strongly that by the end of the week there was some hope for recovery. Death ensued, however early on Monday morning. The lad was the only son, and the family have the sympathy of all in their bereavement.—Paisley Advocate.

Orillia Brewery out of Business

The Orillia Packet says:—For fifty years, and perhaps a considerably longer period, Orillia, with one brief interval, has had a brewery. By the end of next month, however, it will have none. Mr. Wright's decision to sell out and withdraw from the unequal contest imposed upon him by Local Option is no surprise. One after an other the conditions which marked the era of licenses change and disappear and soon nearly every evidence that either the manufacture or sale of strong drink at one time received legal sanction in this town will have disappeared. If anybody asks "Does prohibition prohibit?" point him to the transformation wrought in Orillia during the brief span which has elapsed since, by an overwhelming vote of the ratepayers, the traffic was put under legal ban. At the end of the next month Mr. T. B. Cramp will take possession of the brewery property, and will begin the work of turning the building into a wholesome retail grocery and provision store. More power to his elbow.

Leaving for England

The important announcement was made on Saturday by Senator Lougheed, acting Minister of Militia, that twelve complete battalions were about to be sent over to England. The battalions selected are those in various divisional areas and military districts whose recruiting was started earliest. Battalions which have been selected from division area one; 33rd, Col Wilson, London; 34th Col. A. J. Oliver, Guelph; divisional area two; 35th Col. McCordick, Toronto, 37th, Col. Bick, North Bay, Sudbury and Sault Ste. Marie; 58th, Col. H. A. Genet, Toronto. The senior battalion in each divisional area and military district has been selected to go to the front. No battalion has been chosen from the 3rd military district, eastern Ontario, because that district has recently furnished the 38th battalion for service in Bermuda. At the present time there are only a sufficient number of men in the district for garrison purposes. The official announcement states that "with a view to providing an uninterrupted supply of reinforcements it has been decided to increase by twelve the number of battalions now serving in England in infantry depots

Fighting in a Hotel

Hotelkeepers in licensed houses often find it a difficult matter to keep order in their own barrooms. It is a difficult matter to restrain men from becoming noisy and quarrelsome in a barroom because when the whiskey is in the wit is out. It has not always been the rule in Elmwood that the proprietor has been in control of his own house for sometimes the man who should be on the alert to put a stop to any disturbance at its inception has been unable to govern himself and, therefore, has no control over others. W. H. Bellinger the new landlord of the Queen's Hotel was in the real estate business before he came to Elmwood. He abhors a barroom brawl and when the O'Brien and McCurdy factions started in to make a bear garden of his hotel he did not take after them with a big stick but proceeded in the regular legal way as per the statutes of Ontario, and laid an information before one of his Majesty's Justices of the Peace, Mr. Montgomery, who issued the necessary papers and Constable Kidd served them on the belligerents and the trial comes up in Chesley tomorrow at 10 a.m. We have no doubt that his worship if he had the power and the accused are guilty, would sentence the trio to go to France or the Dardanelles where they would get enough of the real kind of fighting to last them the balance of their lives.—Chesley Enterprise.

A Columbia Grafonola

will return you dividends of pleasure for a lifetime.

Until Columbia Grafonolas were brought within reach of us all, folks who lived in country towns and rural districts hadn't the same opportunity for hearing good music that city folks have.

But the Columbia Grafonola has changed all that. Now, the Columbia Grafonola will play, perfectly, records of all the music of all the world. You can sit home in your parlor or living room and hear famous opera selections by the greatest of living artists.

You can listen to famous bands—such as Creatore's, Prince's, H. M. Scots Guards and others. You can hear magnificent symphony orchestras—famous violinists like Ysaye and Kathleen Parlow, old English, Irish and Scotch Ballads sung by such artists as David Bispham—or all the up-to-date light song and dance music of the day.

All this the Columbia Grafonola makes possible for you, and at a small cost.

You can buy a superb instrument for $45.00. Others as low as $20.00 or as high as $60.00. One for every taste and every purse and on easy terms.

Come see and hear any Columbia Grafonola play Columbia Records. We will gladly play them for you.

FARMERS!

Why Metallic Roofing and Shingles are not as durable as "Brantford Slates"

Brantford Asphalt Slates

For Houses and Barns

We are making colored and plain Asphalt Slates suitable for roofing any class of building, particularly farmers' buildings.

SPECIAL OFFER We are making a special offer to roof the first house or barn in your locality at about cost price and guarantee it's lifetime for ten years against leakage.

Electricians will tell you that Asphalt, from which Brantford Asphalt Shingles are made, is an excellent insulating material, and does not deteriorate when exposed to the elements, being proof against acid, salt, alkali, rust and corrosion.

Galvanized iron is subject to all these agents of destruction, as well as other enemies, viz., rust and moisture from the inside of the barn, produced by the heating of grain, moisture from cattle, etc. It is also open to attacks from the elements without, and both processes are working toward its ruin at the same time. In other words, condensation is causing the destruction of Metal Roofing and Shingles, while Asphalt Slates retain their wearing qualities indefinitely.

Therefore, Asphalt Slates are, in the end, the cheapest roofing material you can buy, and, as they are now made, the most attractive in appearance, as well as being waterproof and practically fireproof.

LOW PRICES We have succeeded in producing them at about the same price as wood shingles. Let us figure with you at once.

There is no reason why the farmers of our country should put up with leaky roofs when we have acres of material we can supply quickly, at moderate prices.

ROOF-LEAK PAINTS (in Red, Green and Black) This splendid material is especially adapted for old Shingles and Metal and Felt Roofing of all kinds. In fact, any material that will take paint, can be made to last years longer by an application. Put up in large open-mouth cans of 1, 2, 3 and 5 gallons.

OLD COUNTRY NEWS

IRELAND PROSPERS.

The report of the Registrar General of Ireland for 1914 shows that Ireland's decline in population has been arrested and also her prosperity increased if the number of marriages is a criterion. Last year shows a population of 4,381,398 against 4,379,912 the previous year, with the lowest emigration rate since 1851. Marriages gained 23 per cent. over 1913. Improvement is shown in the matter of illiteracy, which is rapidly dying out. The figures of husbands and wives who signed the register instead of making their mark gave 91.6 for husbands and 96.1 for wives.

"As regards illegitimacy, Ireland compares favorably with most countries," says the report. "There were only 3 per cent. of illegitimate births in the whole country, Ulster showing the highest rate of any county at 4 per cent., and Connaught the lowest at .7. The general birth rate shows a slight increase.

A drop of 8 per cent. in the death rate is also noted, "old age" heading the list of causes, with tuberculosis a second. Last year's death rate was 16.2 the thousand.

A PATRIOTIC STREET.

Of all the streets in London the one which the Spirit of Patriotism seems to have chosen for her chief abiding place is Trafalgar street, Walworth.

According to a census published by the South London Press 175 members of Trafalgar street families are serving their King and country or have fallen in the war.

It is quite a short street, running eastwards out of the Walworth road as far as South street, and a great stretch of one side of it is occupied by a London County Council school building. All told, its houses do not number 150, so that on an average each house has furnished its fighting man.

But it is not an opulent residential thoroughfare, and some of its houses accommodate more than one family. Nevertheless, since many of the households include no male members of military age, it may be said that practically every family that could do so has furnished the country with a hero.

WOMEN CLERKS IN THE BANK.

The very sanctum of British conservatism, the Bank of England, has been invaded by women clerks. Over 200 of them are now employed in the bank in various forms of clerical work. While it is the war that gave women the opportunity of replacing men of military age, it is also war that created additional work in the bank through the war loan business.

Women have been employed in the Bank of England in the humble note-sorting capacity since 1895, but they had never before done clerical work. They often put in as much as twelve hours a day.

Other banks, it is stated, now contemplate following the lead of the Bank of England, which, despite its former prejudice against women, has been historically known as the Old Lady of Threadneedle Street.

A QUEER WAGER.

Henry Steel, head of the great English steel firm of Steel, Peech & Tozer, who has just died at his home here, was perhaps best known outside trade circles as the man who laid King Edward, then Prince of Wales, [illegible] to a carrot against a horse at the Epsom races. The Prince lost and paid with a carrot formed of coral mounted in gold.

Mr. Steel and his partner, Mr. Peech, formed the greatest firm of bookmakers on the English turf fifty years ago. The fortune which they made on the racetrack enabled them to enter the iron and steel industry as pioneers in 1875. Mr. Steel died at the age of 83.

NOTES.

The death has occurred suddenly in London of Mr. Seddon Nicholson, of Warren, Clapeltown, aged 62.

Willie Spencer (26), miner, Fern Bank, Woodsetts, died at the Rotherham Hospital from the results of an accident earlier in the day at the Dinnington Main Colliery.

Private Edward Withens, of Mellor, who was a member of the Mellor Cricket Club, and well known in the district, has been killed in action at the Dardanelles. Private Withens, who was 23 years of age, was the first soldier from Mellor to go on active service.

Ernest Wragg, aged 22, a cycle hand, who has been working at Birmingham, was remanded at Nottingham on a charge of attempting to murder his wife, aged 20, by shooting.

The new Master of Downing College, Cambridge, is Mr. A. C. Seward, F.R.S., Professor of Botany.

H. M. Queen Alexandra has allotted £300 to the Church Army from the proceeds of the rose selling on Queen Alexandra's Day.

We understand that the postponed wedding of Miss Asquith and Mr. Bonham Carter is likely to take place during the last week of September.

The King has approved the appointment of the Duke of Marlborough, K.G., to be Lord Lieutenant of the County of Oxford, in room of the Earl of Jersey, deceased.

A representative of the Duke of Marlborough attended at Windsor Castle on Monday week, the anniversary of the battle of Blenheim, to place a new flag in the guard-room as the annual rent under which the Blenheim estate is held by the descendant of the great Duke.

An Order-in-Council published in the "London Gazette" extends the National Registration Act to the Isle of Man.

Two young mill hands, Lily Dobson, 15, and another girl aged about 20, were killed through the collapse of a wall in Canal road, Bradford.

The warm, moist nights have produced enormous crops of mushrooms, which have been selling at less than 6d. a pound in some parts of London.

The King's bounty has been granted to Mrs. Langridge, Copthorne, Sussex, to whom triplets were born recently. Her husband is at the front.

The Manchester City Council has co-opted two new members in place of members who have died. The last case of co-opting in the council was 26 years ago.

The number of employees of W. H. Smith and Son serving with the colors has now reached 1,800, a figure which represents a very high percentage of the total men available.

"Truth," announcing that the Royal Show will be held in Manchester next June, says that all being well, it is hoped that both the King and the Prince of Wales will visit Manchester during the show week.

After being closed for over two months as the result of a strike and lock-out, the Garston Bobbin Works of Messrs. Wilson Brothers re-opened.

The "part-time" munitions factory which has been initiated by Newcastle business men made a commencement with four six-hour shifts, each consisting of about ten men.

A delegate meeting of the Northumberland and Durham Miners' Permanent Relief Fund decided to raise contributions from 5d. to 6d. per week in view of the gradual decline of the credit balance during the past seven years.

The Rev. James Wallace, who has accepted the pastorate of St. James' Presbyterian Church, Pitsmoor, Sheffield, will be inducted on the afternoon of Thursday, 2 September.

The Rev. W. Palmer, who for five years has been pastor of the Baptist Zion Church, Barnsley, has accepted an invitation to the pastorate of the Baptist George street church, Nottingham.

Mrs. Matilda Tennyson, the last surviving sister of the poet, has just died at Bournemouth in her 99th year.

The death is announced of George Lambert, who was from 1871 to 1885 the professional tennis champion of the world. He was aged 70.

The death is announced of Mr. J. E. Rice-Jones, Hesketh road, Southport, who had been a member of the Southport Town Council for a number of years.

Two men were killed and several injured by an explosion which occurred at the works of Messrs. Spencer Cunsdale, cotton waste bleachers, Bury.

It was stated at an inquest at Sowe Waste, near Coventry, on Tuesday on Grace Lilian Broadhurst, aged twelve, who was found drowned, that after receiving a thrashing for stealing her sister's money the girl said, "I will go out and drown myself." In the early hours of the next day her body was recovered from the canal.

Conwil, a village near Carmarthen, has produced no National Register volunteer from its 1,275 residents. A member of the Rural District Council stated that a salary would have produced many applications.

Eager to serve her country by releasing a man for the war, Alice Mathews, a young Poole girl of thirteen summers, is toiling with her father in a trawler. Daily she braves wind and weather, often going out at 1.30 a.m. and sharing in the roughest work. She is an excellent oarswoman. Seven of her uncles and twelve cousins are in the army.

Hundreds of people attended the town hall at Dover and handed in jewelry and money as self-denial gifts to the Red Cross Society in celebration of the anniversary of the war. A Crimean veteran gave his war medal and bars. A poor widow of 88 sent her two gold rings which she had worn for sixty years, her one wished them to be used for the benefit of wounded soldiers.

A young woman, aged about 25, who has not been identified, was found dead on the rocks at Howth, County Dublin, on Monday, having evidently fallen 150 feet over the cliff. She was wearing an engagement ring and a steel-plated wristlet watch.

The death was reported to the Flintshire coroner of Mrs. Sarah Kelsall, aged 88, whose son, William Kelsall, 65, was remanded by the Mold magistrates on the previous Friday on a charge of causing her grievous bodily harm, by cutting a tumor with a razor. The son's object, it was stated, was to relieve his mother of her pain.

Michael Rooney, a water bailiff, was patrolling a stretch of Lough Corrib, County Galway, on Thursday night week, when he came upon ten or twelve men netting the river. He seized the net, and the men then knocked him down, kicked him, and, taking his gun, ran away. One of them fired the gun and wounded Rooney. His life is still in danger. Two arrests have been made.

Elsie Bonnis, 24, whose relatives live in Battle road, Hastings, lost her life by drowning at St. Leonard.

One feature of the Lancashire Agricultural Show at Blackburn recently was the display of old Lancashire village industries. Here was the maker of heather besoms turning out two of these articles every five minutes; there the hand-loom silk weaver who made the white ensign for H. M. S. Birmingham. The wooden clogmaker was fashioning hoops for ammunition cases. The man who worked a hand loom for weaving wire netting was busy on a copper wire blind, ten yards of which he could turn out daily.

A party of peace preachers, consisting of six women and nine men, who were touring through Leicestershire have had their career brought to an undignified end. As they were leaving a meeting at Hinckley, in the Co-operative Hall, someone said that they were pro-Germans. They were promptly rushed and took refuge in a chemist's shop, from which the police rescued them. One advocate of peace was found in a passage and was severely handled. The party were finally smuggled away in a taxicab to a train.

Lieut. John George Smith, V. C., 15th Sikhs, was born at 117 Banbury road, Oxford, in 1895. His father is first cousin of Gen. Sir R. Baden-Powell. Lieut. Smith was educated at Repton and Sandhurst. At school he is best remembered for his acting in Shakespeare plays.

Men of Chertsey have so far won the French Legion of Honor, two military crosses, one distinguished conduct medal, three distinguished service orders. Twelve of them have been mentioned in despatches and several have been promoted at the front. It is believed that no other town with a population of only 12,800 has so many honors to its name.

On Tuesday week Mr. William Heather, 11 Priory street, Lewes, a native of the town, attained the age of 103. He worked as a bricklayer from the age of 15. He has a sister living at Worthing who has just reached 100 years, and four generations of his family live in the same house.

Instead of laying out for cricket some new fields adjoining Kingsgate Park, which Winchester College has acquired, a crop of cabbages for the winter is being raised on it.

MAKE GOOD COFFEE.

Pot Must be Clean, But Need Not be Fancy.

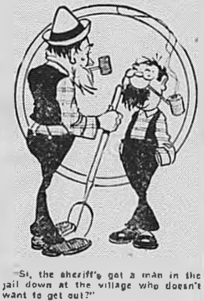
World-wide travelers all agree that the New Orleans Creole coffee is absolutely without a peer.

No complicated pots are necessary, the simplest pot made is just as capable of producing the finest cup of this delightful beverage as the most expensive percolator.

First and foremost, the pot must be absolutely clean, immaculately so, I may say. So many cooks think that simply washing the pot after each meal is sufficient, but this is not so. To repeat, the pot must be clean to insure success. Next the quality of the coffee berry plays an important part. Now that we have a good quality of coffee, and an absolutely clean pot, the next consideration is water. All that is needed of this is that it be fresh. Do not use that which has been in the kettle for some time, but clean, fresh boiling water. Rinse the kettle thoroughly, then put the water on to boil.

Take a tablespoonful of coffee for each cup desired, put in a cheese cloth bag or sack, then pour the boiling water on it, measuring carefully. Do not permit it to boil, just simmer; it must be kept below the boiling point for five minutes. Pack the spout with a clean piece of cheese cloth to keep the steam in; this also keeps in the aroma, which is wasted by escaping into the air.

Carefully follow these directions and you will be delighted with your cup of morning cheer. These three essentials are first and foremost: The perfectly clean pot, a good grade of coffee, using it medium fine, and placing it in the cheese cloth bag; then, last of all, the absolutely fresh boiling water. All this will produce a nectar fit for the gods, a true ambrosia that is within reach of the plainest home. Needless to say that cream, a good cream, adds the finishing touch to the perfect cup of coffee.



"Si, the sheriff's got a man in the jail down at the village who doesn't want to get out?"
"Who is he?"

WHY, IT IS DR. FIELD MOUSE.

(A Legend of the Pueblo Indians.)

Many animals have aching teeth, because they talked with the coyote, and could not cure him of his toothache when he asked their aid.

There were no medicine men in the early days of the world, and so when any animal, a lion or a tiger, or a bear or a fox, had a toothache, there was no one to cure him.

One day a little field mouse, who lives underground and knows a great deal about roots and plants and herbs, he lived so close to them, in burrowing near his home, found a strange root that had a very pleasant, [illegible] smell. The field mouse was a wise little animal, so he took the root and put it with others in his bag. As he was running along he met the Prairie Dog. "Oh, Friend Field Mouse, they say you are very wise about the plants that will help in sickness and pain," said the Prairie Dog. "Can you help my toothache, which is most distressing?" "I will try," said the Field Mouse, "for I have found a new root."

So the Field Mouse took the root and crushed it fine and mixed it with other roots, and putting some in the cheek of the Prairie Dog, to the great relief of the suffering animal, the ache was cured.

The news spread until all the animals heard of the wonderful cure effected by the quiet little Field Mouse, and they all assembled in great council to see the new remedy tested. The bear coyote was there howling with agony, for he had a very bad tooth in his jaw that gave him no rest day or night. The Field Mouse drew out the root, pounded it with a stone, mixed it with some other roots and a little fat and applied it to the jaw of the coyote, and in a very short time the sharp pain had gone and the coyote ceased to howl.

Then all the other animals made the Field Mouse the Medicine Father, and promised never to harm him.

PRACTICAL AND INEXPENSIVE.

The morning frock of indestructible voile is a practical investment for any woman. Most of these dresses are extremely simple in style, with little trimming but note than an embroidered or lace collar and cuff set. Illustrated is a charming frock of white indestructible voile with a flare full skirt, relieved by three narrow ruffles placed at equal distances from hem. A ruffle finishes the collar and sleeves, and a crushed satin girdle lends a color contrast.

Women, War, Woe

Scarcely more than figureheads are the many royal women of Europe who are [illegible].

The first real war women were the Amazons. They were a tribe of female warriors, and to have lived on the banks of the River Thermodon in Pontus, Asia Minor, who suffered no men to live among them. They are said to have been so called from their habit of cutting off the right breast (the word Amazon being from the Greek words meaning "without breast") to give them greater freedom in using the bow. During the war against Troy they fought under their queen, Penthesilea, against the Greeks.

Boadicea was queen of the Iceni, a tribe of Britain in the first century. The Roman commander of one of the cities, whom she had angry, had her publicly whipped. Burning for revenge, she gathered together her own and the neighboring tribes, stirred them up by a fiery speech and herself led them against the Romans. She burned Londinium (London) and other Roman towns and put to the sword at least 70,000 Roman people.

The Roman governor, who was away at the Isle of Man, hastened back, and a great battle took place near Saint Albans. Boadicea had the larger army, but the Roman soldiers were better drilled and armed, and after a fierce battle the Britons were defeated and Boadicea poisoned herself in despair.

In the third century we have Zenobia, Queen of Palmyra, the daughter of an Arab chief and wife of Odenathus, King of Palmyra. She was remarkable for her beauty and learning, speaking Latin, Greek, Syriac and Egyptian, besides her own language. "She accompanied her husband in his wars and it is said that the success of his greatest battles with the Persians was owing to her prudence and bravery. On the death of her husband (A. D. 266) she took the title of Queen of the East, and for five years ruled with firmness and success. Rome's Roman tried to take away her power. At last the Emperor Aurelian defeated her in Palmyra. She defended herself with great bravery, until she found that the city could not hold out any longer, when she tried to escape, but was pursued and captured. She was made to grace the triumph of Aurelian and was carried through the streets of Rome, adorned with jewels and almost fainting beneath the weight of golden chains.

Probably the name of Joan of Arc was the first to come to the mind of those who read the headline of this article, for few women warriors are better known than the Maid of Orleans, born at Domremy, Lorraine, about 1411. "She was the child of poor and ignorant parents, and in her girlhood was a servant in a tavern. France was then at war with England, and the whole country was in great trouble. Joan used to listen to the talk of the travelers and think a great deal about the troubles of her country. She longed to do something to help the King, and by and by she fancied that she had visions from heaven and heard voices telling her that she must save the nation. The idea took such hold of her that at last she made people believe that God had really sent her to do a great work. The King, Charles VII, consented to let her lead the soldiers in an attack upon the English at the siege of Orleans, and she did it so well that the English were beaten and driven out of the town in a week's time.

"After this, and after the king was crowned at Rheims, Joan wanted to go home, for she thought her work was ended. But there were more battles to fight, and everybody believed that wherever she went victory would follow. So they would not let her go, and in the end poor Joan was taken prisoner by the enemy, after an unsuccessful battle and burned for a witch in 1431. The French king acted in a very mean and ungrateful way about it, and the cruel death of a noble and innocent girl was a shameful thing to everyone concerned in it. All the world has honored her since her death, and statues have been put up to her memory in Rouen, Paris, Philadelphia and other places.

Few names shone brighter among the world's illustrious women than that of Maria Theresa, Queen of Hungary and Bohemia and Empress of Germany in the eighteenth century. "No sooner had she ascended the throne, on her father's death, than her neighbors, Frederick the Great of Prussia and Charles, Elector of Bavaria, formed a league to rob her of a great part of her territory and sent large armies against her. The spirited young queen, then only 23 years old, bravely turned upon her foes, appealing to her brave Hungarians for support. She appeared in the Hungarian diet with the crown on her head, the sword of state by her side and holding her infant son in her arms. In a Latin speech she threw herself on the Hungarian nobility and stirred them to such a pitch of enthusiasm that the vast assembly shouted, as their swords leaped from their scabbards, "Let us die for our king, Maria Theresa!"

"When her husband Francis I. was elected Emperor of Germany he left the control of everything to her. She did many wise things, and in everything the good of her subjects was her first care. Her court was a great contrast to the wicked courts which disgraced most other European rulers of that time. On the death of her husband she admitted her eldest son, Joseph, to share her throne. It was during her life that the treaty was made dividing Poland. She was very unwilling to have anything to do with it and at first refused to sign it.

But Europe is not the only continent which boasts of woman warriors. In our own United States in Revolutionary days we had at least two notable instances; for one, that of Deborah Samson, the girl soldier of Plymouth, Mass., who made her down suit of fustian and fought until she was shot through the shoulder and again until she was cut on the head. She masqueraded under the name of Robert Shirtliffe, and her identity was not discovered until, lying in a hospital and pronounced dead by the nurse, the doctor laid his hand over her heart.

Another Moll Pitcher, is, perhaps, even better known. She was the wife of a soldier, who, at Monmouth, on June 28, 1778, saw her husband killed in the act of firing a cannon. The men were about to remove it from the field when she arrived and ordered them to fire. She remained at her post all day and was rewarded by the praise of Washington and a commission as sergeant. Her real name was Mary Ludwig Hays. Her husband, whom she had married just before the Revolution, was a German. He served under Captain Francis Proctor, and his wife, a tall, rather handsome woman, with a wealth of auburn hair, had permission to accompany the army, washing and mending for the soldiers, and in time of battle she carried a pitcher of water about with her, hence her name.—Philadelphia Record.

The Cost of Shells in War.

How prodigiously the new use of artillery is increasing the cost of war may be seen from Lloyd-George's recent statement that Austrian and German factories were producing a quarter of a million shells a day, and that the Entente powers must prepare to equal or exceed that figure. Taking $15 as an average cost of a shell, this comes to $3,750,000 a day for each side for this item alone. The cost of maintaining a soldier in the field has commonly been estimated at $2 a day, the estimate including ammunition. No such estimate can hold when the cost of shells alone for both sides equals the entire estimated cost of 3,000,000 soldiers. It is easy to see how British expenses, $15,000,000 a day last fall with 2,000,000 men under arms, have increased to $15,000,000 a day. The Dardanelles expedition, to be sure, is costly, but a very important item is the increased use of shells since the spring offensive began in Flanders. This item alone will far exceed the total cost of most wars. The cost in life is fortunately by no means proportionate, no trustworthy figures are yet available as to the proportion of casualties caused by artillery and by small arms, but it is certain that the money cost of taking life by artillery fire is very high.—Springfield Republican.

To Create a Vacuum.

If you have ever worked in a physical laboratory you probably have seen a vacuum receiver and learned how difficult it is to create a perfect vacuum even with this instrument.

A vacuum can be created in a simple way by using two drinking glasses, a small candle end and a piece of blotting paper. The glasses must be the same kind and of the thin glass kind. The candle end is lighted and put into one glass, the blotting paper is well dampened and placed on top of the glass, the other glass inverted and its rim placed exactly over the lower one and pressed down tightly. The candle will burn up all the oxygen in the glass and go out.

The air in the glass, being heated, will expand, and some of it will be driven out from under the moist paper; then as the portion remaining cools it will contract and draw the upper glass on the paper and [illegible]

Her Baby Had Dysentery.

Had Two Doctors. No Result.

WAS CURED BY THE USE OF DR. FOWLER'S Extract of Wild Strawberry.

"In dysentery the discharges from the bowels follow each other with great rapidity, and sometimes become mixed with blood.

Never neglect what at first appears to be a slight attack of diarrhoea or dysentery will surely set in. Cure the first symptoms by the use of Dr. Fowler's Extract of Wild Strawberry.

Mrs. Martin Farraher, Docherty Corner, N.B., writes: "I can very strongly recommend Dr. Fowler's Extract of Wild Strawberry for dysentery and summer complaints. My little girl, at the age of two years, had the dysentery very bad. We had two doctors, but with no result. My mother brought me a bottle of "Dr. Fowler's," and when half the bottle was used the little girl was running around playing with her dolls with great delight and joy to the family, for we did not think, she would ever get better."

There are a number of preparations on the market to-day, claiming to be the same as "Dr. Fowler's Extract of Wild Strawberry," and also called similar names, so as to fool the public into thinking they are getting the genuine.

"Dr. Fowler's" is manufactured only by The T. Milburn Co., Limited, Toronto, Ont. See that their name is on the wrapper.

FIRES IN HOMES

Simple Precautions That May Save Lives and Property.

Fires in the home are easier to prevent than to extinguish.

Practically every fire originating in a dwelling house is due to carelessness or neglect.

The attic, cellar and all clothes closets should be cleaned at least once a year and all useless material and rubbish removed and burned.

In storing clothing, remove all matches and other material from the pockets. Do not hang clothes near hot chimneys.

Do not go into clothes closets with lighted matches or candles.

Use only safety matches and keep them away from children. Never throw burned matches on the floor or into waste baskets.

Coal oil lamps should always be filled by daylight. They should be kept clean and properly trimmed. A dirty lamp is unsafe.

Never allow little children to carry lamps, and never set lamps on a table cover. Children may pull them over.

A fuse is the "safety valve" of an electric system, and should never be replaced by one of larger size or of any other material.

Do not allow paper or rubbish to accumulate behind steam coils or radiators.

Gas stoves should never be connected up with rubber tubing. Gas pipe, rigid and secure, is the only safe connection.

Rags and cloths saturated with cleaning and polishing oils may ignite spontaneously in a few hours. Burn them at once.

Be careful of ashes. Do not deposit them against wooden buildings or fences. Far better to pour a pail [illegible]. Far better to pour a pail of water over them than to take the risk of a strong wind carrying live coals and starting fires.

Especial care should be taken in the home to prevent fires from starting, because when they do start there is seldom a man about to extinguish them. Where women and children are housed, the utmost vigilance is necessary on the part of those responsible for their welfare.

THE BEST WAY

In Which to Do a Handful of Useful Things.

To remove stains, the securely a tablespoonful of cream of tartar in the part of the garment that is stained, then boil it in the usual manner.

To save an enameled ware preserving kettle that has become burned, put a handful of ashes and some water in it, and let it stand a few hours. This removes the scorched part.

To make pies and not have them [illegible] the crust, sprinkle Indian meal on the board instead of flour before rolling the under crust.

To clean nickel plate when it has turned dark on the kitchen range, rub it with a flannel cloth dipped in vinegar.

To clean enameled ware that has become discolored, apply a paste made of salt and vinegar.

Was Weak and Run Down.

COULD NOT STAND THE LEAST EXCITEMENT.

When you feel weak and run down the heart becomes affected, the nerves become unstrung, and the least excitement causes a feeling of utter lassitude. What is necessary is to build up the heart and strengthen the shaky nerves by the use of such a remedy as Milburn's Heart and Nerve Pills.

Mrs. J. A. Williams, Tillsonburg, Ont., writes: "I cannot speak too highly of Milburn's Heart and Nerve Pills. I suffered greatly with my nerves, and was so weak and run down I could not stand the least excitement of any kind. I believe your Heart and Nerve Pills to be a valuable remedy for all sufferers from nervous trouble."

Milburn's Heart and Nerve Pills are 50c per box, 3 boxes for $1.25, at all dealers or mailed direct on receipt of price by The T. Milburn Co., Limited, Toronto, Ont.

WHITE HONEY CROP REPORT.

The Crop Report Committee of the Ontario Beekeepers' Association met recently. Three hundred members reported from all parts of Ontario, showing an average of 55 pounds per colony. There is about an average crop, and the quality is excellent. The buying power of the public is below the average, however, and it is likely that prices will range slightly lower than those recommended by the committee last year. In fact, some honey has already changed hands at prices recommended below.

Selling should be brisk at these prices, as the market is clear of old honey and the high price of sugar is causing householders to turn to honey as a substitute for caned fruit; considering that it requires no preserving, but can be stored in a dry place, regardless of temperature, without even removing it from the tin. One case was reported where berries were allowed to waste and 60 pounds of honey purchased to save the expense of picking and caning the berries.

The prices recommended by the committee are as follows:

No. 1, light extracted, wholesale, 10c to 11½c per lb.

No. 1, light extracted, retail, 12½c to 15c per lb.

No. 1, comb, wholesale, $2.00 to $2.75 per dozen.

No. 2, comb, wholesale, $1.50 to $2 per dozen.

These prices are f.o.b., in 60-lb. 10 lb. and 5 lb. tins; the former being net weight with the tin thrown in, the two latter being gross weight. The difference in time and trouble of filling the small tins about equalizes the price. In selling to the wholesale merchant the lowest wholesale price should be asked; while the retail grocer should pay the highest wholesale price. The retail price to the consumer might vary according to the quantity he takes in any one purchase, and whether he supplies his own package.

Signed by the committee:

Wm. Couse, H. G. Sibbald, W. J. Craig, Morley Pettit, sec.-Treas.

MILKING RECORDS.

Nine years ago the live stock branch of the Federal Department of Agriculture, in co-operation with certain record associations representing breeds of dairy cattle, began to record the performance of pure bred milking cows. Each record association agreed upon a standard yield for cows of its respective breed to qualify for registration, while the live stock commissioner formulated regulations under which the tests were to be carried out. At the end of each year a report of the work has been issued, containing a list of the animals that qualified for registration during the year, their breed, age, ownership, milking period, production of milk and fat, and such other information as might reasonably be looked for in an official report. Each year the work has increased until the seventh report, just issued, contains no less than 152 pages of information. During the year 453 cows qualified for registration, including 196 Holsteins, 123 Ayrshires, 35 Jerseys, 9 Guernseys, 14 French-Canadians and 26 Shorthorns. The highest records made were: Shorthorns, 15,535 lbs. milk, 540 lbs. fat; French-Canadian, [illegible] lbs. milk, 452 lbs. fat; Guernsey, 11,[illegible] lbs. milk, 520 lbs. fat; Holstein, 23,717 lbs. milk, 833 lbs. fat; Jersey, 15,211 lbs. milk, 761 lbs. fat; Ayrshire, 16,696 lbs. milk, 729 lbs. fat.

This report for the second time contains an appendix containing the records of cows which produced sufficient milk and fat to qualify for registration, but failed to calve within fifteen months after the commencement of the test, as required by the registrations. This report is of special interest to dairy farmers who are anxious to build up the milking qualities of their herds. Copies will be sent to those who apply for them to the Publications Branch of the Department of Agriculture at Ottawa.

A BULLETIN ON SWINE RAISING.

The second edition of Bulletin No. 17 of the Federal live stock branch, entitled Swine Husbandry in Canada, has been issued, and may be had on application to the Publications Branch of the Department of Agriculture at Ottawa. The interest in swine raising, stimulated, no doubt, by the high values of pork products, made such a demand for information on this subject that the first edition printed last year was quickly exhausted. This edition brings up to date statistics with respect to [illegible] [illegible] and the trade in hog products. It is shown that the total exports for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1916, amounted to 157,918,319 lbs. as against 27,641,140 lbs. the previous year. The bulletin covers the whole field of swine raising, giving the results of official experiments as well as the practices of successful farmer swine raisers. An interesting section describes the system of feeding hogs in Denmark, where combinations of food are prepared according to their food units in which one pound of grain—wheat, barley, peas, corn, etc.—constitutes one food unit, which is equal to 8 lbs. mangels, 4 lbs. boiled potatoes, 5 lbs. alfalfa, 6 lbs. skim milk or 12 lbs. whey. It is shown that the diet is varied in a definite way for pigs of different ages.

NOTES.

The number of female animals that may be bred to one male varies quite widely according to the age, vigor, feeding and general management of the animal, and also according to the length of the feeding season. According to experienced breeders, the following will be a safe guide: To the bull, 50 to 60 cows; to the stallion, 50 to 75 mares; to the ram, 50 to 60 ewes; to the boar, 15 to 20 sows.

To prevent worms in hogs the following mixture is suggested. Keep this before the pigs at all times: Charcoal, one bushel; hardwood ashes, one bushel; salt, eight pounds; air-slacked lime, eight pounds; sulphur, four pounds; pulverized copperas, two pounds. The lime and salt are first mixed very thoroughly, then the ashes and charcoal are mixed. The copperas should be dissolved in two quarts of hot water and sprinkled over the entire mass, mixing it thoroughly. The mixture may be stored in a barrel or boxes and used as needed. A generous supply should be before the pigs where they may eat it when they wish.

Experiments have proven the average milk cow requires about an ounce of salt per day. Heavy milkers should have more. Keeping salt where the dairy cows can reach it at all times maintains their good health and encourages a heavy milk yield by promoting thorough digestion and assimilation and having a cooling effect on the whole system of the animals, at the same time making it easier to bring butter of a superior flavor and color at churning time.

Some people seem to think that a thin hog is a bacon hog. It is not; but the pig that is well grown on a nitrogenous ration, and that is nice and sleek, but not fat, is the market-topper nine times out of ten.

Pot-bellied, hay-fed colts tell the story of improper feeding, slow growth and poor form.

A ton of clover or mixed clover hay was found at the Wisconsin Station to be equal to three tons of corn stover for milk cows.

The Department of Agriculture at Washington gives the following list of plants that are benefited by applications of lime: Spinach, lettuce, beet, celery, onion, cucumber, cantaloupe, asparagus, cabbage, peanut, rhubarb, pea, pumpkin, bean, tobacco, alfalfa, clover, barley, wheat, oats, timothy, gooseberry, currant, orange, quince and cherry. Indian corn is only slightly benefited. Plants which are said to be slightly injured by lime are cotton, tomato, cowpea, Concord grape, peach, apple and pear, and those really injured are radish, flax, blackberry, black raspberry and cranberry.

THE ONLY CURE FOR A WEAK STOMACH

Indigestion and Similar Troubles Must be Treated Through the Blood.

Indigestion can be treated in many ways, but it can only be cured in one way—through the blood. Purgatives cannot cure indigestion. By main force they move on the food still undigested. That weakens the whole system, uses up the natural juices and leaves the stomach and bowels parched and sore. It is actually a cause of indigestion—not a cure. Others try pre-digested food and peptonized drugs. But drugs which digest the food for the stomach really weaken its power and makes the trouble chronic. The digestive organs can never do the work properly until they are strong enough to do it themselves. Nothing can give the stomach that power but the new, rich, red blood so abundantly supplied by Dr. Williams' Pink Pills. So the reason for the success of this medicine is plain. Nothing can stimulate the glands and nothing can absorb the nourishment from the food but pure red blood. And Dr. Williams' Pink Pills surpass all other medicines in giving this new, rich blood. Mrs. D. E. Johnson, Hemford, N. S., says: "For months I was a great sufferer from indigestion; food of any kind was distasteful to me, and after eating I would suffer much. Naturally I grew weak and was but a shadow of my former self. I was taking a doctor's prescription, but it did not help me in the least. Then I read of a case similar to my own cured through the use of Dr. Williams' Pink Pills, and I decided to try this medicine. By the time I had taken six boxes the trouble had entirely disappeared, and I could eat heartily of all kinds of food. More than this, I found my general health greatly improved through the use of the Pills. I can therefore strongly recommend Dr. Williams' Pink Pills as a cure for indigestion."

You can get these Pills through any dealer in medicine or by mail, post paid, at 50 cents a box or six boxes for $2.50 from The Dr. Williams' Medicine Co., Brockville, Ont.

Canada's Favorite Sugar since the days of the Pioneer
Redpath

CANADA'S pioneer sugar refiner was John Redpath, who in 1854 produced "Ye Olde Sugar Loafe"—the first sugar "made in Canada".

Redpath Sugar has been growing better and more popular ever since. When there seemed no further room for improvement in the sugar itself, we made a decided advance by introducing the Redpath Sealed Cartons.

These completed a series of individual packages—2 and 5 lb. Cartons and 10, 20, 50 and 100 lb. Cloth Bags—which protect the sugar from Refinery to Pantry, and ensure your getting the genuine Redpath.

THE POULTRY WORLD

THE MOULTING SEASON.

The moulting period is much longer than most amateurs suppose, as the first stage is likely to pass unnoticed. It is a gradual process and starts slowly. At first a few of the large feathers drop out, one or two at a time, but as the season advances the moult becomes more rapid.

While the fowls are in light moult the hens probably will continue to lay, but laying generally ceases when heavy moulting begins. This is when the hen drops the mass of small or body feathers. Prolonging the laying period not only retards the moulting period, but it is likely to result in loss of strength and vigor.

A hen that begins to moult in July should be newly fledged in October. If the moult is delayed the fowls affected will be exposed to considerable inclement weather without natural protection, and unless unusually comfortable quarters are provided they are almost certain to suffer from disease from such exposure.

Late moulting nearly always is the result of a desire to get the largest returns at the moment, even at the expense of the future. But is a late moult economical?

The moulting period should be a period of rest for the reproductive organs, and it will be when the fowls are not forced, either at its beginning or completion. Under such conditions and with proper care, hens usually will begin to lay in February. The eggs also will be large, perfectly formed and with good shells. The fertility, hatchability and strength of the chicks will be all that one can expect or desire.

When a large flock of hens is kept over, an early moult will, of course, be of advantage, because of early winter laying is possible only when accompanied by early moulting. This means a late summer or early fall moult, which is natural with pullets that were hatched fairly early and that have been kept laying.

For birds hatched later and those that for any reason moult in July a forced moult is sometimes employed, the hen being made to begin her moult earlier than she would naturally.

The theory of forced moulting is that by reducing flesh sufficiently, the feathers become dead and loosen, and, therefore, drop out more quickly; then by feeding liberally new feathers are grown rapidly, the body built up and a laying condition restored.

The most radical method practised consists of confining the hen and feeding her from one-quarter to one-half of what she would ordinarily require. Even this liberal ration consists of the foods less fattening, such as oats and wheat bran.

Both males and females moult earlier if they have been confined for a considerable time. Fanciers who want to exhibit at the fall and early winter shows make use of this fact to assist them in getting candidates for three honors in fresh, new plumage.

The production of both feathers and eggs requires much the same kind of nourishment; which is perhaps the real explanation of why hens in heavy moult seldom lay. If a ration sufficiently rich to form both feathers and eggs rapidly was provided, the digestive machinery would soon collapse and neither feathers nor eggs would be formed. Thus, whether the hen forms feathers or eggs, she must be supplied with a small but appreciable amount of mineral matter and a liberal supply of protein, because feathers are found to contain both mineral matter and a liberal supply of protein, because feathers are found to contain both mineral matter and protein. It then becomes apparent that feathers and eggs are not so different in composition as form and appearance would lead one to believe.

A soft, oily skin is favorable to a rapid and healthier growth of feathers, and hens or other animals may be fed to promote such a condition. To secure this a liberal supply of such fat containing foods as beef scraps, oil meal, etc., are often included in rations for moulting hens.

Oil meal is not especially palatable and should be used sparingly, possibly one part in sixteen or twenty of dry mash as commonly compounded. With the light and active breeds, beef scraps may be fed in hoppers, thereby affecting a saving, as fowls soon get a sufficient quantity, and are not continually picking over the dry mash for bits of this animal food, wasting grain to save scraps. When fed in mash, 15 per cent is a fair proportion.

To those who would take advantage of forced moults a word of caution is due. Do not reduce rations abruptly. Furthermore, do not reduce them to the extent that the fowl's constitution is impaired. Rather depend upon confinement and a selection of feeds that have little forcing or fattening tendencies. This would mean the elimination of food especially rich in either fats or protein; for example, beef scraps, corn, oil meal, etc. Select those that in themselves form more nearly a maintenance ration, such as oats, with wheat bran and sufficient green feeds always available during the moulting season, little enough of these to maintain health, with the assistance of free access to the grit and shell boxes.

The general welfare of the birds should be looked after. Males should be excluded from the pens. As the hens are timid and tender while the new feathers are growing, fowls in moult should not be caught. They should be placed in a building which has been recently thoroughly cleaned and disinfected with a mite exterminator, and should be thoroughly rid of body lice before moulting begins.

NOTES.

The oft-repeated statement of clean, fresh water in clean drinking founts, well-balanced growing feed of good quality, plenty of green feed in some form, good poultry quarters, well ventilated, and the abundance of plenty of room for the growing stock should be heeded in the dog days, if the best results are to be obtained. A little extra care with the stock during the summer months will repay one in early maturity of the pullets, which means eggs sooner in the fall and the breeding stock better able to do their best in January, February and March, when eggs for hatching are desired.

The poultry keeper who has overcrowded the growing stock these hot nights and still warmer days will find that maturity will be delayed and that the expected exhibition fowl will not materialize or the pullets did not lay the first eggs when expected. The results obtained in poultry are what one makes them in the proper management of the same from shell to maturity and beyond. The different degrees of success with poultry are due to the different grades of care one gives to the stock. Some poultry keepers are better than others, and the biggest profits come to the best handlers.

History of Anatomy.

The way in which we are so "fearfully and wonderfully made" was largely a mystery to the ancients. It may be said that anatomical science was practically unknown prior to Aristotle, 384 B. C. Before that date nearly all that was known of anatomy was derived from the dissection of the lower animals. Aristotle did something in the way of science, but it was not until the time of the famous Alexandrian school, a century before and a century after the birth of Christ, that the anatomy of man began to be fairly understood. The Ptolemies were great patrons of science and were the first who granted physicians license to dissect the human body.

ARTIFICIAL LIMBS.

Perfection to Which the Mechanical Arm Has Been Brought.

They are making artificial limbs with such perfection to-day that a technical observer who is also an enthusiastic baseball "fan" declares that he would not be surprised to see in the not far distant future some wooden-armed pitcher making a "good" [illegible]. What is known as "glass arm" would be effectively superseded by "wooden arm."

Though this is a daring leap of the imagination, which, however, most [illegible] verify, the perfectly good armed [illegible] of the [illegible] still some of the things that can be done with artificial arms are simply amazing. Here you see a man lighting a cigar and with a naturalness of action and pose which would deceive the casual observer.

The mechanism is controlled by certain movements of the stump of the flesh and blood arm, and so little knack is necessary to the successful working of the artificial member, and yet withal it is not very difficult to acquire.

It is said that the man who is light on his feet can pick a pin from the floor without difficulty, but it is not so stated that he can give the "[illegible]" to a ball so that it will speed to the batter like a projectile from a high powered gun. As a matter of fact, he is pleasurably satisfied with the many very necessary things that can be done with the mechanical arm without venturing now into the luxury and excitement of out-door sport.—Buffalo News.

FOREST FACTS.

The forest productions of Canada are worth one hundred and seventy-five million dollars every year.

No other crop compares with it in value. The wheat production is worth fifty million dollars a year less.

Yet the continuance and development of this enormous harvest of trees does not conflict in any sense with the enlarging of the wheat or any other agricultural crop. On the contrary, the preservation of the forests is the best guarantee of the fertility of the Canadian farm.

Forest conservation has no quarrel with the reasonable and patriotic lumberman. Correct methods of forest management maintain and increase both the productiveness and the capital value of forest land and draw from it the best return it is capable of giving.

Forest conservation does not mean a "Hands Off" sign on every area of trees. It means care as opposed to carelessness, construction as opposed to destruction, good use as opposed to abuse. The conservationist is not a faddist. He believes in cutting crops of trees with an eye to future as well as present profit. He does not look on a forest as a silver mine, to be gouged out as fast as possible and abandoned as a waste.

The Federal and Provincial Governments of Canada own 93 per cent. of the forest lands. A very considerable part of these lands are under lease, but the ownership remains vested in the people. The situation in the United States is a remarkable contrast. There, the people possess a title to not more than one-fifth of their magnificent timber resources. Whatever policy of forest conservation the Canadian people choose to adopt will blanket 59 per cent. of the forest area of the country.

Conscientious.

Dodson and his friend Jones stood conversing on the corner. Dodson looked up, clutched his companion by the arm and whispered, "Hurry, Jim!" Around the corner they went and made off up the street. Then Jones called Dodson to account. "Creditor of mine," answered Dodson. "It isn't like you to dodge creditors," said Jones. "Are you up against it?" "Well," was the reply, "I have enough in my pocket to pay him, and if he caught me I might do it. Now let's go and spend some of this money so I can give him an honest excuse if we should happen to see him again."—Argonaut.

ZEPPELIN NIGHTS

These Zeppelin raids at night must cease. Both Hulkson and myself find that our digestions are being impaired, and that on the morning after we have that kind of brackish sensation in the mouth which we have never thought for years, and which we never thought to meet again once we had stepped down in married life.

We are both special constables, and whenever a Zeppelin is seen anywhere near the British coast, the safety of London demands that Hulkson and I should be sent for by the nearest police station. We do not mind going to the station; we have never before been so familiar with the hospitable and cheery interior of these establishments. Our grievances, in fact, are peculiar, and must be gone into in some detail.

Take my own first. I alone have a telephone, although Hulkson lives in the same block of flats. Consequently it is always I that am aroused. Generally I have been asleep about an hour and my wife not quite so long. She wakes first and seizes the telephone. Hearing the message, special constable emergency call, given with what you might call the fused telephone voice, she is surprised, hurried, a little cross and wakes me painfully.

I hustle into clothes. London is afire—deadly gases are rolling down our street—my friends are withering—where is my truncheon?—can I get some food?—are a few of the thoughts that stagger through my half-awakened brain, and then I remember to call Hulkson. Of course, it is his wife who wakes first, and he gets a little unpleasantness, too, I hope. Then we rush to the station. We pass a real policeman or two on the way. They smile benignly on us: "Hulzcraft again, sir?"

In the station yard are a large number of the afflicted unfortunates. All appear to have dressed in a hurry and under various emotions. Thus some are protected against the idea of a cold night and have overcoats and mufflers; others, amazed by the prevalent notion of poison gases, are apparently relying almost entirely on the respirator—the rest of their costume is sketchy flannels. All are busily consuming rumor. This appears to originate from the special telephone. "Have you heard? They've got it from Southend—whole place on fire! Zepps now over Hounslow; now over the Crystal palace; now Victoria station! The Alexandra palace is burnt down. We're just off to Deptford!" These are a few of the observations that pass from mouth to mouth, increasing in quantity and importance at fresh arrivals and providing fresh ground for impression.

Meanwhile, the officers appear very busy, bustling through the crowd of us to their staff room and managing to look as though they knew everything that we are dying to find out. As a matter of fact, I once caught an annual commissary, and he—but no, there are censors about! Well, so far, you may declare that beyond being turned out of bed, Hulkson and I have little to complain of. We are among the more or less cheerful crowd of men, some of whom we know; the stars shine overhead and we are allowed to smoke.

My friends, you have forgotten the canteen. Have you ever eaten large hunks of bread and cheese and drunk heavy beer in a smoky room full of real and amateur policemen at 2 a. m.? Have you ever—but no, you've never been in a police station at that time and if you have you wouldn't have been given supper. Not that we are given it, either! But, by the time one has exhausted all rumors, there are no orders to be executed, there is no sign of anything hostile, not even a cloud, it is a long time since dinner, the morning is fresh, the world is awake—someone suggests it lightly, you think perhaps it won't hurt the canteen to still be open, so you go—there's an end of it.

Bread and cheese and beer are fine things, but take a constable's word and avoid them at 2 a. m., particularly if you are going to be in bed before three. And on these occasions, the order to dismiss always comes just as we leave the canteen.

I don't know whether the catering department is in league and close communication with Scotland Yard or the Admiralty, but the mutual arrangement seems admirable. Our services are dispensed with as soon as our appetites are appeased. Now I am looking for a philanthropic lady to start a Special Constabulary Destroyed Digestion Fund.—London Express.

The "University" of Ham.

The town of Ham has perhaps the most notable chateau in France. As ancient as Rheims Cathedral, its enormous walls has held as prisoners Joan of Arc, Conde, the Huguenot leader, and Prince Louis Napoleon after his attempt at Boulogne in 1840 to win over France. Here for six years he was a compulsory student, as he himself put it, in the "University" of Ham until his escape in 1846 disguised as a workman.—London Chronicle.

Easily Arranged.

"How did you come to get married?" asked a man of a very homely friend.

"Well, you see," he replied, "after I'd vainly tried to win several girls that I wanted I finally turned my attention to one that wanted me, and then it didn't take long to arrange matters."—London Strand Magazine.

MIGHTY MAUNA LOA.

The lofty volcanoes of the Hawaiian Islands, rising above the ocean from 5,000 to nearly 14,000 feet, are only the summits of gigantic mountain masses that rise abruptly from the bottom of the Pacific. Mauna Loa, on the island of Hawaii, stands 13,675 feet above sea level, but its slopes descend beneath the sea, as shown by deep sea soundings, with a grade fully equal to if not greater than that of the visible slopes. The same is generally true of the submarine slopes of other islands, and the depths attained by these continuous slopes, within thirty or fifty miles of the shores, vary from 14,000 to 19,000 feet. Mauna Loa and Mauna Kea, if their true bases are considered to be at the bottom of the Pacific, are therefore mountains of as great an altitude as Mount Everest, or approximately 30,000 feet. In general the Hawaiian island group consists of summits of a gigantic submarine mountain chain which projects only its loftier peaks an dmose above the water. On the island of Hawaii the volcanic forces are still in operation.

The one continuously active volcanic vent of the island is Kilauea, far down on the eastern flank of Mauna Loa—"the great mountain." No other volcano in the world approaches Mauna Loa in the vastness of its mass or in the magnitude of its eruptive activity. There are many volcanic peaks higher in the air, but most of them are planted upon elevated platforms, where they appear as mere cones of greater or less size. It is not yet known at what level the base of Mauna Loa is situated, but it is below the sea, probably far below.

Mauna Kea—"the white mountain"—is also a colossus among volcanoes. Its summit, 13,825 feet, is a trifle higher than that a Mauna Loa, but its slopes are steeper, and its base is therefore much smaller. The magnitude of Mauna Loa is due chiefly to the great area of its base, which is nearly elliptical in shape, with a major diameter of seventy-four miles and a minor diameter of fifty-three miles, measured at sea level.

In the aggregate of its eruptions Mauna Loa is also unrivaled. Some of the volcanoes of Iceland have been known to disgorge at a single outbreak masses of lava fully equal to those of Mauna Loa. But such outbursts are infrequent in Iceland, and a century has elapsed since any of such magnitude have occurred, though there have been several minor eruptions. The eruptions of Mauna Loa are all of great volume and occur irregularly, at an average interval of about eight years. In view of the total quantity of material it has disgorged during the last century no other volcano is at all comparable to it.—From a Bulletin of the United States Geological Survey.

Imitation Jewels.

Nature is often copied with conspicuous success by those engaged in the imitation of precious jewels. Zircons are composed of silicia and zirconia. Their lustre is deceptive, a means having been discovered of extracting the color, thus leaving them diamonds to all appearances, although their falseness promptly proclaims itself when put to a test. Precious stones are often dyed with such thoroughness and cleverness that, it is asserted, the stone may be broken without discovery of the process, that is to say, by the uninitiated.

In Oberstein, Germany, the sole industry is the manufacture of imitation jewelry and the dyeing of chalcedony and other stones. The onyx, carnelian, bloodstone and agate may be enriched in color by immersion in the dyepot. The stones are placed in vessels containing the coloring matter and are then subjected to great heat for periods varying from a few hours to a week or more. In the case of chalcedony, which shows bands of different degrees of intensity, certain of the bands take the color and others do not. The stones then receive a further stewing in pots containing other dyes.

Fluorspar is capable of great improvement in that when subjected to a heating process and crocidolite is given a hue of blood red by a similar method.

The emerald and the catseye are of all stones the most easily imitated. One family at Oberstein is said to possess the secret of converting crocidolite into catseye. Catseye also may be made of aragonite, some of the hornblendes, and even of fibrous gypsum.

Popular Poverty.

Katie, aged seven, was the only child of Mr. and Mrs. Jones. One day, when the new minister called, Katie, upon her own invitation, went into the parlor to entertain him until her mother came downstairs. As she approached the parlor door, Mrs. Jones heard the minister ask Katie how many children her mother had, and was very much surprised to hear her little daughter reply "six."

Her mother wisely made no comment upon the startling reply of the child, but sent her out to play, and when the minister's visit was over she asked Katie why she had told him that her mother had six children, and was more dumfounded than ever when Katie said, "Because, I did not want the strange gentleman to know that you were so poor that you didn't have but one child."—National Monthly.

FORMOSA

About all of our farmers here, are about through harvesting.

Miss Justan Zinger of Cleveland' Ohio, is visiting her parents Mr. and Mrs. John Zinger since last week.

Mr. and Mrs. George Kreitswiser of Teeswater, were here on business last Wednesday.

Last Thursday when Alex. Kropp and Seraphine Meyer were loading a plaining machine at the station, the machine fell on Kropp and he will be laid up for some time.

Jacob Lehman was the first one that thrashed here this summer.

Mr. Andrew Oberle of Walkerton, was here on business last Thursday.

Mr. M. R. Dixon of Walkerton came to town with Mr. Cryderman last Friday.

The young folks are on the look out for apples, which are very scarce this year, There will be no cider this year.

Mr. Chas Buhlman of Mildmay came to town on Sunday by auto.

Ralph, son of Mrs F Oberle of Walkerton is visiting his relatives here the last few days

Rev. Edmund Kayser, pastor of St. James Lutheran church in Tolleston, near Indiana, was found lying dead in a vacant lot adjoining his home last night. There was a bullet wound in his throat and a window cord tied tightly around his neck, Deceased had some time ago appealed to the police for protection, having been threatened for his pro-German utterances,

It was a Bitter Pill

The following from last weeks Teeswater News, indicates the feeling prevalent in our neighboring burg towards the Walkerton Baseball Club. It is very apparent that the Teeswaterites take their defeat in anything but a sportsmanlike manner and it is a bitter pill to swallow:—

"The most hotly contested ball game of the season took place in the park on Monday afternoon. when the Walkerton team met our village nine to decide the championship of group No. 2 Considerable interest was manifested by the men as it seems almost impossible for the visiting team to keep to any code of right or justice when out to win,"

No Booze Labor Day

According to a recent act of Parliament, Labor Day has been placed on the "dry" list and consequently no booze can lawfully be sold on that day.

Married Here.

The marriage took place at the home of Rev. J. W. Sanderson on Wednesday of last week of Mr. Walter Stark of Paisley to Miss Eva Parker, second daughter of Mr. Horatio Parker of Cargill. Mr. and Mrs. Stark left on Saturday for Swan Lake, Man., where the groom has a lucrative position in a grist mill.

No 19—Coll Ferns, 1st Mrs. N. G. Searle, 2nd H. M. Norrish,

No 20—Coll Plants, 1st H. M. Norrish, 2nd Mrs Searle.

No 21—Window Box, 1st K. M. Taylor, 2nd K. M. Taylor.

No 22—Hanging Basket, 1st Mrs. Jno. Lambertus, 2nd Mrs. Ramsey.

After the flower show, the flowers which were on exhibition were sold by auction, the proceeds of the sale being given to the hospital. The floor was then cleared and about fifty young people participated in an enjoyable dance.

Communication

Dear Sir:

While I enjoyed much of what was said last evening in the town hall bearing on ancient and modern history and of the ways and means by which the present war is to be brought to a successful finish, I felt dissapointed that neither of the speakers made any reference to the cause of the war. Indeed one of the speakers said that no man could tell the cause. Now that all men in Canada and the British Empire have equal rights to express their opinion, I beg to say that the cause of this, and other wars, has been a disregard to God,s authority, and as such, that this war is a judgement on all the nations and that all the nations must suffer whether neutral or otherwise. So, that the resistance of the British Empire should not be against the bondage that is sure to follow if the opposing nations should get the victory.

Judgement is intended to bring the nations to repentance, confession of sin and forsaking of it. Then God's way is to grant forgiveness and restore to liberty, as with the individual, so with the nation, but the plan of the opposing powers in this way is to bring the nations into bondage whether they repent or not, and so God says, "My ways are not your ways, nor your thoughts my thoughts." So that while the judgement is of God, the maintenance of the principles of righteousness and universal brotherhood is also of God.

And so I feel satisfied that sacred and human history will substantiate my conception of the war and its cause.

Two thousand years ago we find Herod the King of Egypt using the sword to destroy all the male children of Bethelem to make sure, as he thought of destroying the holy child, Jesus who had been sent of God to bring liberty to the captives and the opening of the prison to them that were bound or in bondage, but Herod's plan failed. Now we have the Kaiser and his war lords using the sword to destroy innocent women and children male and female on sea and land that they may control the destiny of the nations and keep them in bondage, but the God that saw and heard the mourning and desolation of Bethelem, sees the desolation and mourning of the British Empire today, and, will in the end frustrate all the opposing powers. It is no secret that all the diplomatic efforts of the British Empire had failed before she was forced into arms.

So that all the right thinking people of all nations must admit that she is justified in employing every available means to prosecute the fight to the finish, while she may admit that the time has come when judgement must begin at the house of God. The nation that fights for the right is fighting for God.

A Walkerton Citizen,

THE WAR SUMMARY

In the week that has passed there has been very little doing on the long battle lines in Europe.

The Russians continue to give ground before the Austo-German advance through Poland and have retired many miles in the week that has passed. Their retreat is being made in good order and their losses are slight while they are inflicting terrible losses upon the invading hordes of Germans. The reason for the defeat of the Czar's great army is the lack of arms and amunition. As Japan is now shipping munitions to Russia and the factories in Russia are turning out immense quantities of arms, etc., the army of that country will soon be well equipped. A better condition of affairs in the north can then be looked for and the Germans will find it difficult to hold the territory they have gained.

On the southern front, according to the despatches, the week has apparently been one of inactivity, but reading between the lines one can see that there is a great movement on foot on the British firing line. Kitchener's great army of hundreds of thousands of men who have been encamped in England are being transported across the channel and great preparations are being made for the long looked for drive.

The Italian army continues to make ground against the Austrians and at the Dardenelles the Allies are also gaining territory and the forcing of the straits upon which to a great extent hinges the probable duration of the war, will be accomplished in the near future.

The prophets are once more at work foretelling the end of the conflict, some stating that the declaration of peace is one year away, while others declare that Germany will be on her knees six months hence. The ground for making these prophecies is that Germany, according to great financiers, will in the course of a few months, be in a state of bankruptcy.

Wm. Reilly the umbrella man, who was arrested last week for attempting to break into a C.P. R. car, appeared before Judge Greigg on Thursday morning, and after being given a hearing was dismissed. Reilly stated that he was an old railroad man and claimed that he was merely looking for a place to sleep. As he had no funds and pleaded hard for his liberty the judge dealt leniently with him.

Bruce Soldiers to be Here

Walkerton's Military Day will be of special interest to the people of Bruce County, as arrangements are being made to have all the Bruce boys training at London, drafted into the Company which will perform here that day. As the 34th goes to England in the immediate future, this will give the relatives of these soldiers an opportunity to come to Walkerton and bid, what will undoubtedly be a last farewell before they sail for England.

Patriotic Picnic a Success.

The patriotic picnic of the Knechtel employees on Monday was a decided success, the total day's proceeds amounting to over $300.00. Of this amount $123.00 was collected by girls selling tags. In the afternoon the married men defeated the single men at baseball by 4—3, while the lacrosse match resulted in a win for the "Will-Bees" by 8 goals to 6. Addresses were delivered by Senator Donnelly, and R. E. Truax, M. P. The dance in the town hall in the evening wound up a most successful day. Kuntz's orchestra supplied excellent music.

"Misch" Hinsperger Enlists.

Mr. A. W. Hinsperger formerly of the Telescope staff, who has been working at the printing trade in Toronto for some time, has enlisted and left last week for the front. "Misch" who finished his trade at this office, was one of the cleverest athletes in Western Ontario, full of pluck and resource, and will be right at home at the game of war. Every town in this district will remember him as the fast football player, and clever baseballer, and the best wishes of a great host of friends will follow him to the scene of activity. His friends and workmates at the Sovereign Press, Toronto, assembled on Wednesday evening of last week, and presented him with a beautiful wrist watch on the eve of his departure. We hope to see Misch back again at the conclusion of the war.

Season for Cotton-tails

A number of Walkerton nimrods are apparently not aware that there is a close season for cotton-tails as they have already commenced hunting them. Game warden White informs us that the open season for these rabbits is similar to that of hare, and the youngsters now engaged in hunting them are liable to a heavy fine.

Big Crowd Coming

Military Day on Wednesday next should bring an immense crowd to Walkerton. The program which will be put on by the company of the 34th Battalion and the regimental band will be worth going miles to see. The manouvers and drills at the exhibition grounds will give the public a good idea of the efficient training which recruits receive at military camps, prior to being sent to England. You cannot afford to miss that opportunity of seeing their mimic warfare.

Taking over Business

Misses Cooke and Selwood, milliners of Chesley are taking over the millinery business of Mrs. Porteous. Miss Selwood has just returned from New York where she has been attending the millinery openings while Miss Cooke has been in Toronto attending the openings there. Both ladies have had a number of seasons in the city and fully understand the wants and will be able to look after the welfare of the ladies of Walkerton and vicinity who may be pleased to call and inspect their stock. A cordial invitation is extended to all.

Signing for 71st Battalion.

Lieut. J. Farrell, formerly of the Merchants Bank staff here, has been here this week assisting Capt. Klein at the recruiting office at the armory. Men are now being secured for the 71st Battalion of the Canadian Overseas forces and since Monday, fifteen recruits have placed their names on the roll. They are:—Everett Truax, Albert Miller, Clarence Krueger, David Seiling, C. F. Nutting, Doc. G. Cunningham, Wilfrid McKay, Louis Anderson, Melville Wilson, Harry Wettlaufer, Ted Wilhelm, Walter Yaeck, Pete Loughleen, Wm. Gillen and Wm. Wolfe.

Poachers Beware!

The game poachers this season will be obliged to exercise more care in breaking the law than they have in the past, as a new game warden is on the job, in the person of Mr. Jos. White. Many sportsmen who have constantly bewailed the laxity of the authorities in the enforcement of the game laws will welcome the news that Mr. White has decided to act in this new capacity and there is no doubt but that he will make as an efficient a Game Warden as he does a License Inspector. There is a great deal of ignorance, locally with regard to game laws and everyone who carries a gun should get posted on the open season and other regulations for the protection of game. In former years there has been shooting out of season, and shooting on Sundays was not infrequent, but Mr. White declares that the game must be protected and as he is here to enforce the law, the habitual poacher must now beware. Any hunter refusing to allow the game warden to search his bag, is liable to a fine and anyone found guilty of breaking the law is not only liable to a fine, but will also have his game confiscated.

Military Day Sept. 15th.

Largely through the influence of Mr. John Rowland, Walkerton is to have a Military Day on Wednesday next, September 15th which is the last day of the Walkerton Fair. The big attraction will be a full Company of the 34th Battalion now in camp at London, accompanied by a Machine Gun Section, soup kitchen, and the regimental band. The program which they will give at the exhibition grounds is as follows.—

AFTERNOON

3.30 o'clock, Platoon Company and Battalion Drill.
3.50 " 10 men "C" Company, Extended Drill.
4.00 " Machine Gun Drill.
4.15 " Racing and Competition.
5.00 " Drill "A" Company.

EVENING

7.30 o'clock Physical Drill "C" Company 10 men.
7.45 " Machine Gun Firing Exercise
8.00 " Bayonet Exercise 40 men "D" Company.
8.10 " Club Swinging, Serg. Potts—Illuminated.
8.30 " Physical Drill with Arms "D" Company.
9.20 " Drill "A" Company "Fancy"

Private Sale of Furniture

Miss McCormick will sell by private sale, at her residence, between Saturday next 11th, inst and Saturday 18th, inclusive, the following articles of household furniture:—two Klondyke heaters, one coal self-feeder, one sideboard, one kitchen sideboard, one book-case, one bureau, dining-room chairs, one parlor hanging lamp, etc.

Purchased Field Kitchen

The Walkerton branch of the South Bruce Women's Institute and the ladies of the Soldiers Aid have each purchased a field kitchen for the use of the men going to the front. The two kitchens will be brought to Walkerton and exhibited on the Exhibition grounds on Sept 15th, the second day of the Fair. They will be presented to the 71st regiment which is now being formed at London.

A Successful Tournament.

The third annual tournament of the Walkerton Bowling Club, held this week, despite impossible weather on Monday, was a success. There were forty-two rinks entered in the competition all but eight of which were from neighboring towns. There were rinks present from Southampton, Port Elgin, Lucknow, Wiarton, Owen Sound, Chesley, Ripley, Teeswater, Harriston, Clifford, London, Mitchell, Kincardine, Hanover, Cargill, Paisley and other towns. Bowling commenced at 11.30 on Monday morning, continued until four o'clock Tuesday a. m. and was recommenced at nine o'clock and continued without cession until Wednesday morning at 1.30, the last bowls being thrown in the final of the consolation when the roosters were sending forth their clarion to the awakening town. The prize winners were:—Trophy competition, 1st. Zimmerman of Cargill, 2nd McLaughlin of Chesley. Association, 1st. Tilker of Harriston, 2nd, Bell of Southampton, Consolation, 1st. Shoemaker of Paisley, 2nd. Trout of Wiarton. The only Walkerton rink to make a showing was that comprised of C. H. Rogers, N. Hiscox, H. G. Hunter and T. Pye skip, who succeeded in reaching the semi-finals of the trophy event, but were put out of all three competitions. Owing to the heavy call for advertising space this week, we are unable to publish the results of each game.

Walkerton Enters the Finals

The second game of the semi-final N. B. L. baseball matches between Owen Sound and Walkerton played here on Saturday afternoon resulted in another win for the locals by a score of 6-4 and thus they have qualified to enter the finals with Wingham. The game was the most exciting and best exhibition of baseball on the local diamond this year. Walkerton scored one run in the second two in the third two in the fifth and one in the eighth while the visitors were held scoreless in the sixth when two men crossed the plate and to these were added two more in the seventh. The rally of Owen Sound in the seventh made the score 5-4 and their stock rose rapidly. The rally was short-lived, however, and in the remaining two innings they failed to tally. One of the most spectacular plays of the season was pulled off by Wilson at centre field when in the ninth innings he nabbed a long fly with his left hand after a thirty yard sprint. Smith at right field, also starred, catching three almost impossible ones. Walkerton now plays Wingham for the silverware and are confident of winning the championship. The teams lined up:—

Communication

Walkerton, Sept. 6th, '15

To the Editor of the Telescope.

Dear Sir:—

On reading the comments in the Bruce Herald and Times of last issue on the inauguration of the electric lights at Formosa, I notice that some comments were made which were misleading to the public, insomuch, that these statements conveyed to the public mind that the citizens of Formosa, also surrounding country turned on more beer-taps than electric lights. I say without fear of contradiction that personally I never saw a more orderly and respectable crowd gathered together than was at Formosa. I also made frequent visits to the hotels and saw no boozing there. Also said hotels closed at 10 p. m. sharp. I hope the editor of the Herald-Times and his informer will retract what they have said. My friends and others went out to have a pleasant time and we had it and perhaps conducted ourselves better than those who stayed at home to knock the good old town of Formosa.

Yours truly

JNO. ROWLAND.

Jocelin's Penance

His very heart yearned for the beer and warmth of a home; the clinging touch of a woman's hand, and that pride and joy of possession which fills and thrills a father's heart as he watches his wife with a child upon her bosom. So intense was his gaze that Robese felt and resented it, and turned upon him, knitting her white brow beneath its dusky hood. Jocelin, moved by that frown, broke forth with suppressed passion:

"Nay, madam, frown not on a poor shaveling, who but seeketh to imprint thine image on his starved and empty heart!" Startled at his vehemence, Robese shrank from him, and turned her horse toward her companions. But Jocelin had no opportunity to say more, for around the angle of the abbey wall came the gleam of torches, and the rattle of accoutrements, and Abbot Samson, accompanied by attendants, came toward them. He rode a large black mule, with gilded bridle and saddle and housings rich in jewels, which sparkled in the light of the cressets. The Abbot sat his steed well; a portly, martial man, with ruddy face, piercing, bushy-browed eyes, and eagle-beaked nose, with grizzly russet beard falling upon his purple gown, over which he wore a rich fur cloak, clasped with one blazing ruby set in gold.

Jocelin drew rein like one stunned at this unlooked-for appearance, and Robese and her train did likewise. The Abbot's face was stern, and his eyes gleamed angrily beneath their pent brows. But Robese, undismayed, bent low in her saddle at his "Benedicite," and in smiling sauciness cried out, "Goden, our Liege; and Holy Father, what came ye forth to seek?" The Abbot started at the sound of her clear, young voice and glancing at her lovely merry face, his brow cleared, and he answered in a tone he meant to be kindly:

"Madam, I find a fair vassal where I sought a disobedient monk!" Here he darted a lightning glance at Jocelin, who shrank under his rebuke, and drew back into the shadow of the trees, murmuring, "A renegade, a renegade!"

"Had thy vassal e'er seen thy kind face, my Liege, she would not have tarried over night to prepare such poor woman's gauds with which she sought to win favor in the sight of her dread Lord," answered Robese softly, moving her horse to the Abbot's side, and meekly bowing before him that he might touch her head in blessing.

"It was not needful, my daughter," smiled the Abbot; "the swan needeth to borrow no feathers," and he took her rounded chin in his hand and looked straight into her clear eyes.

"Thou art somewhat like thy father, child, but thou hast thy mother's own look in thine eyes," and he kissed her gravely on the brow, with a muttered blessing and a half-suppressed sigh; and Robese looked trustingly into his strong face, and felt that here she had found a shield and a buckler for her orphaned heart, with intuitive wisdom realizing the advantage she had gained over any possible suitor in rallying so strong an ally; and she murmured to Mary, who had now drawn near, with Master Nicholas and Gilbert, "Poppet, we'll wed no man, save at your will."

When the Master of Horse and Gilbert had been received by the Abbot, the former fell behind with Robese's attendants, and Jocelin, of whom none took notice, spurred his jennet among his brother monks, and rode with them to the Abbey, giving scant answer to their eager questionings.

The Seneschal rode up beside John O'Dice, his brother, and after a fraternal greeting, the monk, nodding his head toward Jocelin, asked, "And what delayed the youngster?"

"Some woman's frippery stayed our lady, brother John, an' the monk tarried at her command to escort her."

"Aye, it's not the first time monk tarried at the command of rosy lips, Gilbert," chuckled the other, with a dig in the rib of his less robust relative which nearly unseated that worthy.

"How now ye Abbey lubbers grow rough!" he protested peevishly. When he had righted himself again, he queried:

"But the Abbot seemeth wroth. Is it the way of his to so rave at such a small disobedience?"

"Nay," answered the monk, "our father ever saleth his anger, but for some reason he willed not thy lady at Bradfield now, and Jocelin should have returned to the Abbey ere his Highness, the Prince, came. But this delay, the unlooked for coming hence of the lady, and the untimely arrival of the prince and Queen-mother, hath sorely discomposed his Lordship."

"What! the Prince and Queen at the Abbey? Zounds!" and old Gilbert straightened himself, involuntarily, in the saddle. "By the death of the saints, John O'Dice, then we are really going to court!"

"Yes, oldster, an' a right grand sight it is, for our Abbas Dominus keepeth open house, more like unto some rich and mighty lord, to my mind, than the superior of a handful of sack-clothed brethren."

But their gossip was brought to an end by the arrival of the cavalcade at the gate of the Abbot's house; here the porter opened to their knock with a "Benedicite," and the monks entered and dispersed to their various quarters.

The Abbot and the rest of the party soon arrived; the brothers' Hospitilar came forth and the steeds disappeared as if by magic, Robese's train gladly following a good hostler to the refectory.

"I must make thee excuse, daughter," said the Abbot, "for not receiving thine henchmen, but indeed the hall, parlors, chambers; yea, even the butteries and kitchens, of Bradfield house are thronged like a beehive, for Prince John and the Queen have large retinues."

"Ah, madam," whispered Mary, giving her lady's arm a squeeze, "perhaps 'tis the prince himself the Abbot intends thee for. By your lady, thou art good as queen already." Robese only shook her head at her irrepressible forewoman, but a red spot glowed on her fair cheek and there was a flash in her eye which boded little good to the husband forced upon her, be he prince or peasant.

Surrounded by bowing courtiers, the Abbot led his ward up the marble steps into the arched vestibule of Bradfield house. They crossed a great hall; it was eighty feet long, with three aisles, and far down the vista Robese could catch a glimpse of a dais half curtained from the rest of the hall, where the Prince and Queen Elinor sat with their lords and ladies about them, while music and laughter filled the air.

In the upper part of the hall there was a hurrying to and fro of richly dressed servants, pages and gentlemen, and a few passing monks, pausing to look on the scene with wistful eyes. Along the walls on either side were brazen sconces holding great waxen tapers, and the Abbot signed with a finger, whereon the pontifical ring blazed like a tiny sun, to an attendant, who took one from its socket and went before them into the Abbot's private parlor; a small, but elegant room, hung with purple damask embroidered with the Episcopal insignia. Here the Abbot, laying aside cloak and cap, seated himself, first drawing a stool near his own chair for Robese. Mary withdrew to the other side of the parlor, he began in a low voice.

"My daughter, it vexeth me sore that thou art come hither this day. Had Jocelin returned as I bade, I could have prevented thy coming."

"Nay, Father, I did but in courtesy beg that he wait, as I was desirous to come at once. Chide me not for an unimportant happening; what matters a few hours?"

"Unimportant, sweet Chox?" The Abbot frowned and tugged at his beard. "By my signet ring, Lady Robese, thou thinkest as light of disregarding the wishes of thy Suzerain as the forest [illegible] of answering not a page's whistle." The sternness of his tone somewhat disconcerted Robese, but she only sighed, and looked down upon her folded hands as if to say, "I am an orphan maid; 'tis cruel to be unkind to such an one." Perhaps she conveyed this idea to Abbot Samson by that mysterious way women have of impressing men without the aid of speech.

"Be it as it may," he continued in a milder tone.

"Man proposeth and woman doeth as she will. 'T was ever thus; one of thy soft and gentle sex will wreck a kingdom and wonder if men smile not thereat."

"[illegible], the Queen is here, and Prince John, too, with his dissolute followers. Think'st thou Bradfield a fit place for a maid, so filled with [illegible] courtiers and [illegible]."

"Surely, my lord, her Majesty will give me protection, and place me among her ladies."

"Jean [illegible], my poor lamb, that thou shouldst fall into such a wolf den," the Abbot murmured to himself. "But it matters not now, thou art here, and the court is here, and we must entertain them with all due courtesy and patience; I must say patience, 'tis enjoined by our order, but I like not their visits," and the Abbot rose and paced the parlor for a few moments, a regal figure in his rich robes, far removed from the lowly monk who, travel-stained, dejected, naked of foot, and coarsely clad, once lay in the Abbey prison.

"Yet come, come," he said finally; "thou needst rest and food. Wilt sup with me, child, in this parlor?" Robese, pleading fatigue, declined, and he rang for a page.

"Conduct the Lady de Cokefield and her tirewoman to the guest chamber, and send proper refreshments thither," and mistress and maid, having received his lordship's benison, followed their sprightly young guide through narrow corridors up a stair, and finally came to a long, low chamber which fronted the east way. Adjoining this were sleeping rooms for Robese and Mistress Mary, and here the page left them to arrange their belongings, which they found piled there. He soon returned, however, with a small pasty, some delicate tarts, and a great goblet of hot spiced wine, which he set forth, and with an impudent wink at Mistress Mary, and a low bow to Robese, was seen in the corridor outside their door, [illegible] whistling away; he paused to say knowingly, with a nod toward the hall below them:

"His lordship, the Abbot, hath ordered this corridor door close barred."

CHAPTER X.

Stern as was the Abbot's reprimand, and keenly as Jocelin felt his displeasure, he entered into a penance of a ten days' fare of bread and water, and banishment from the Abbot's court, almost gladly; for, after all, rewards and punishments are from within, and the real punishment of the young monk consisted, not so much in remorse for his disobedience, but for the state of mind which prompted it.

The Abbot's rule was despotic. Held in absolute awe and reverence by his inferiors, he was obeyed unquestionably, and served in all humility, as a mighty spiritual ruler. As a temporal lord, his power was hardly less great; within the four crosses that bounded his wide domain, land and water were his; men, women and children his vassals, and mighty barons must uphold his standard, and obey his mandates, only second to the King's.

The townsman paid for pasturage on his commons; market men could not sell their goods until Abbey buyers picked, and even the Folkmote was presided over by an alderman who held his horn of office from the Abbot.

Jocelin's failure to return to the Abbey was a grievous mistake, which by reason of frustrating the Abbot's plans, bade fair to change the whole life of one for whom the monk would have sacrificed everything. But unaware of the result of his delay, and in his ignorance attaching no significance to the presence of Prince John at Bradfield, Jocelin, in his cell, pondered on his stay at De Cokefeld castle, and his enamourment of Robese, until in a few days he began to be ashamed, and despised the sudden gust of passion which had so bent him. "I am no better than a reed shaken by the wind," he told himself, and finally having come to regard the whole happening as a temptation of the devil, he began to liken himself to St. Anthony, and become wonderfully uplifted and exalted in spirit. After a day of such contemplation and much prayer, Jocelin felt that peace had once more come upon his perturbed spirit, and he set to work upon a special manuscript for the library. Having written the Canticles on a tinted parchment, he had begun to illumine a border of pomegranates and passion flower around each page of these love songs of Solomon.

"My fault atoned for by fasting and prayer," he told himself, as he painted a royal purple petal, "reinstated in our Father's favor, I can meet and greet the fairest of the land without an added heart beat. Verily the flesh is weak, but the spirit is the conqueror." But here Jocelin fell into the common error of inexperience, in imagining that any effect ever dies. A misdeed, be it ever so small, leaves a scar on the character of the committer which time cannot remove. Thoughts and deeds write life's history in indelible characters, which tears nor blood can erase. Jocelin also erred in thinking that the flame of passion once kindled in a virgin heart can be quenched by any amount of reasoning or pious meditation. Love is a natural law, and whoever falls beneath its power must work out his own salvation for good or ill. Heredity, environment, mental and moral training, may elaborate the relations of man and woman, but ever the male will seek his mate, and the female yearn for hers, as truly as two fluids separated by a membrane will mingle by the law of osmosis.

As Jocelin painted and moralized, he paused to read a line of the text. Before the sight of a beautiful young woman had awakened in him visions of new possibilities in life, Jocelin had often wondered why it was said that the Rabbins of old forbade the young men of the synagogues the reading of the Canticles. Now he knew. Every word of the lover's passionate appeal started forth on the page, as if in letters of fire.

"Thou art fair, my love,
Thou hast dove's eyes within thy locks;
Thy lips are like a thread of scarlet."

Robese's flower-like face came between him and the page again and again, till it so blurred beneath his eyes that he could not see to paint upon it; and in despair, he threw aside the brush and went out in the garden.

It was golden mellow day. A few leaves fluttered down now and then in gorgeous bouquets of scarlet and gold; the trees and sod still retained a tinge of green, and a golden haze seemed to mingle and melt into the rich landscape. Yet the sadness of adieu was in the air, as if the earth was mourning the passing of the fair summer, and the pale blue sky seemed to bend low over the Abbey garden. From the forest sounded faintly the dull thud of the chopper's axe, and the acrid, pungent scent of burning leaves came from the orchard, where Brother Tristan, his rusty brown robe well kilted above his bare shanks, raked and burned the fallen leaves and the long sere grasses, droning a plaintive chant as he worked.

Jocelin paced up and down the walk with bowed head, unconsciously keeping time with the dirge-like song of old Tristan. His mood of religious exaltation had passed into one of fierce rebellion against the existing order of things, and a passionate crying out for the joys denied him by reason of the oath he had sworn at the high altar of St. Edmund's; though the training of a lifetime aided him in stoutly resisting this new evil which assailed him and threatened to uproot the deepest teachings from the young monk's heart. "We are betrayed by what is false within," and false or true, this new inclination fought against all old [illegible] and feelings, and when Jocelin was most sure that he had defeated it, it the sternest to conquer him. Thus he paused to and fro, the warning of the singer falling unheeded on his ear:

"Men are like grass,
Our lives they pass,
As swiftly as the river flows
Love's [illegible] lifts up its dew-rimmed head;
It buds and blooms,
And then its doom,
Till all at once we feel a cold,
And know that we are growing old."

But what dreamer or lover ever heeded warning until too late, when the dreams fade, leaving him still stranded on the cruel rocks of reality. So Jocelin fought the fight with himself, the bitter battle of the spiritual arrayed against the natural man, until a brother came down the colonnade and called to him; but he was so engrossed that the other spoke several times before he lifted his head.

"Jesu, Jesu! my young brother," cried Walter the Medicus, in a peevish tone; "where art thy wits woolgathering? I have come but late from Bradfield house, and our lord has deigned to forget thy little indiscretion, and wills that thou appear in his hall today to attend on him. His highness holdeth court."

"Nay, not to-day, Brother Walter; not to-day," impatiently murmured Jocelin, scarcely knowing what he said. "I must pass the time till compline in meditation and self-interrogation. I pray thee have me excused for this day from attendance at Bradfield."

"How now?" exclaimed Walter, testily. "If thou showeth not appreciation of the Abbot's forgiveness, thou goest to pot. By our Lady, art verily ruined and wasted! Our lord is not a patient man, young shaveling, and we oldsters had much ado to bring about this pardon. 'Twas by our intercession this revokement was made."

"If she had not wished me to love her, she should ne'er spake me so fairly," muttered Jocelin. "Ehue!"

"What!" cried Brother Walter, greatly scandalized; his little light eyes narrowed to points with curiosity; "what sayest thou, my goose?"

This brought Jocelin to his senses. "What say I, my frere? I but murmured a line of the Canticles. Depart in peace; I thank thee and thy confreres for their intercession, and will attend on his lordship anon." Brother Walter trotted away in the rapid jerky pace peculiar to him, muttering to himself as he went, "I am little learned in the scriptures, but I vow a candle to our Lady that young Jocelin ne'er learned such sayings from the great Solomon."

Inefficiency of Broken Steel.

Experience has shown that the end of a bar of steel that has been broken the box was severed from its bindings off should never be used for the working or cutting end of a die or punch. The fibers in the end of such a bar have been so severely strained in breaking that the steel is unsuitable for performing the work done by a punch or die. The broken end should be made the shank of the punch, while the end of the bar that was cut off should be used for the cutting end of the tool.

TORONTO'S MOST POPULAR SUMMER DISSIPATION IS CITY DAIRY ICE CREAM the demand has spread from year to year until it is now on sale in nearly every town in Ontario. There seems to be something about the climate of Canada that makes it the confection that everybody craves in warm weather—infants, invalids, children or grown-ups, it makes no difference what your state or station. City Dairy Ice Cream is most refreshing, nourishing and digestible.

A Giant Among Dwarfs.

The intellect and genius of Franklin were perhaps never more manifest than when, as the colonial agent of Pennsylvania, he appeared before the British House of Commons in order to undergo an inquisition into the taxation questions which were brewing the trouble which subsequently resulted in American freedom. No fewer than 200 questions were propounded to him by some of the ablest legal and political minds of the old country. To each and every one of them he replied in a masterful manner. Edmund Burke in commenting on the matter said that Franklin reminded him of "a man being examined by a parcel of schoolboys," while Charles James Fox remarked that his inquisitors were "dwarfs in the hands of a giant."

CHILDHOOD DANGERS

No symptoms that indicate any of the ailments of childhood should be allowed to pass without prompt attention. The little ailment may soon become a serious one and perhaps a little life passes out. If Baby's Own Tablets are kept in the house minor troubles can be promptly cured and serious ones averted. The Tablets can be given to the new-born babe as well as the growing child. Thousands of mothers use no other medicine for their little ones. They are sold by medicine dealers or by mail at 25 cents a box from The Dr. Williams' Medicine Co., Brockville, Ont.

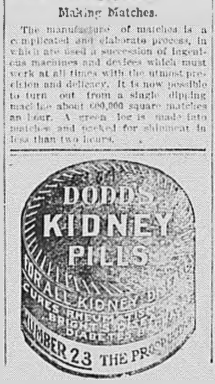
Making Matches.

The manufacture of matches is a complicated and elaborate process, in which are used a succession of ingenious machines and devices which must work at all times with the utmost precision and delicacy. It is now possible to turn out from a single dipping machine about 600,000 square matches an hour. A green log is made into matches and packed for shipment in less than two hours.



Men Eat More Than Women.

That men eat 5 or 6 per cent. more than women—not because they are gluttons, but because they actually require that much more nourishment—appears as a result of an investigation made in the nutrition laboratory of the Carnegie Institute at Washington by Francis G. Benedict and L. E. Emmes, says the Literary Digest. The reason for the discrepancy seems to be that women have a smaller proportion of active tissue than men of the same weight and more inactive material, such as fat. The investigation disclosed that the average woman generates only 1,365 heat units in the twenty-four hours as against 1,63[illegible] produced by the man, or about 2 per cent. more for the latter per lb. of body weight. When groups were compared after careful selection of individuals of nearly the same height and weight the men were found to produce about 12 per cent. more heat than women.

AN ARMY AND A MOB.

It's Discipline That Makes the Difference Between Them.

An army is not an army, but a mob, unless every item in it can be trusted to do the same thing at the same moment at the word of command. So obedience is not a virtue in a soldier, but a necessity, for unless he learns it he cannot attain to the military virtues. It has been proved, for instance, again and again that obedience is the way to courage.

When it is a habit with men they face danger as they form fours because they are told to, and the habit of obedience is stronger in them than their natural fears. It is, in fact, part of a soldier's technique, and unless he has learned it he is an amateur liable to stage fright.

There may, of course, be an irrational discipline which destroys a soldier's intelligence, as irrational technique destroys intelligence in any craft. But the fact remains that soldiers have to learn obedience by means of a training specially designed to teach them obedience, just as a musician has to practice scales. When he has learned it he can exercise his intelligence far better than if he had not learned it because he is braver and cooler for having learned it.—London Times.

Lonely.

I hate night to come, for I dread it,
I am sorry the work hours have flown.
That stairway—in sickness I tread it—
I shudder to think I'm alone.
Alone in the home—there's no feeling
Akin to such aching as this—
Alone to my bedroom I'm stealing,
No babies to cover and kiss.

Now gone are the joys and the gladness
That made it a haven of rest;
Now heavy its rooms are with sadness,
And dreary its halls at the best.
The stairway—in mockery squeaking—
I answer each night with a groan,
For this unto me it is speaking:
"Old man, you're at home and alone!"

I hate night to come with its bedtime,
I shudder to think through the day
That home, with its terrible dread-time
Awaits—and the children away.
For home that is filled of the laughter
And prattle of innocent mirth,
From cellar to topshelf and rafter
Is the loneliest spot on the earth.

NOBEL'S GREAT GIFT.

Yearly Prizes That Come From the Fund He Left to Posterity.

Alfred B. Nobel, the Swedish scientist and inventor of dynamite, died in 1896, leaving his fortune, which was estimated at $9,000,000, to the founding of a fund of which the interest should be yearly given as prizes to those persons who had during the year contributed most to "the good of humanity." The interest is divided in five equal shares, awarded as follows:

"One to the person who in the domain of physics has made the most important discovery or invention, one to the person who has made the most important chemical discovery or invention, one to the person who has made the most important discovery in the domain of medicine or physiology, one to the person who in literature has provided the most excellent work of an idealistic tendency and one to the person who has worked most or best for the fraternization of nations and the abolition or reduction of standing armies and the calling and propagating of peace congresses."

The value of each prize is, on an average, $40,000. The awards for physics and chemistry are given by the Swedish Academy of Science, that for physiological or medical work by the Caroline Institute (the faculty of medicine in Stockholm), that for literature by the Swedish Academy of Stockholm and the peace prize by a committee of five persons elected by the Norwegian storthing.—Philadelphia Press.

Sleep Without Drugs.

"Doc, how can I get to sleep without using dope?" asked a man troubled with insomnia of a noted physician.

"On going to bed assume a comfortable attitude in which every muscle is relaxed," said the doctor, "but not the attitude in which you are accustomed to go to sleep, though something resembling it. Every movement, even coughing and yawning, must be strictly repressed, especially the desire to turn over. Maintain the same attitude without change, constantly resisting the longing to move or turn over. As a rule, by the end of fifteen or twenty minutes of this you will find yourself growing very drowsy and then, just as the desire to roll over become absolutely uncontrollable turn with the least possible effort and assume the position in which you habitually go to sleep. Natural sleep should follow at once. This method seldom fails. Give it a thorough trial at least before resorting to a drug to bring sleep."—Buffalo Express.

Perfection of Womanhood.

Upon the silent sands
She stands,
And for some thousand years has stood,
The sign of perfect womanhood.
A suffragette?
Not yet.
For thus far she has never tried
To swat man's pride;
Nor by her frenzied deeds
Upset his creeds;
Nor ever cast a vote,
Nor put on pants,
Nor had the whiskers grow
On that severe expanse
Of face she shows
To every man who goes
Her Way
And say,
In all the years and years and years
Of history—of—hopes and fears
Oh, ladies, how to silence all,
The Sphinx has never talked at all,
The Sphinx has never talked at all,
The Sphinx has never talked at all,
THE SPHINX HAS NEVER TALKED AT ALL!
Aye, there she stands
Upon the silent sands,
And for some thousands years has stood,
The sign of perfect womanhood.

White Man's Graveyard.

Africa is a remarkably beautiful country. Its coast lines are picturesque, graceful, fascinating, alluring. Its seaport towns and cities are usually clean, pretty and reasonably healthful. Equatorial Africa has, until the last two decades, been called the white man's graveyard, but clean living, quinine, mosquito netting, sobriety and sanitary improvements have made Africa a place where one can not only exist, but live in as much comfort, take it all in all during the year, as in the city of New York.—New York Telegram.

Bad Spellers.

Lord Wolseley noted that spelling had been the weak point of many great commanders. He was defending Marlborough against the charge of illiteracy, brought by Lord Chesterfield for one, who said he was "eminently illiterate, wrote bad English and spelt it worse." Wolseley replied that a great many of Marlborough's distinguished contemporaries, such as Lord Chancellor Somers, spelled quite as badly and that Wellington and Napoleon also were among those who could never learn to do it properly.—London Telegraph.

The Robins.

"The robins are not good solo singers," wrote Lowell, discoursing of his garden acquaintance, "but their chorus, as like primitive fire worshippers they hail the return of light and warmth to the world, is unrivaled. There are a hundred singing like one. They are noisy enough then, and sing, as poets should, with no after thought. But when they come after cherries to the tree near my window, they muffle their voices and their faint pip, pip, pop! sounds far away at the bottom of the garden, where they know I shall not suspect them of robbing the great black-walnut of its bitter-rined store. They are feathered Pecksniffs, to be sure; but then how brightly their breasts, rather shabby in the sunlight, shine on a rainy day, against the dark green of the fringe tree! ... For my part I would rather have his cheerfulness and kind neighborhood than many berries!"

Sickroom Clothing.

Clothing used in the sickroom never should be put in the laundry bag after it is used. Place it in a clothes boiler at once and cover with boiling water and soap solution and allow to come to the boiling point. Clothing used in infectious diseases should be treated this way for three successive days. This not only kills matured bacteria, but any undeveloped spores as well. When the sickroom clothing is of thin, delicate fabric the washing in the soap solution and hot water, followed by rinsing in hot water, will be sufficient. In such material the heat of the iron in ironing will complete the sterilization. It is advisable always to have some of the soap solution ready for use. Cut the soap in small pieces, cover with cold water and set on the back of the stove to dissolve. For one boiler of clothes use enough solution to make a thick suds.—Today's Magazine.

Regulating Bread Prices.

A simple plan for the regulation of bread prices was in vogue in England from the time of Henry III. to the beginning of the nineteenth century. The "assize of bread" was set every week by the authorities of every borough and manor, when the price of the loaf was regulated by the ruling price of wheat, the margin of reasonable profit being left to the baker and miller. Departure from the official price was heavily punished.—London Mirror.

How to Keep Things.

Keep meal and flour in a cool, dry place.

Keep yeast in wood or granite ironware.

Keep fresh lard in granite ironware vessels.

Keep vinegar in wood, glass or granite ironware.

Keep crusts and pieces of bread in a granite ironware bucket, covered closely, in a dry, cool place.

Oil of sassafras, applied full strength, is excellent for chilblains.

GERMAN PLOTS IN THE STATES.

Shortly after the present war began German plots came to their work in the United States. These were followed by Dr. Dernburg and certain German professors who attempted to poison the mind of the people against the allies and even tried to prejudice the American people against their own country and in favor of Germany. Threats were made against the political life of the President, and a German-American party would be formed to defeat him at the next election. Efforts were made to prevent the United States from selling goods to the allies, and we have the authority of Mr. Gompers for saying that German agents fomented strikes in the U. S. munition factories with a view to prevent their manufacture or exportation.

The New York World asserts that it has documentary proof of a widespread German plot in the States. This proof has been forwarded to the President at Washington, and is said to implicate Count Bernstorff, the German Ambassador; Dr. Dernburg and other German notables. While its aim was to paralyze all efforts to make or sell munitions to the allies, it contemplated not only the purchase of newspapers, but even the American Press Association. There was also in view the purchase of certain munition factories, which are named, and funds were raised to pay men to strike. While Germany sought to prevent all traffic between Britain and America, she was planning to open up trade through some neutral country whereby she could get munitions of war for herself. While Austria was calling upon the States to cease exporting to Britain, they were preparing a scheme whereby they could get American supplies sent to them.

Count Bernstorff, confronted with the evidence, refuses to talk for publication. No doubt he needs time to concoct some story in the hope of saving himself from trouble. The matter, we understand, is now in the hands of the President. What stage he will take in the face of such a conspiracy we have no means of knowing. But he will scarcely remain quiet, at a time when the Kaiser seems to be doing his best to run the United States of America for his own selfish purposes.

◆

THIS IS OUR WAR TOO.

We are not fighting for Britain, we are not fighting for the Empire primarily; we are fighting for our lives, with Canada as the stake. Not only has the Kaiser declared that he wants a "place in the sun," but a dominant German political body has declared that Germany must extend her colonial possessions as a result of the war. Britain cannot be held by the Germans under any conditions. But if she were successful, there is no country Germany desires more than Canada. We are fighting for our own hearths and homes, and every [illegible] man should understand this. As [illegible] it that we should and could to make it impossible that this country can be Prussianized? It is said that [illegible] Canada will want [illegible] her population [illegible] a formidable force of 150,000 men in [illegible] to form a very important [illegible] in the decision of the contest. [illegible] at least one in ten of her population in arms, and probably one in [illegible], and Britain has probably one in twelve. Mr. N. W. Rowell, the Liberal leader, declares that Canada should have 300,000 men at the front, and the Montreal Gazette says that these men could be forthcoming, and it adds: "Canada, as part of the British Empire, has to help to the utmost to victory, for her territory would be legitimate spoil for the enemy, if the fortunes of war [illegible] possibility went against the allies." Australia and New Zealand are doing if anything better than Canada in proportion to population, and Australia proposes to take a register of her population to find out what more she can do to bring this war to a successful close.

People ask us how long the war will last. [illegible] in France and Flanders, it may last until doomsday. Since the battles of the Marne and the Aisne there has been much fighting, but little progress. If Paris and Calais are still safe from the Germans, Germany is still safe from the allies. No man [illegible] what may happen in Russia or [illegible]. The Russians may be so driven back that they cannot return for months, if ever they return, and should Von Hindenburg and [illegible] be let loose upon the western theatre of war the result might be [illegible]. What [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] but [illegible] [illegible] to make [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] and should [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] of the other [illegible], and if [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible].

[illegible] young men with [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] and a half millions of Germans in the United States ready to strike. Canada should be prepared for all eventualities.

Sir Edward Grey answered the question how long will the war last when he said in reply to the speeches of the German Chancellor and Minister of War:

"The speeches of the German Chancellor and Finance Minister make it clear that Germany is fighting for supremacy and tribute. If that is so, and so long as it is so, our Allies and we are fighting and must fight for the right to live, not under German supremacy, but in real freedom and safety."

While this merciless war is devastating almost the whole world, and while our allies are largely composed of members of the Catholic Church, the man who will raise his voice in attack on their religious belief is little better than a traitor and a spy. While Belgium is lying bleeding and prostrate, France fighting with heroic desperation and Italy battling for our rights it is monstrous that any British subject can be found to flout and jeer at them because of their religion. We prefer to believe that no man in his sane senses would be so misguided.

He is credited with making the following charge against the German-born clergymen of the Lutheran church. "You see, the Kaiser is the Bishop of the Lutheran Church, and the Canadian church is chiefly under the United States synod, which adopted the German point of view that England was responsible for starting the war. These ministers are continually preaching enmity and disloyalty against Great Britain, and the German farmers read nothing but German papers."

THE Changeling

if Margaret were found she wished to know it, and if she were not found it was surely her duty to go at once and tell them where she was. But could she walk? She stepped upon the floor and tried. Her limbs trembled beneath her weight, and, sinking into a chair, she cried, "I can't, I can't."

Half an hour later, she heard the sound of wheels. A neighboring farmer was returning home from Richland, and had taken the cross-road as his shortest route. "Perhaps he will let me ride," she thought, and hobbling to the door she called after him, making known her request. Wondering what "new freak" had entered her mind, the man consented, and just as it was growing dark he set her down at Madam Conway's gate, where half fearfully, the bewildered woman gazed around. The windows of Margaret's room were open, a figure moved before them, Margaret might be there, and entering the hall door unobserved, she began to ascend the stairs, crawling upon her hands and knees, and pausing several times to rest.

It was nearly dark in the sick-room, and as Mrs. Jeffrey had just gone out, and Theo, in the parlor below, was enjoying a quiet talk with her husband, Madam Conway was quite alone. For a time she lay thinking of Margaret, then her thoughts turned upon George, and his "amazing proposition." "Such unheard of insolence!" she exclaimed, and she was proceeding farther with her soliloquy, when a peculiar noise upon the stairs without caught her ear, and, raising herself upon her elbow, she listened intently to the sound which came nearer and nearer, and seemed like some one creeping slowly, painfully, for she could hear at intervals a long drawn breath, or groan, and with a vague feeling of uneasiness she awaited anxiously the appearance of her visitor; nor waited long, for the half-closed door swung slowly back, and through the gathering darkness the shape came crawling on, over the threshold, into the room, toward the corner, its limbs distorted and bent, its white hair sweeping the floor. With a smothered cry, Madam Conway hid beneath the bed-clothes, looking cautiously out at the singular object which came creeping on until the bed was reached. It touched the counterpane, it was struggling to regain its feet, and with a scream of horror the terrified woman cried out, "Fiend, why are you here?" while a faint voice replied, "I am looking for Margaret. I thought she was in bed"; and rising up from her crouching posture, Hagar Warren stood face to face with the woman she had so long deceived.

"Wretch!" exclaimed the latter, her pride returning, as she recognized old Hagar, and thought, "she is Margaret's grandmother. Wretch, how dare you come into my presence? Leave this room at once," and a shrill cry of "Theo, Theo" rang through the house, bringing Theo at once to the chamber, where she started involuntarily at the sight which met her view.

"Who is it? Who is it?" she exclaimed.

"It's Hagar Warren. Take her away!" screamed Madam Conway; while Hagar, raising her withered hand deprecatingly, said, "hear me first. Do you know where Margaret is? Has she been found?"

"No, no," answered Theo, bounding to her side, while Madam Conway forgot to scream, and bent eagerly forward to listen, her symptoms of dissolution disappearing one by one, as the strange narrative proceeded, and ere its close she was nearly dressed, standing erect as ever, her face glowing and her eyes lighted up with joy.

"Gone to Leominster! Henry Warner's half-sister!" she exclaimed. "Why didn't she add a postscript to that letter and tell us so? though the poor child couldn't think of everything; and then, unmindful of George Douglas, who at that moment entered the room, she continued: "I should suppose Douglas might have found it out ere this. But the moment I put my eye upon that woman, I knew no child of hers would ever know enough to find Margaret. The Warners are a tolerably good family, I presume. I'll go after her at once. Theo, bring my brochet shawl, and wouldn't you wear my satin hood? 'Twill be warmer than my leghorn."

"Grandma," said Theo, in utter astonishment, "what do you mean? You surely are not going to Leominster to-night, as sick as you are?"

"Yes, I am going to Leominster to-night," answered the decided woman, "and this gentleman," waving her hand majestically toward George, "will oblige me much by seeing that the carriage is brought out."

Theo was about to remonstrate, when George whispered, "let her go; Henry and Rose are probably not at home, but Margaret may be there. At all events a little airing will do the old lady good"; and rather pleased than otherwise with the expedition, he went after John, who pronounced his mistress crazier than Hagar."

But it wasn't for him to dictate, and grumbling at the prospect before him, he harnessed his horses and drove them to the door, where Madam Conway was already in waiting.

"See that everything is in order for our return," she said to Theo, who promised compliance, and then, herself bewildered, listened to the carriage as it rolled away. It seemed so like a dream that the woman, who three hours before, could scarcely speak aloud, had now started for a ride of many miles in the damp night-air! But love can accomplish miracles, and it made the eccentric lady strong, buoying up her spirits, and prompting her to cheer on the coachman, until just as the dawn grew rosy in the east Leominster town appeared in view. The house was found, the carriage steps let down, and then with a slight trembling in her limbs, Madam Conway alighted and walked up the gravelled path, casting eager, searching glances around, and commenting as follows:

"Everything is in good taste: they must be somebody, these Warners. I'm glad it's no worse." And with each new indication of refinement in Margaret's relatives, the distance seemed less and less in the mind of the proud Englishwoman.

The ringing of the bell brought down Janet, who with an inquisitive look at the satin hood and bundle of shawls, ushered the stranger into the parlor, and then went for her mistress. Taking the card her servant brought, Mrs. Warner read with some little trepidation, the name, "Madam Conway, Hillsdale." From what she had heard, she was not prepossessed in the lady's favor, but curious to know why she was there at this early hour, she hastened to the making of her toilet, and went down to the parlor, where Madam Conway sat, coiled in one corner of the sofa, which she had satisfied herself, was covered with real brocatelle, as were also the chairs within the room. The tables of rosewood and marble, and the [illegible] curtains had none of them escaped her notice, and in a mood which more common furniture would never have produced, Madam Conway arose to meet Mrs. Warner, who received her politely, and then waited to hear her errand.

It was told in a few words. She had come for Margaret—Margaret, whom she had loved for eighteen years, and could not now cast off, even though she were not of the Conway and Devenport extraction.

"I can easily understand how painful must have been the knowledge that Maggie was not your own," returned Mrs. Warner, "for she is a girl of whom many ones might be proud, but you are laboring under a mistake—Henry is not her brother." And then, very briefly, she explained the matter to Madam Conway, who, having heard so much was now surprised at nothing, and who felt, it may be, a little gratified at knowing that Henry was, after all, nothing to Margaret, save the husband of her sister. Yet a terrible disappointment awaited her. "Margaret was not there," [illegible] were her lamentation that some time elapsed ere Mrs. Warner could make her listen, while she explained that "Mr. Carrollton had found Maggie the day previous at the Falls, that they were probably in Albany now, and would reach Hillsdale that very night, such, at least, was the import of the telegram which Mrs. Warner had received the evening before. "They wish to surprise you, undoubtedly," she said, "and consequently have not informed you."

This seemed probable, and, forgetting her weariness, Madam Conway resolved upon leaving [illegible] home at his leisure, while she took the Leominster cars, which reached Worcester in time for the upward train. This matter adjusted, she tried to be quiet; but her excitement increased each moment, and when at last breakfast was served she did but little justice to the tempting viands which her hostess set before her. Margaret's chamber was visited next, and very lovingly she patted and smoothed the downy pillows, for the sake of the bright head which rested there, while to herself she whispered mechanically, "Yes, yes," though to what she was giving her assent she could not tell. She only knew that she was very happy, and very impatient to be gone, and when at last she did go, it seemed to her an age ere Worcester was reached.

Resolutely turning her head away, lest she should see the scene of her disaster, when last she was in that city, she walked up and down the ladies' room, her satin hood and gaudy brochet shawl, on that warm July morning, attracting [illegible] attention. But little did she care. Margaret was the burden of her thoughts, and the appearance of Mrs. Douglas herself would scarcely have disturbed her. Much less, then, did the presence of a quietly-dressed young girl, who, entering the car with her, occupied from necessity the same seat, looking herself a little annoyed at being thus obliged to sit so near one whom she mentally pronounced "vulgarly unendurable," for not after did Madam Conway turn her face that way, so intent was she upon watching their upward speed, and counting the number of miles they had come.

When Chatham was reached, however, she did observe the woman in a shaker who, with a pail of [illegible] berries on her arm, was evidently waiting for some one.

An audible groan from the depths of the satin hood, as Betsy Jane passed out and the cars moved on, showed plainly that the mother and sister of George Douglas were recognized, particularly as the former wore the red and yellow calico, which, having been used as a "dress-up" the summer before, now did its owner service as a garment of every day wear. But not long did Madam Conway suffer her mind to dwell upon matters so trivial. Hillsdale was not far away, and was each moment nearer. Two more stations were reached, the [illegible] was [illegible]. [illegible] was in sight, the bridge appeared in view, the whistle sounded, and she was there.

Half an hour later and Theo, looking from her window, started in surprise, as she saw the village omnibus driving to their door.

"It's grandmother!" she cried, and running to meet her, she asked why she had returned so soon.

"They are coming at noon," answered the excited woman, then, hurrying into the house and throwing off her hood, she continued, "He's found her at the Falls, they are between here and Albany now; tell everybody to hurry as fast as they can; tell Hannah to make a chicken pie. Maggie was fond of that; and turkey—tell her to kill a turkey—it's Maggie's favorite dish—and ice cream, too! I wish I had come this minute," and she wiped the perspiration from her burning face.

No more mysterious hints, no more lonesome nights; no more thoughts of death for Margaret was coming home—the best-loved of them all. Joyfully the servants told to each other the glad news, disbelieving entirely the report fast gaining circulation that the queenly Maggie was lowly born, a grandchild of old Hagar. Up and down the stairs Madam Conway ran, flitting from room to room and tarrying longest in that of Margaret, where the sunlight came in softly through the half closed blind and [illegible] late summer blossoms [illegible] for the expected one.

Suddenly the country stillness was broken by a sound, deafening and shrill on ordinary occasions, but falling now like music on Madam Conway's ear, for by that sound she knew that Margaret was near. Wearily went the half hour by, and then, from the head of the tower stairs, Theo cried out, "She's coming!" while the grandmother buried her face in the pillows of the lounge, and asked to be alone when she took back to her bosom the child which was not hers.

Earnestly, as if to read the inmost soul, each looked into the other's eyes, Margaret and Theo—and while the voice of the latter was choked with tears, she wound her arms around the graceful neck, which bent to the caress, and whispered low, "You are my sister still."

[illegible] the vine-wreathed balustrade a fairy form was leaning, holding back her breath lest she should break the deep silence of that meeting. In her bosom there was no pang of fear lest Theo should be loved the best, and even had there been, it could not surely have remained, for stretching out her arm, Margaret drew her to her side, and placing her hand in that of Theo, said, "You are both my sisters now," while Arthur Carrollton, bending down, kissed the lips of the three, saying as he did so, "Thus do I acknowledge your relationship to me."

"Why don't she come?" the waiting Madam Conway sighed, just as Theo, pointing to the open door, bade Margaret "go in."

There was a blur before the lady's eyes, a buzzing in her ears and the footfall she had listened for so long was now unheard as it came slowly to her side. But the light touch upon her arm, the well-remembered voice within her ear, calling her "Madam Conway," sent through her an electric thrill, and starting up she caught the wanderer in her arms, crying ingloriously, "Not that name, Maggie darling, call me grandma, as you used to—call me grandma still," and smoothing back the long black tresses, she looked to see if grief had left its impress upon her fair young face. It was paler now, and thinner, too, than it was wont to be, and while her tears fell fast upon it, Madam Conway whispered, "You have suffered much, my child, and so have I. Why did you go away? Say, Margaret, why did you leave me all alone?"

"To learn how much you loved me," answered Margaret, to whom this moment brought happiness second only to that which she had felt when on the river bank she sat with Arthur Carrollton, and heard him tell how much she had been mourned—how lonesome was the house without her—and how sad were all their hearts.

But that was over now, no more sadness, no more tears, the lost one had returned; Margaret was home again—home in the hearts of all, and nothing could dislodge her, not even the story of her birth, which Arthur Carrollton, spurning at further deception, told to the listening servants, who, having always respected old Hagar for her position in the household as well as for her education, so superior to their own, sent up a deafening shout, first for "Hagar's grandchild," and next for "Miss Margaret forever."

CHAPTER XXV.

By Theo's request, old Hagar had been taken home the day before, yielding submissively, for her frenzied mood was over, her strength was gone—her life was very nearly [illegible]—and Hagar did not wish to live. That for which she had striven had been accomplished, and though it had cost her days and nights of anguish, she was satisfied at last. Margaret [illegible] would be a lady still, the bride of Arthur Carrollton, for George Douglas had told her so, and she was willing now to die, but not until she had seen her once again, had looked into the beautiful face of which she had been so proud.

Not to lay, however, did she expect [illegible], and just as the sun was setting, [illegible] which [illegible] Margaret at [illegible] fall away to sleep. It was at [illegible] hour that Margaret was went [illegible], and soon, as the [illegible] in the day's departing glory, a graceful form came down the woodland path, where for many weeks the grass had not been crushed beneath her feet. [illegible] saw her as she left the house, Madam Conway, Theo, all but [illegible] asked whither she was going. They knew, and they who knew her best, all followed slowly after, waiting in the woods until that interview should end.

Hagar lay calmly sleeping. The servant was as usual, away, and there [illegible] to see Margaret as with whitened cheeks and beating heart she [illegible] the threshold of the door, [illegible], until she reached the bed where Hagar lay, her crippled hands folded meekly upon her breast, her white [illegible], and a look of [illegible] about her half-shut mouth, as if the thin pale lips had been much used of late to breathe the word "forgive." Maggie had never seen her thus before, and the worn, [illegible] face had something touching in its sad expression, and something startling too, bidding her hasten, if to that woman she would speak.

"Hagar," she essayed to say, but the word died on her lips, for, standing there alone, with the daylight fading from the earth, and the life-light fading from the form before her, it seemed not meet that she should thus address the sleeper. There was a name, however, by which she called herself—a name of love, and it would make the withered heart of Hagar Warren bound, and beat, and throb with untold joy. And Margaret said that name at last, whispering it first softly to herself, then bending down that her breath stirred the snow-white hair, she repeated it aloud, [illegible] involuntarily as the rude walls echoed back the name "Grandmother!"

"Grandmother!" Through the senses locked in sleep it penetrated, and the [illegible] once so fiery and black, [illegible] and bright again, as Hagar Warren woke.

"Was it a delusion, that beauteous [illegible] which met her view, that soft, [illegible] on her brow, or was it Maggie [illegible]?"

"[illegible]mother," the low voice said again. "I am Maggie, Hester's child. [illegible] Do you know that [illegible]?"

Through the films of age, through the films of coming death [illegible] darkness, old Hagar [illegible] and [illegible], and with a scream of joy, her shrunken arms [illegible] convulsively around the maiden's neck, drawing her down, still nearer still, until the shrivelled lips touched the cheek of her who did not turn away, but returned that kiss [illegible].

(To be Continued.)

The funeral was about to begin. "Pardon me," remarked the undertaker to the somewhat boisterous man. "Are you one of the mourners?" "Well [illegible]—the corpse is my mother-in-law, if that's what you mean," replied the boisterous man.

SUNDAY SCHOOL LESSON

LESSON XI. September 12, 1915.

Elijah's Flight and Return.—I Kings 19: 8-18.

COMMENTARY.—I. Elijah fleeing from Jezebel (vs. 1-3). Jezebel had remained away from Carmel and had kept the priests of Asherah away also. Ahab told her of the fruitless efforts of the followers of Baal to obtain an answer from their god; of Elijah's mocking them; of the calm faith of the prophet; of the descending fire, which consumed the sacrifice, the wood, the altar, the dust and the water; of the cry of the people, "The Lord, he is the God"; of the slaughter of the prophets of Baal and of Elijah's prediction of rain. Jezebel was so angry upon hearing these things, that she took a most solemn oath that Elijah should be put to death before another day was over, and sent the prophet a message to this effect. It may have been fear on her part that kept her from sending an executioner to take his life at once. The message gave Elijah notice of conditions and ample time to make his escape. The message showed that his life was in danger at the hands of this angry and fiendish woman, and prudence led him to do his part in securing his own safety. The record does not show that the Lord had anything further for the prophet to do in Jezreel at that time. He fled to Beer-sheba in the southern part of the kingdom of Judah. Here he was beyond the jurisdiction of Ahab. Beer-sheba was nearly one hundred miles south of Jezreel. It was one of the earliest settled places in Canaan. The name which means the well of the oath, was given by Abraham to the well he dug there; for an oath was taken by Abraham and Abimelech, that the well was the property of the former. Beer-sheba still exists and is inhabited by Mahommedans, who are especially fanatical. A Christian mission is now maintained there.

II. Miraculously fed (vs. 4-8). 4-7. Elijah wished to be alone; he therefore left his servant, who had been with him at Carmel and had accompanied him thus far on his journey, and went alone a day's journey into the wilderness. He sat in the shade of a juniper tree, a shrub ten or twelve feet high, on the edge of the desert. The bold prophet had become disheartened. The marvellous display of power on Carmel had not been followed by the wide-spread reformation he had expected. He was worn and faint from his labors and journey and from hunger. He felt as if he had done all he could. In wishing that he might die he showed human frailty. His grief and weariness induced sleep. Twice an angel wakened and pointed to food that was in readiness for him. Food and water were miraculously provided for him as they had been repeatedly before at Cherith and Zarephath. Even if Elijah had made a mistake in fleeing from Jezebel, his journey was to be turned to good account for him. 8. Meat—Food. Forty days and forty nights—Moses had twice fasted the same length of time, and Jesus also fasted forty days.

III. At Horeb (vs. 8-18). 9. Unto a cave—A ruined chapel covers the rock on which the prophet is supposed to have rested. The granite rocks enclose it on every side, as though it were a natural sanctuary.—Stanley. What doest thou here—The Lord by this question brought a tender reproof to Elijah, and proceeded to give him a deeper revelation of Himself than He had ever before received. 10. Jealous—He had defended the honour of Jehovah. Forsaken thy covenant, etc.—Three charges are made, disobedience, sacrilege and murder. I only am left—Elijah was the only one on Carmel to defend the God of Israel, and in his despondency and ignorance he thought he was the only one in the nation loyal to Jehovah. They seek my life—In the prophet's belief the true religion was all but stamped out. 11. Go forth—The Lord was now ready to teach Elijah his much-needed lesson. He would first gain his attention and then give instruction. Wind ... earthquake—These were but the manifestations of God's power, and Elijah recognized them as such. 12. A fire—A constant blaze of lightning. The Lord was not in the fire—He might have spoken by means of the wind or the earthquake or the fire, but He desired to teach Elijah a lesson that could not be presented in that way. Still small voice—With the voice came the conviction to the prophet that God was speaking directly to him. 13. Wrapped his face in his mantle—An act of reverence and awe. He waited to hear what the Lord would say further to him. He heard the question recorded in verse 9 repeated, and answered it in the same way. 14. Shalt thou anoint—The Lord thus disclosed to his servant something of the future. 15. Go return—Elijah had traveled three hundred miles on foot to receive his orders, and must return the entire distance to carry them out. Damascus—The capital of Syria. Anoint—An important commission was given Elijah. "It is the word of the Lord foretelling the agencies by which the wicked house of Ahab shall be destroyed."—Whedon. Elijah anointed Elisha to be a prophet in his stead, but we have no record that he anointed Hazael or Jehu, yet he may have done so privately. His successors performed the offices. 17. Hazael ... Jehu ... Elisha—The sins of Ahab and Jezebel were to be avenged and a Gentile king, an Israelitish king and a prophet of the Lord were to have part in the punishment to be inflicted. 18. Yet will I leave me seven thousand (R.V.)—Elijah was the only representative of Jehovah on Mount Carmel and he thought he was the only one in Israel, but the Lord let him know that there were thousands who were true to him and would remain true. They had not forsaken God nor had they bowed down to Baal, nor kissed him. It is a common practice for idolaters to kiss their idols or kiss their hands at them.

IV. Call Elisha (vs. 19-21). Elijah's northward journey must have been a joyous one compared with that to Horeb. His mission to Elisha was entirely successful and that young man was more prepared to follow him after Elijah's mantle had been thrown upon him. Elisha became his constant attendant, after he had returned to his home and had made a farewell feast for his people. Elijah had told him to go back to his home and in doing so had brought a test upon him. Elisha was convinced that a divine call was upon him, and he went with Elijah and was associated with him until Elijah's translation. He was the great prophet's worthy successor.

Questions.—Describe the scene of Elijah at prayer for rain. Describe the journey to Jezreel. What was Jezebel's feeling toward Elijah as she learned what had been done at Carmel? Where did the prophet go from Jezreel? For what did Elijah wish? How was he fed in the wilderness? Describe Elijah's experience at Horeb. Upon what mission was he sent from Horeb? What did Elisha do after Elijah had cast his mantle upon him?

PRACTICAL SURVEY.

Topic.—God's gifts to Elijah.

I. Restoration.
II. Revelation.
III. Recommission.

I. Restoration. Elijah had no time to magnify himself after his triumph on Mount Carmel. Jezebel's message to him displayed only determined and increased hostility. It was harder to bear than all his previous hardships. Not being present on Carmel, Jezebel had received with skeptical scorn the report from Ahab. In a passionate fury she declared her purpose to withstand Elijah. This was the apparent blighting of Elijah's long-expected hopes, after prayer and waiting and mightiest effort. It was at that time God suffered him to pass through a most severe mental conflict. It was a spiritual crisis in his life to meet a spiritual necessity. It prevented self-exaltation in the triumphs of God's cause, and prepared Elijah to accept of different methods as God presented them. For the time his depression seemed almost overwhelming. He looked for better fruit of his ministry than he could discern. He dwelt in bitter sorrow upon the conditions as he saw them, that God's covenant had been forsaken, his altars thrown down and his prophets slain. That was the darkest hour in the prophet's history. God alone could understand and rightly judge him. God controlled Elijah's conduct by gentle agencies. His pity was as evident as his knowledge. God's first care was to give Elijah rest and sleep. His strength had endured a terrible strain on Mount Carmel.

II. Revelation. God's further method of relief included a manifestation of himself. Elijah needed special communication from God. He needed to be corrected in his judgment as to his own labors and the cause of truth. He needed the divine assurance that his labors had accomplished more than he had supposed, that God had seven thousand witnesses to the fact, who had been strengthened by his ministry. Elijah's overwhelming anguish of soul was like the whirlwind which prepared the way for the still whisper of heavenly peace. A question from God suggested his responsibility. When the still, small voice fell upon his ear, he was smitten to the heart and humbled at Jehovah's feet. God's question was adapted to convince, reprove and humble Elijah. The "what doest thou here" pressed upon his heart. The still, small voice, which only a listening man could hear, was more divine and mightier than all that Elijah had witnessed before. There was a great difference between God's power and God's presence. Amid the war of elements the prophet was unmoved by fear. The still, small voice caused him to cover his face with his mantle and bow in humble worship in the recognized presence of God.

III. Recommission. God addressed Elijah by name. He still had confidence in him. He was not cast aside, relinquished. God had more work for him to do. He was to be strengthened and cheered by companionship. Continued isolation was not necessary. Though disappointed, Elijah might live and do good work for God, not by continuation of Carmel's triumph, but by other means. Just as the hurricane and the earthquake [illegible] the still, small voice in its impressive and subduing [illegible] Elijah's ministry had done its work thus far. Invasion, revolution and judgments from God were to do their part in Israel through other instruments than Elijah. The prophet was delivered from his depression by a revelation from God, by the assurance of success and the appointment to future work. For his own sake and the good of others he must be up and doing. With renewed physical powers, new occupation, prospective companionship and the association with faithful prophets in Israel, Elijah left the mount with his views all changed, with his thoughts of God corrected. Though Israel was under the thraldom of idolatry, Elijah could be content to be God's minister and know that God was over all. After this wholesome discipline and humiliation Elijah could go forth with renewed strength and courage and with clearer vision.

Suffered From Salt Rheum

FOR MANY YEARS.

Salt Rheum or Eczema is one of the most painful of all skin diseases, and if not attended to immediately may become very deep seated.

Give the blood a good cleansing by the use of that grand old medicine Burdock Blood Bitters. This sterling remedy has been on the market for the past forty years, and is the best blood cleanser on the market to-day.

Mrs. William H. Fowlie, Cole's Island, N.B., writes: "I have been a sufferer from salt rheum for a good many years, and was so bad I could not do my own work. I tried a good many medicines, but they all failed to do me any good until I tried Burdock Blood Bitters. I had not taken one bottle until I found a great change, and I am most thankful for trying it. I hope that every other sufferer from salt rheum will try B.B.B."

Burdock Blood Bitters is manufactured only by The T. Milburn Co., Limited, Toronto, Ont.

EDITORIAL

The United States Public Health Service has decreed that the family washrag is a spreader of disease and that it must go. According, if the order is obeyed, every female member of the household will henceforth have her own washrag, while the male members will continue their ancient custom of soaping themselves with hands unadorned and then sticking their head and arms under the tap or into the filled bath tub or basin. It is a feminine institution that the Health Service has attacked.

Mr. W. S. Dingman, vice-chairman of the provincial license commission, appealed to the members of the Canadian Press Association to forward the movement towards prohibition in Ontario. As a substitute for the bar, he urged a string of temperance hotels all over the country. If the people want prohibition he is quoted as saying they are entitled to have it. His hearers, remembering his attitude towards Mr. Rowell's policy in 1911 when the coveted goal was nearer than it will be again for many a day, no doubt had to chuckle to themselves.

Men must be a weak creature if the confession of Dr. Aletta Jacobs, a distinguished feminist of Holland, made the other day in New York is true, that the men of the Netherlands would vote for pretty women in preference to able ones. We suspect it is, for men now vote for men to represent them in public bodies for various other considerations than their ability, sometimes it is because they belong to the same lodge as the voter, and strange to say, the city which should set an example to this province of better things. Toronto is the worst transgressor in this regard.

The second strike trouble in the South Wales coal fields has been settled by giving the men practically all that was demanded. The The men were stronger than the Government, it would seem, and the Government gave way. There are unselfish as well as selfish men in Wales, however. It is doubtful if any part of Great Britain is doing better for the army. In proof, the Welsh Borderer's Regiment, which before the war included four battalions, now has nineteen. The Royal Welsh Fusiliers have increased their strength from seven to nineteen battalions, and the Welsh regiment from seven to twenty battalions. Each regiment has, in fact the strength of an army division.

Though it would appear to outsiders that the true voice of the United States proceeds from the mouth of Theodore Roosevelt in these days he is the object of almost universal attack and ridicule from American newspapers. There is the liveliest apprehension on the part of both Republicans and Democrats that he may be the next Republican candidate for the presidency.

* * *

Work was commenced Tuesday on the Hydro sub-station, which is being erected at the rear of the old market building. Mr. Lunney of Elmwood has the contract and will likely rush it through in three or four weeks. It is only a small building, about 11 x 13 ft. with 12 foot walls. The floor and ceiling will be of concrete, and the walls of red pressed brick.—Durham Chronicle.

Cost them $6 Each

Archie and John McCurdy appeared before Magistrate Montgomery about 8 o'clock last Thursday morning and pleaded guilty to the charge preferred against them by the Elmwood hotel-keeper. They were each mulcted to the extent of $2 and costs, amounting to $6 or $12 in all. Jack O'Brien could not be served because he had taken a reserved slat seat for the harvest fields on Tuesday. He was not the aggressor in the racket but may yet have to pay the penalty for getting mixed up with the scrappers from North Brant. When John is stooking he will be casting many a furtive glance around to see if a constable from the wild wooly and wake-up-west is trying to serve a paper on him. If he can't hide in the stook he will hit the high spots on the prairie like a marathon runner making his final spurt. Good-bye John, don't stop long.—Chesley Enterprise.

The annual paper holiday of the Mildmay Gazette is being observed this week

On Friday evening, E. J. McTavish, tailor, had the misfortune to fall and sprain his foot. The accident happened when Mr. McTavish was leaving the I.O.O.F. hall and as he descended the stone steps to the sidewalk he fell, and received painful injuries. Brother Forester carried E. J. to his home where he will be forced to remain for some time. It is to be hoped he will soon recover.—Ripley Express.

On Thursday Mr John Cox, of Kincardine was assisting in drawing grain into the barn, when he was knocked off the load, as the wagon was being drawn through the doors. Mr. Cox received a deep cut on the head which required several stitches. As we go to press we learn that Mr. Cox is in a fair way to recovery.

Broke his Leg.

A peculiar, but very painful accident befell Mr. David Henry, of the 12th of Huron last Friday afternoon. Mr. Henry was engaged unloading barley in his barn with a hayfork when the horse which he was leading fell and rolled over on his right leg, breaking it at the ankle. It is thought the collar the animal wore choked him for the time, with the above result.

Gideon Ruttle had a miraculous escape from serious injury on Saturday last as he was driving his motor car to Ripley. When opposite Dan Gillies farm he struck a rut in the road, bending a radius rod, making it impossible to steer the car. It took to the ditch and turned turtle, but Gideon jumped and escaped with only a few bruises. The car was damaged, but is being used as usual on the rural mail route.—Ripley Express.

Talk about patriotism. If you are a real patriot, show it in the town you live in when you talk about that town be loyal to it. Don,t condemn everybody else in the town and try to let people know that you are the only live wire in the town. If you are a live one they will discover it without you drawing attention to it. It is a true patriot that stands by the town he lives in and boosts its interests.

Aylmer must be populated by a number of dippy people. The Reformer tells of the appearance of a man in that town recently who was aged and bent with work and dressed in cotton jeans. The kodak fiends got after the poor fellow and snapped him. Surely common decency should allow the appearance of any stranger, no matter what his garb, to pass without such a display and lack of courtesy How would some of the kodak fiends like to have their dad snapped if the world had not been all sunshine to him.—Kincardine Reporter.

Plenty of Harvesters

Ontario has contributed nearly 30,000 harvesters for the West. More than half that number alone having passed through Toronto. It required twenty five coaches to accomodate the last batch of excursionists who left on Saturday. The C.P.R. operated a special train of fifteen cars while the G. T. R. accomodated the harvester's on the regular western trains, the total complement being 1,400 passengers. "If the western crops are not garnered in record time this fall" said a prominent railway official, "the farmers will not be able to attribute it to any delay being caused through the lack of farm help. Ontario sent an unusually fine class of harvesters the greater part of whom were young men." When the railway officials started out in search of harvesters for the West it was felt that the recruiting for service at the front would have had a marked effect but, strange to say, the response greatly exceeded the expectations of the officials. No trouble was experienced in any part of Ontario in obtaing the right class of men, many of whom have expressed a willingness to enlist for active service, on their return from the West.

The Fall Fair.

The horses on the farm that work so hard from year to year can easy tell the way they're fed the fall fairs are drawing near. The bleatin sheep likewise the pigs, the chickens and the ducks, can tell they're getting tapered off to win the easy bucks. The turnip of the rotund type, the mangold like a post, are getting chesty in a way to make a farmer boast. And then the big red apples too, have shooed the worms and bugs, and reckon to be carted off with knitted socks and rugs. The pillow-slip, the slumber rug, the mat of gorgeous hue, are getting so uneasy now they scarce know what to do The mottoes worked in green and gold with words and phrases sweet, are planning to take in the show their ancient friends to meet. They've shed the moth balls weeks ago, and hung out on the line, to give out the impression that they're new since '09. The old gray mare is awaitin' now to get her final rub, and the pumpkins reckon that they'll grow bigger than a tub The license of the peanut stand and for the ginger fiz, it was let out a month ago for this enormous biz. It is a goodly thing to do to enter up your stuff, and show by heck, your farmin brains ain't just a case of bluff. To grow the biggest onion and the finest peck of peas, it straightens up the spinal joints and bolsters up the knees. To win in lemon pies and tarts and buns and layer cake it makes the lungs blow bigger and the heart to palpitate. All hail the fall fair and its ways, let all the prize extol of those who grow the monster squash, four men can scarcely roll.—Ark in Guelph Mercury.

A new departure in the threshing line in this district occurred on Aug. 23rd, when James McEwing of Queen Hill held a moonlight pea threshing The engine and separator were set out in the field and started about 6 p.m. continuing till about 10 p.m., finishing up a 12 acre field of peas in that time.—Paisley Advocate.

Mrs. Daniel Knechtel Ill.

Mrs. Daniel Knechtel, wife of the president of the Knechtel Furniture Co., and one of Hanover's oldest and respected citizens, is seriously ill, having been siezed with a paralytic stroke early Tuesday morning while Mr. Knechtel was getting ready to leave for Rochester to attend the Baptist convention. At time of writing, (Wednesday afternoon), we are pleased to state that she is resting easier and appears to be some better.—Hanover Post.

Special Notice

The management of the Western Fair through the efforts of Hon. Sir Adam and Lady Beck, are able to announce that the Red Cross Society will have an exhibit in the Transportation Building during the whole Exhibition of a number of curios, shells, machine guns, and a large number of very interesting articles of warfare which will occupy over 100 feet of floor space, also an exhibit of articles, etc., which has been prepared by the Red Cross Society for the use of the soldiers at the front. This will afford an opportunity of a lifetime for visitors to the exhibition to see these interesting articles. Single fare over all railroads west of Toronto starting Sept 10th, good till Sept. 20th.

OLD COUNTRY NEWS

HEROES GRAVES IN FRANCE.

In the course of a discussion on the projected law authorizing the French Minister of War to acquire in the name and at the expense of the French State, a sufficient amount of ground for the burial of British and Belgian soldiers who have fallen in the war, the Temps takes the opportunity of eulogizing the British.

It says: "The French Government by this law will undertake not only the acquisition, but the expense of the enclosure and upkeep of these cemeteries if, contrary to all belief, England does not wish to share the expense. By the passage of this law the entire French nation will participate in the spontaneous work begun and carried on by the peasants and communes wherever British soldiers have been interred on French soil.

"On all sides, but particularly in the valleys of the Aisne and the Marne, the tombs of the British have been the object of the greatest care, which has deeply moved the British people, who are accustomed to reverence for the dead.

"Our allies will see here just a tribute paid to their heroism. It is for their own country that they face death, but it is upon French soil that their blood has been shed. We cannot forget that they came and ranged themselves by our side during the dark hours of adversity. In providing for the fallen a peaceful burial ground where there families may come and pray, we are merely fulfilling our duty. We are only knitting more closely the ties, already so close, which unite the two nations in sentiment as well as in policy."

"TRENCH BACK"—NEW AILMENT.

The latest complaint to get a name of its own in this war of surgical surprises is "trench back." Many cases are under treatment at the Kitchener Indian hospital, Brighton.

They come almost invariably from the trenches, says Capt. Sandes, writing in the British Medical Journal. Usually the injury is caused by sandbags or masses of earth hurled on the men's backs by bursting shells. Some patients have been so seriously injured that they have had to be carried on stretchers; in milder cases, the symptoms are very like those of lumbago—the patient suffers severe pain and is unable to stand upright.

Fortunately a rapid and effective cure has been found in ionisation with sodium salicylate, which is a method by which the drug is made to penetrate the skin by the agency of an electric current. Under this treatment, carried out in the electro-therapeutic department of the Kitchener Hospital, quite helpless men have recovered after a short course of treatment.

NEW CRIME CATALOGUE.

The war has made a big decrease in crime, but has brought into being many new offences. They are, said a police official, of the following class:

A man in uniform—probably a deserter—goes to a house saying he has to arrange for the billeting of troops. When in an upstairs room he asks for a tape measure, and when left alone he steals any valuables he can find.

Rogue officers in uniform stay at hotels and pass bad cheques for the hotel account and with tradespeople.

Women, who say they have just come back to England from hospitals at the front bring good news of "missing" soldier husbands, and then, saying they have lost their purse, borrow money.

Offences under the Defence of the Realm Act, illegal lighting and signalling.

Cases of illegal buying of stores from camps which have been parted with as "waste."

NEW NAVAL MEDAL.

The King has been pleased to sanction the establishment of a medal to be known as the Naval General Service Medal, to be awarded for service in minor naval warlike operations, whether in the nature of belligerency or police, which may be considered of sufficient importance to justify the award of a medal in cases where no other medal would be appropriate.

The medal will have a distinctive ribbon, white with crimson borders and two crimson stripes on a clasp with appropriate wording.

His Majesty has further been pleased to approve the award of the Naval General Service Medal with Clasp inscribed "Persian Gulf, 1909-1914," to the officers and men of His Majesty's ships who were employed in the operations for the suppression of the arms traffic in the Arabian Sea or Persian Gulf between October 19, 1909, and August 1, 1914.

TO DEFEAT GAS ATTACKS.

Sir Hiram Maxim, inventor of the automatic system of firearms, claims to have devised a simple method of dealing effectively with German gas attacks.

"A line of flame in front of the British trenches," said Sir Hiram, "would cause the gases to rise, when they would be one diluted to a point of harmlessness before they descended to earth. My system therefore consists of a screen of fire raised by petrol bombs. The latter, to be fired by fuse and percussion, would be propelled in the enemy's direction by an apparatus which has been patented by a French mechanician and is capable of throwing the bombs a distance of 300 yards. It will cost about £25."

LIEUT. GLADSTONE MEMORIAL.

A memorial stone has been placed in Hawarden (Flintshire) churchyard, on the grave of the late Lieut. W. G. Gladstone, Lord-Lieutenant of Flintshire and M.P. for Kilmarnock Burghs, who was killed in action in April last. The inscription contains the following quotation from the last letter Lieutenant Gladstone wrote to his mother:

"It is not the length of existence that counts, but what is achieved during that existence, however short." The stone is an exact reproduction of the adjoining memorial to his father, the late William Henry Gladstone.

NOTES

Councillor W. C. Fenton is to be the new Sheffield alderman. The Conservative party have the selection of a successor to the late Ald. George [illegible] and their choice has fallen upon Mr. Fenton.

Abram-man.

It was at one time the practice to allow the inmates of the Abraham ward of Bethlehem hospital, London, to go about begging for the benefit of the hospital. Certain vagrants imposed on the charitably inclined by pretending to be actual inmates and were therefore known as Abram-men; hence the term Abram-men, one who obtains money by shamming sickness.—London Express.

Chats With the Doctor

BY A PHYSICIAN

OFFENSIVE BREATH.

One of the most frequent questions [illegible] concerns this trouble. Yet the [illegible] in health matters, [illegible] expert dentist and have the trouble set right. [illegible] will be found a cavity in the teeth which requires stopping.

There is a popular idea, like many current notions extremely foolish, that derangement of the stomach [illegible]. That is untrue, except in the [illegible]. Only when there is organic disease [illegible] will be all the more marked. There is a peculiar [illegible] and diabetics [illegible] sickly, sweetish smell as well. Also smallpox and various eruptive fevers have each their special odor. [illegible] The ordinary foul breath [illegible].

Considering the frequency of the complaint [illegible] we ought to be thankful our sense of smell is so [illegible].

TOOTHACHE AND EARACHE.

[illegible] tiny pledget of cotton wool soaked therein into the cavity of the teeth and the pain ceased like magic. Or if your ear was at fault, you had only to warm a few (a very few) drops in a teaspoon, and pour them into the ear cavity, with the like result.

If there is no cavity in the tooth, and you have an ache proceeding from suppuration at the roots or from inflammation of the pulp—there is no more acute agony—tincture of iodine often affords immediate relief and cessation to the pain. You place a camel's hair brush in this and then press it to the gum over the tooth fangs. The remedy appears to have an effect upon the arterial tension and so to end the intolerably gnawing sensation. I hardly think this effect is sufficiently appreciated by dentists, who so far as I know recommend the application only for chronic inflammation. I have never seen any reference to it in medical books. But it is nevertheless pronounced enough, and sufferers from toothache, when there is no tooth cavity, may be glad to try it. As regards pain, we are many of us arrant cowards nowadays—that is one result of our higher civilization. It is a long time since the blacksmith was the approved extractor of teeth, which he proceeded to remove with a wrench and a hammer.

CHOLERA AND DIARRHOEA.

The Asiatic cholera is a most virulent epidemic malady, which begins—that is to say the epidemics have always begun—somewhere in the Far East; where the filth and insanitary surroundings of the laboring classes are almost incredible. They are said to have it badly at Vienna now. I trust it will not come nearer. In the worst case a man fell down without warning, and died within half an hour.

This cholera proper is the modern prototype of the ancient plagues, and like them depended upon unhealthy living, with the total neglect of every sanitary precaution to obtain pure water and pure air. We can most of us hardly realize what the conditions must have been in a walled city of the Middle Ages—the overcrowding, the dirt, the bad smells, the foul food.

What is styled English cholera, is but a pale shadow of the Asiatic, yet results from the same essential causes and antecedents. It is always brought on directly by foul water or food, and appears in slums or insanitary dwellings. It is only ordinary diarrhoea in a very aggravated form (though of course the latter may ensue from a great variety of causes, one of them a bad chill).

When a diarrhoea attack brought on by decomposed food comes on, the first thing to be done is to expel the offending agent. It is useless to take any medicine to stop the diarrhoea, until that has been done; you only do harm, it may be serious harm. The test is pain. So long as there is abdominal pain, something remains which nature is seeking to expel; and you must on no account thwart her, or you will suffer for it. A good dose of castor oil, followed by warm drinks of milk and water, is the first step. Also you have to lie up and keep quiet, abstaining religiously from broth, soup and all animal foods.

Then when the pain is banished, but not before, you may resort to physic taken to stop the diarrhoea; though if you do not like physic, you can generally recover by rest, with milk or milk nourishment only. It is a sine qua non to avoid beef tea, and to keep lying down.

Core medicine opium preparations in some form or other are best. One of these is chlorodyne; of which you take five drops for a dose every three hours. But it is never safe to give anything of this kind to children without medical advice.

Other approved remedies are chalk mixture, of which the dose is one table-spoonful, occasionally two, every two or three hours. Another is bismuth, in 15 grain doses, every three hours, suspended in water.

Chronic diarrhoea, which persists for days or weeks in the absence of any obvious cause, should not be treated by remedies at home. Nearly always it denotes internal ulceration or some equally serious lesion, for which a doctor's advice should be immediately sought. There is danger in delay.

A NOVEL VIEW

Russian Emigrant's Opinion of Why Czar's Armies Weakened.

A Russian in this city, who is a careful student of conditions in his native country, offers the opinion that the unexpected weakening of the Russian forces before the Teuton attack is not primarily due to lack of munitions, but is directly traceable to the educational policy the empire adopted about twenty-five years ago. At that time modern scientific studies were displaced in the higher schools by a curriculum devoted mainly to the classics and humanities, with a minimum of the scientific and technical subjects. Now, as modern war is nothing if not scientific, Russia finds herself without suitable material to replace the trained officers who fell in the first months of the war. Germany's educated youths, having a scientific basis of education, very quickly acquire the special military knowledge which is required, while military science is all "Greek" to the young Muscovite.—Christian Advocate, New York.

It is customary to speak of the [illegible] astounding still is the fact that by means of cold may be imprisoned and retained which when liberated travels through space at a velocity of 186,000 miles per second.

Like all great discoveries, the process is exceedingly simple and based upon principles that one marvels at not having been employed long ago. Radium emits light which is called "emanation," and this "emanation" is nothing more or less than a gas. It is possible to freeze all gases, and when "emanation" is subjected to a temperature of 312 degrees below zero it becomes congested.

The strange feature of the phenomenon, however, is to be observed when the "emanation" commences to thaw, when from the surface of the surrounding liquid air brilliant spangles of light stream upwards, producing a most beautiful and dazzling effect.—Birmingham Age-Herald.

Husbands and Wives

"Men may not love their wives now any more than they did fifty or sixty years ago," said the middle aged man, "but I fancy that they are now in many ways more helpful to them and more chivalrous in their devotion.

"In old days the man attended strictly to his work and the woman to hers. It is true that in those times before rugs had come into general use, the husband took up the carpets when they needed cleaning, carried them out in the back yard, beat them, and then put them down again. And in those years before the introduction of steam heating equipment he put up the stoves in the fall and took them down in the spring, with all that incidental wrestling with refractory stovepipes and [illegible] used to dwell upon in print so [illegible]

"In short, the man did help about the house some, but speaking generally he had his work to do in life, and the woman had hers, and usually the husband stuck pretty closely to his province and the wife to hers. Now things are different now, the husbands and wives are mutually more helpful.

"It is a modern story, that of the troubles of the husband sent out by his wife to match a piece of ribbon. In old days the wife never dreamed of asking her husband to do even that, or to help in any of the multifarious duties of the household. Now without hesitation she asks him not only to match ribbons but to run many errands and to do various things about the house.

"It is not because she is less self-reliant or less self-helpful, but a change has come in their relations. The man is now not only ready but he is really glad to do many things that once it would not have seemed fitting for him to do at all, in those other days, when customs were different.

"Take, for instance, the case of small children, which in old times fell solely upon the mother. It was she, always, who took the little one out in its wagon; always she who lugged it in her arms when she and her husband went anywhere together. In those days the husband would have felt queer and sheepish if he dragged a baby wagon or carried a baby in public. Husbands, then, didn't do such things; this hard work was left exclusively for the wives, but now men are no longer ashamed to carry the baby.

"It is the commonest thing in the world now to see men out alone trundling the baby carriage along proudly while the mother rests at home. If husband and wife are out together it is in the husband's strong arms that the blessed baby is carried, to relieve the mother of this heavy burden. Really it is a remarkable change that has come about in this respect within the last fifty years.

"Comradeship is rather a tame word to apply to any phase of the relationship between man and wife, but certainly there is more of it now than ever before, with a corresponding increase in their happiness, and all this in the face of circumstances that might seem to militate to the contrary.

"This is the day of woman's advancement, of [illegible], independence. No longer depending solely upon man she is woman self-supporting and takes up work in many fields that are now had been reserved exclusively for man. And it is perhaps not unnatural that men should have resented this intrusion. We have even been told that men have been less polite to women because some have engaged in competition with them in this or that pursuit, and there may be some who have been thus less polite, but not many of them.

"The fact is that, along with everything else in the world, men's manners have in the past fifty years greatly improved. Man was never so thoughtful and considerate of woman as now, while despite the superficial business changes in the relations of men and women there has been in their relations no substantial change. The fellow in love now quite as he has always done, and marriage still remains the great institution, with husband and wife never before knowing so well how to live, never so happy as at the present day."

CAVES OF JENOLAN.

Beautiful Limestone Grottoes in New South Wales.

Although many series of limestone caves occur in various parts of the world, those found in New South Wales, though not the largest, are indisputably the most beautiful for their delicate formations. There are altogether in this state alone, thirty systems of caves in the care of the government, but hitherto only five of these have been made accessible to the public, the Wombeyan, Yarrangobilly, Wellington, Abercrombie and Jenolan. Of these the last named is the best known.

Situated in the heart of the Blue mountains this wonderful system of caverns is quite easily reached from the town of Katoomba, which is sixty-five miles from Sydney on the Western line. The wild grandeur of the surrounding country, with its mountain slopes, sylvan vales, and typical Australian bush, is by no means the least attractive feature of Jenolan. To see all the caves that have been explored, a sojourn of at least two weeks would be requisite. For the accommodation of visitors, the government has erected a comfortable hotel in a sheltered spot of rural beauty, and also maintains a camping ground for those who prefer more Bohemian life.

One obtains the first glimpse of the caves which, after rounding a sudden bend in the road, the Grand arch, in all its stupendous ruggedness, bursts on his sight. This marvelous natural archway, formed, it is surmised, at some remote period by the action of water wearing away the limestone right through the base of the mountain, is four hundred and fifty feet in length, more than seventy feet in height, and has an average width of about sixty feet. Close by the mountain to one side of it, is another splendid formation known as the Carlotta arch.

From each side of the Grand arch the [illegible] the Devil's Coach house, the Imperial, [illegible], the River, Skeleton, [illegible], Nettle, Elder, Jubilee, Left and Right Imperial, Orient, and Temple of Baal. All these, together with numerous smaller ones are of stalactite formation, the water percolating through the mountain, having been laden with limestone and creating stalactitic and stalagmitic in an endless variety of forms. Although by removing rocks in places, and cutting steps, and installing electric lights, the government has made the exploration of the caverns a comparatively easy matter to what it was, even now, a two hours' inspection furnishes a strenuous experience.

The tourist is, however, so lost in admiration of fresh subterranean wonders that he forgets the trouble of the way. As the guide flashes his magnesium light here and there, stalactites and stalagmites are seen in a profusion of forms, such as tremendous [illegible], graceful curtains, grottoes, [illegible] altars, minarets and countless sparkling gems.

The beautiful colors with which the formations are tinted defy description. From delicate ambers, pinks, greys and browns to the deepest stains of red and chocolate, the rainbow effects and [illegible] must indeed be seen to be fully appreciated.

At one time the guides used to give additional enjoyment to visitors by striking smaller stalactites and thus producing clear bell-like notes, but this practice has been stopped because many of the formations were broken in the process.

The largest of all the caves, which [illegible] off the Jenolan road, is over two hundred and fifty feet in height, nearly four hundred feet in length, and has an entrance one hundred and twenty feet wide. Beyond possessing a rugged grandeur, it is not remarkable for any beautiful formations, but it is interesting to note large rocks with polished surfaces which it contains. The highly glazed appearance is due to the passage of the feet of innumerable rock-wallabies that have deserted themselves [illegible] in this cave. Inside the caves the wallabies are protected, and visitors delight to watch the tame little creatures who [illegible] around.—Christian Science Monitor.

Russia's Immensity.

The Russian empire is as compact as the British empire is scattered. It is one great mass with no parts, except possibly a few islands along the coast, separated from the main body. There are no distant possessions, no overseas territory, and the czar claims no dominion over any land not in the northern hemisphere.

Its area is what astonishes. It is larger than all of North America from the canal north and with the islands of the Caribbean thrown in. One-sixth of the land area of the globe is under the czar's flag and within its boundaries is a population greater than that of Great Britain, Germany and France combined. And this population of between 160,000,000 and 170,000,000 is increasing at the rate of 2,00,000 a year by birth. The population of the empire has doubled in forty years.

Of the many strange things about Russia perhaps the strangest is that this immense empire has no salt water port which does not freeze in the winter. No big nation in the world is so circumscribed in this respect.—Brooklyn Standard Union.

Entire Family Stricken With Cholera.

Youngest Child Died.

The chief symptoms of cholera are vomiting, and purging occurs either simultaneously or alternately, and are usually sudden and very violent, and the matter ejected by the stomach has a bilious appearance and a nasty bitter taste. On the first symptom appearing Dr. Fowler's Extract of Wild Strawberry should be taken, and the trouble cured.

Mrs. E. Slade, [illegible] Logan Ave., Toronto, Ont., writes: "When I first arrived in Canada, nearly four years ago, my entire family was stricken with cholera, from which the youngest child died. Soon after a friend recommended Dr. Fowler's Extract of Wild Strawberry, and acting on this advice I administered it to all who were suffering, with the most gratifying results. FARM AND GARDEN

ORCHARD EXPERIMENTS.

An extensive series of orchard experiments was started by the Agricultural Experiment Station of the Pennsylvania State College, in various sections of the State, in 1907-1908.

These experiments, as a whole, cover nearly all the important phases of apple productions, but for present discussion is confined largely to the results secured in young orchards during their first seven years.

The first of these experiments has shown after 11 years' growth in the orchard, that there is practically no difference in efficiency between the various methods of propagation now generally used in nurseries. The results of experiments elsewhere lead to the same conclusion. On the other hand, a number of considerations indicate the desirability of eliminating the seedling root entirely—thus permitting the standardization of the root systems as well as the tops. Further work is now planned on the latter point.

An experiment on the value of selecting scions from trees of apparently superior qualities, shows some indications in favor of the process, but they are not yet sufficient to warrant definite approval of the practice. [illegible] material enlargement of this experiment has been made recently.

Another experiment shows that [illegible] and Tolman are among the best stocks in use for topworking such varieties as Grimes and Tompkins King, to secure better trunks and longer-lived trees. They should also be satisfactory stocks for general use in case the selection of scions proves desirable.

Dynamiting in four experiments, in both young and old orchards, has failed to show any appreciable benefits during a three-year period and on a hardpan soil.

The best soil management in a young orchard is the one which conserves the moisture best. This gives the largest growth and earliest fruiting under most conditions. The moisture is conserved most efficiently by a good mulch of strawy manure or other plant materials, which should be accompanied by proper protection against mice. Where sufficient mulching materials are not available, proper tillage and cover crops should give satisfactory results.

The use of tilled intercrops, such as potatoes, corn, beans and peas, during the first seven years, has resulted in no injury to the adjacent trees even on a poor soil, and has brought in returns of [illegible] to [illegible] an acre in some years. On good tillable soil and with the most practical method of orchard development.

Among the annual cover-crops, buckwheat, hairy vetch and millet rank high. Some financial returns can also be secured from the first, by high cutting or seeding, and probably without materially reducing its favorable influence on the adjacent trees. It thus makes possible a combined cover-and-intercrop system, which apparently is a new idea in orchard development.

A combined mulch-and-intercrop system is also possible on suitable soils, by the use of alfalfa while the trees are young. This plant is not only capable of furnishing an abundant supply of mulching material for the young trees, but under favorable conditions it may also afford a considerable surplus for hay. The mulch, however, should be heavy enough to keep down the direct competition between the alfalfa and the principal tree roots. In our experiments, this system has given better results than any kind of annual tillage during the first seven years, and it is especially well adapted to large acreages.

In the older bearing orchards, where the mulch-producing area is small, these sources are available. Mulching material may be brought in, a tillage system, preferably [illegible], may be adopted, or it may be possible to replace both by a proper system of fertilization.

The general system of fertilization found best in our older orchard experiments involves annual application of either stable manure, at the rate of about six or eight tons per acre, or a commercial fertilizer carrying about [illegible] per cent. of nitrogen, 8 per cent. of phosphorus and [illegible] per cent. of potash, and applied at the rate of about 500 pounds per acre.

The manure may be applied at any time during the spring, but it [illegible] best to apply the fertilizer some time after the fruit has set. This incidentally gives an opportunity to vary the amounts applied somewhat in proportion to the size of the crop set.

On young trees applications of plant food alone have given, as a rule, but little benefit. Such benefits as have appeared were largely in those cases where the moisture was especially well conserved or else was naturally abundant. In a few cases some actual injury has apparently resulted to young trees from rather heavy applications of commercial materials, especially rich in the more soluble plans of potash. Hence a good mulch of manure is probably the best general application for young trees. If manure is not available, moderate surface applications of the general fertilizer stated above should be satisfactory.

FARM NEWS AND VIEWS.

In the evidence of the Dairy and Cold Storage Commissioner before the House of Commons Committee on Agriculture, England, there appear figures on cold storage temperatures which should be of interest to many. The safe storage temperatures for different commodities are:

Apples (long storage), 31-34 degrees.
Apples (short storage), 40-45 degrees.
Butter (long storage), 10 degrees.
Butter (short storage), 20-25 degrees.
Cheese (cool cured), [illegible] degrees.
Cheese (ordinary cured), 35-40 degrees.
Eggs, 30-45 degrees.
Poultry, 20 degrees.

In answer to a question, a member of the committee stated that cheese which has been allowed to reach a temperature of 75 to 80 degrees for a few days while it is maturing develops [illegible] fermentations which give rise to bad flavors, and the cheese must be cured in a low temperature afterward to prevent these bad flavors setting in.

The most common error in feeding horses is to give too much hay. Not more than [illegible] pound per day for every 100 pounds weight of the horse should be fed. The best hay for horses is clean bright timothy hay. Prairie hay is good, also. Hay should be given in two feeds, with the largest feed at night, when the horse has time to eat and digest it.

Young pigs need dry, clean quarters. The farrowing sows should have dry, clean pens, preferably with board floors, and very little bedding. Many more young pigs are overlaid and smothered by their mothers through getting tangled up in the bedding than are injured by lack of bedding.

Professor Alva Agee, chief of the extension department of the New Jersey Experimental Station, declares that the productiveness of much land is limited by the lack of lime. The day will come when all land must be given some lime, for it is the tendency of lime to get out of the soil. Professor Agee recommends 1,000 to 2,000 pounds of fresh burned lime or double the amount of limestone for each acre of land.

The brood mare will do almost as much work in twelve months as the gelding. She will pay for herself several times over in colts in a few years. A mare is not half so much bother to care for as a dairy cow. The colt is worth more than a litter of pigs. Keep brood mares on the farm; it means dollars.

A veritable gold mine above ground is the up-to-date compost heap. Every gardener if he be wise will have one. Lawn mowings, leaves, weeds, refuse from the house, garbage, feathers, old shoes, soap water, bones, sand, woolen rags, wood ashes, lime, plaster, sod, straw, etc., begin a life of usefulness in the compost heap.

An old asparagus bed can be renewed in vigor by covering it freely with stable manure in late fall or early winter, removing the coarse part in the spring, such as would impede the cultivator. When spring comes cultivate, but not too deep, with the horse cultivator and clear out the weeds and grass with a hoe, being careful not to cut off the new growth which springs up very early in the spring. Perhaps it would be better to weed the patch out by hand rather than to endanger cutting off the young shoots. A slight scattering of salt along the row would do no harm.

THE GRAND FLEET

Archbishop of York's Praise After a Visit to Britain's Navy.

Speaking at a meeting at the Mansion House, York, recently, the Archbishop of York said he was permitted a short time ago to spend an ever-memorable fortnight among all sections of the grand fleet. I realized, he said, as never before, the debt which we here at home owe to those sleepless guards of our island shore. You will realize that these men have been out, not for three months or six months, but for 12 months; that during certainly five of these months they have suffered hardships which it is difficult for me to describe, standing practically the whole of the time at high speed on wild seas, unable to find any secure place of refuge or of protection. Yet I find, the Archbishop continues, in every part of the fleet, from the commander-in-chief downwards, the same spirit of cheerfulness and readiness and determination. It was to me a great privilege to be allowed to bring to them a message, which I hope was real and was sincere, that though our fleet is necessarily out of sight it is never out of mind. I am sure, from the way you take these passing words, that I at least rightly interpreted the feelings of the city of York. My business was to tell these men that their country was standing by them, and was grateful to them, but I am bound to say that, having visited them, I feel it is more incumbent upon me to bring some word to the people, and to ask our fellow-countrymen at home whether we really are standing by them, whether our sacrifices, our determination, and our unity are in any degree comparable to theirs. All I can say that if the citizens here at home are filled with the same spirit of devotion, comradeship, and unity as the our guardians of the fleet, then, humanly speaking, we need have little fear of the result.—Christian Science Monitor.

THE POULTRY WORLD

WORMS AND POULTRY.

The crop, stomach and intestines of a fowl often become infested with worms, which either cause serious disease or affect the nutrition so that the birds become weak, bloodless and unproductive. A farmers' bulletin, issued to the department of agriculture, Washington, discusses the subject of worms in fowls at length. The nature of the condition is determined by examining the birds that die, or by killing one that is very thin and weak. The intestines, the stomach and the crop should be opened and their contents carefully examined. If a considerable number of round-worms or tape worms are found, the remainder of the flock should receive appropriate treatment.

The remedies which are used to dislodge these parasites should be given when the birds are fasting. They should have a light feed at night, and should be given the medicine the following morning. Two or three hours after giving the medicine, they should have a purgative which may be Epsom salts, forty grains for each adult bird, thoroughly mixed with a small quantity of moist mash, and so distributed that each bird will get its share, or they may be given two or three teaspoonfuls of castor oil. An hour later a light ration may be given.

One of the best remedies is oil of turpentine, which may be mixed with an equal quantity of olive oil, and twenty to thirty drops of the mixture given at a dose. This is followed in two hours with two or three teaspoonfuls of castor oil.

Thymol is especially active in the case of round-worms, and one grain of it may be made into a pill with a little bread and butter and given to each fowl. It should be followed by a purge, as in the case of other remedies.

The remedies which are particularly efficacious for tape-worms are powdered areca nut, thirty to forty-five grains; powdered male fern, thirty to sixty grains; kamala, thirty to forty grains for each fowl. These are followed by Epsom salts, castor oil, or calomel one-third grain). Areca nut, male fern and kamala may produce bad effects in turkeys and geese, and must be given to these birds in comparatively small doses.

Preventive treatment must be carried out at the same time as the medical treatment, or the birds will be immediately reinfested by eggs or embryos or worms taken with the food or drink. Ponds or puddles of stagnant water should be drained or filled with earth; houses and runs (if small) should be cleansed and disinfested with a five per cent cresol solution; feeding troughs and drinking vessels should be cleansed daily and disinfected with the same cresol solution or with boiling water; the manure should be collected daily, mixed with an equal quantity of freshly slaked lime, and put where the fowls will not have access to it.

It is considered preferable by some poultrymen in the case of a badly infested flock, to kill off all the birds and begin a new flock on fresh ground with chickens hatched in incubators or with fowls from a flock known to be healthy.

FOR GROWING STOCK.

Feed plenty of grain along with this mash and your chicks should grow:

Wheat bran	100 lbs.
Ground oats or oatmeal feed	50 lbs.
Cornmeal	50 lbs.
Middlings	50 lbs.
Beef scraps	20 lbs.
	270 lbs.

This same mash can be moistened and fed once a day in troughs. The feeding of the mash moistened instead of dry will induce quicker growth. Moistened mash, however, must be fed very carefully. Never feed too much. Just give the chicks what they will pick up clean shortly after being fed.

If sour milk is available the quantity of beef scraps in the mash can be reduced. Sour skim milk makes an excellent drink for poultry, and may be kept before them all of the time. If sour milk is not available then the birds must be supplied with clean water always. The method of feeding should be such as to induce the chicks to take plenty of exercise and it should also promote good growth.

THE GEESE STOCK.

Geese do not attain to full maturity till they are two years old, and both the geese and the gander should not be under this age. A year-old bird should be mated with two-year-old geese, and vice-versa. This will have a much better effect upon the goslings, making them hardier and more vigorous, and causing them ultimately to attain a greater size. Unrelated stock birds should be used, and those only that are in perfect health.

NOTES.

Caponizing must be performed when a bird is young, the weight being 1½ to 2 pounds. They must be kept entirely without food and water for 40 hours, and a bright, sunny day is required unless one has a physician's head reflector. The losses will be about 2 per cent. in fairly good hands.

In an experiment in mating some hens that had not been with males previously were put into a breeding pen. In eight days 65 per cent. of the eggs were fertile. After a period the males were removed, and for twelve days the fertility of the eggs was very little affected.

It is now amply proven that hens lay quite as many eggs without a male. To keep cocks, except in breeding pens, is therefore a waste of food.

The idea that dark-shelled eggs are richer than white ones is a chimera; in face, the average of white-shelled eggs, when produced by mixed breeds on a farm, are richer than the brown ones, as they are laid by light breeds, which wander farther afield and get more insect food.

Any fowls which die should not be buried in the manure heap, but should be burned or buried in lime. Practically all disease can be traced to an organism of whose tenacity of life we know a great deal, but not the full extent.

It is found that certain soils have a tendency to produce certain types. This is true of all stock—sheep in particular. The tendency of clay soils is to produce yellow-legged fowls. Wyandottes reared on sandy loam have paler legs than those from the same breeding pens reared on stone loams. Consequently, white and black-legged breeds do better on light loams and yellow-legged ones on clays.

Valuable males which have proved themselves to be good breeders should be placed in a pen with eight or ten females, and kept for next year's breeding. Flocks of hens without males lay more and better eggs, are quieter and easier to handle, and eat less food. Therefore kill, sell or pen all male birds.

WORTH ALL IT COST.

"The most powerful restraint in my life is the memory of what my father and mother sacrificed to send me to school."

So said a young man of my acquaintance, a few years out of college, who is making good in an unusual degree.

There is probably no finer cavalry in modern life than that which marks the firm resolution of devotedly ambitious parents of moderate means that their boy shall have an education. All the while he is growing up, small sums are put by, petty economies are practised, careful habits are adhered to in order that when the boy gets big enough he may go to college.

The feeling of these parents roots oftenest in their own sense of deprivation and loss that circumstances did not allow them to go to college, and justice manages its retribution by planting this high resolve in their breasts.

Some people think it doesn't pay. Sometimes it doesn't, and people say plenty who love to point the finger at the lapses of these barn in comfortable homes and say, "If my boy wishes to go to college he may go, but he'll pay his own way there!"

It is not my thought to try to prove that boys who go to college are better off than boys who do not go, or that those whose parents save to send them are always wise.

There are two great advantages to the process in question that should not be overlooked.

In the first place what higher success is there in life than to plant a noble resolution, a restraining obligation, an inspiring impulse in the heart of a boy?

I do not say that saving to send a boy to college always does this, but the declaration of my young friend shows that it sometimes does. I believe it does often.

And shall we rob the home of its calvary even if it doesn't always pay?

Are there any finer parents, any more wholesome homes than those that sacrifice and scrimp for the sake of the young life growing up in them?

So, go on, good friends! Do your best for the boys and girls. Let us hope they will be grateful and worthy. They usually will. But whether they are or not, you cannot afford not to live for their sakes.—Editorial in Woman's World for September.

BEATEN GERMANY

Failed in All Points and Cannot Win This War.

(New York Times.)

The German campaign in Russia is without parallel in the history of warfare in respect to the magnitude of the operations and the demands that are made upon the nervous, physical and moral reserves of the fighting human unit. It seems impossible that the pace can be continued; it seems more than men can endure. But the limit is unknown. The dramatic fact is that Germany cannot stop. She must go on, and at this heart-breaking pace, like a runner who holds his breath, she desperately seeks what has so far eluded her on both fronts, and without which every conquest over space is a mocking triumph, namely, a decisive action. If now she fails to get it in Russia, if Grand Duke Nicholas does not slip in walking backward, then Germany definitely will have lost the war. That would still be true, rather more than less, though the German army, in seeking a decision, has made clean conquest of all Baltic Russia up to Petrograd. Every kilometer further that Germany penetrates the Czar's domain and merely pursues his army, without beating it weakens Germany not only towards Russia, but toward all the world.

In the admiration one has been compelled to feel for the headlong, heedless manner in which the German fighting machine has overcome great obstacles, one has been touched a little more or less by a superstition of its infallibility, and has perhaps too lightly considered the irreparable failures of German strategy. There is a way of saying that the Germans so far on points have won everything in Europe. But, on the contrary, they have lost the very points on which they counted most.

They lost the opportunity for a decision in France, and that was to have been won first of all before anything else could happen. Instead they hold a line, 500 miles long, through France and Flanders, on which the condition is one of stalemate. Frontal attacks are of prohibitive cost, if, in fact, they are feasible at all, and flanking attack upon a line that begins at the English Channel and ends on the Swiss frontier is, of course, impossible. In any event, the Germans cannot put an additional battalion on this line without reducing their strength in Russia; the Allies, on the other hand, can increase their numerical strength on this line, and are steadily doing so.

The irony of this situation for the Germans is that if they had persisted last autumn in their original design to force a decisive result in France and had not been diverted by the Russians' attack on the other side the story might now be very different. The Russians struck with unexpected swiftness. Most military experts agree that if, instead of transferring troops from west to east to stay the Russians, the Germans had brought a few more battalions into action against France, a decision could have been obtained. So much for the west.

Having failed in her first intention Germany turned to her second, which was to crush Russia. She attacked her from Galicia to the Baltic Sea, on a line 1,000 miles long, determined to pierce it in several places, to bend the ends back, to surround the pieces, in short to destroy the Russian resistance and be done with it. And in more than a year of the most desperate fighting on a large and continuous plan that has ever occurred in the world she has failed really to break that Russian line at any point. She has whipped it back. She has made it writhe. She tried to pinch it in two on the Polish salient. She took Warsaw and all of Poland in the pinching process, but she did not break the Russian line. So intent was the German mind upon the main object that the fall of Warsaw was hardly celebrated before the city was formally occupied the sheer momentum of pursuing the Russian forces had carried the German invaders beyond. They cannot stop. The further they go the longer and thinner is their own line and the [illegible] engaging the Russian forces in a decisive action [illegible]

GILLETT'S PERFUMED LYE
CLEANS AND DISINFECTS
100%PURE
MADE IN CANADA

If the Germans should push on until they had taken Petrograd they would have conquered a large amount of rich territory, but to hold it afterward 65,000,000 people would have to defend a frontier of more than 1,000 miles in a conquered country against 170,000,000 people on the other side. Germany might want to keep Poland, or set it up as an independent buffer state; she could not want a frontier of 1,000 miles in Russia against the Slav himself, though on her side of it were all the Baltic provinces and all the Baltic ports. She does not want this territory. She wants a military decision in Russia. She must have it before cold weather or lose the war. A desperate necessity urges her forward.

To deal the immediate blow, to obtain the decisive result, to beat the enemy before he was ready—these were the cardinal principles of German military strategy. For that kind of warfare Germany was prepared. On its success she staked great odds in human life, casting away two men for one, if need be, to gain the instant advantage. But exactly wherein its strength was supposed to lie the German plan has failed—altogether in France, so far in Russia. In the meantime, in striving for the only kind of success that was possible, the Teutonic allies have been using up one kind of material faster than it can be produced. That is human life. For one male that comes to fighting age each year in Germany and Austria-Hungary two reach the war age in England, France, Italy and European Russia.

Germany is at the peak of her effective fighting strength. There cannot be any doubt of this. Her military theory required her to exert her utmost power at first. She has done it. She cannot produce new fighting units; she cannot make good the wastage in those that now exist. On the other side, France alone among the Allies has put forth her maximum of battalions with just enough reserve to make their wastage good. England and Italy can produce new units. Some of those produced by Italy have been sent to join in operations against the Dardanelles, which, when opened, will give Europe access to Russia's unlimited supply of men. Men and time will win the war. Germany with all her magic cannot foreshorten time or find substitutes for men. Besides, the tradition of a German being worth one and one-half or two other men in war is unsupported by casualty statistics.

ARCHIMEDES' LEVER.

The Feat of Raising the Earth From a Scientific Viewpoint.

"Give me a fulcrum and a place on which to stand and I will raise the earth from its place!" That is a saying popularly attributed to Archimedes. If the required conditions were possible the feat might be performed, but in addition to providing a fulcrum and a place on which to stand Archimedes would also have to be furnished an indefinite lease of life.

To raise the earth a height of one inch by the force which Archimedes would have been capable of exerting would take not only an extremely long lever, but an extremely long time, as can be readily shown.

We shall assume the following data in our calculation: That the earth is a sphere 7,926 miles in diameter and and 5.5 is its mean density; also that the lever has no weight. Should we design a real lever it would be of such enormous size and weight that Archimedes' weight would be a negligible quantity.

If the earth is 7,926 miles in diameter the volume is about 261,000,000,000 cubic miles, or 38,400,000,000,000,000,000,000 cubic feet, and if the density is 5.5 the weight per cubic foot would be about 314 pounds, which multiplied by the volume would give as the weight of the earth 13,209,600,000,000,000,000,000,000 pounds. We shall assume, further, that Archimedes weighed 150 pounds and that "the place on which to stand" was some distant star; then, if the fulcrum is one mile from the point of application of the lever to the earth the length of the power arm of the lever, or the distance of Archimedes "standing place," would have to be 88,064,000,000,000,000,000,000 miles.

To move the earth a distance of one inch Archimedes' end of the lever would have to move through a distance of 1,388,000,000,000,000,000 miles. Now, if Archimedes should take hold of the end of the lever and apply his weight of 150 pounds to it and should move off into space with the velocity of light, or 186,000 miles a second, it would take him 237,000 years to finish the job be proposed, so that now, nearly 2,200 years after making the famous dictum he would barely have started the undertaking.—C. O. Sandstrom in Scientific American.

Anne of Russia's Ice Palace.

Probably the most remarkable building constructed wholly of ice was the palace built on the Neva by the Czarina Anne of Russia. Large blocks of ice were cut and squared with great care and laid on one another by skilled masons, who cemented the joints with water, which immediately froze. The building, when completed, was fifty-six feet long, seventeen and one half feet broad and twenty-one feet high. It was of but one storey. The facade contained a door surmounted by an ornamental pediment and six windows, the frames and panes of which were all of ice. An elaborate balustrade, adorned with statues, ran along the top of the facade and another balustrade surrounded the building at the level of the ground. The grounds were further adorned with a life-size figure of an elephant, with his mahout on his back. A stream of water was thrown from the elephant's trunk by day and a flame of naptha by night.

A tent of ice contained a hot bath, in which persons actually bathed. There were also several cannons and mortars of ice, which were loaded with bullets of ice and iron and discharged.

When Completed, Will be Adequate for a Long Time.

Will Ensure Supply for Surrounding District.

Owing to the rapidly increasing growth of Winnipeg in the last few years the well system now in operation has for some time been considered inadequate for the future demands of the city, not only on account of increasing need, but also because of the extreme hardness of the water.

In 1913 the Greater Winnipeg water district was incorporated, comprising the City of Winnipeg, the City of St. Boniface and all or portions of five other municipalities surrounding the City of Winnipeg. The object of the corporation is the supplying of water from any permanent source, whether within or without the province for the use of the inhabitants of the said district for all purposes.

A board of consulting engineers was appointed to make investigation as to the most suitable means of securing a permanent source of supply, and after an exhaustive study of the problem, Shoal Lake, a branch of Lake of the Woods, was chosen as being the most feasible. A practically inexhaustible supply of water can be obtained by a gravity line about 100 miles in length from this source. The estimate of cost of this work was approximately $12,500,000 for a supply of 85,000,000 imperial gallons daily, which appropriation was authorized by the board and by a vote of citizens of Winnipeg.

The administration of the district is handled by a permanent board, consisting of the Mayor of the City of Winnipeg as chairman and the mayors and reeves of the various other municipalities of the district. S. H. Reynolds, chairman, and J. H. Ashdown are commissioners, whose duties are the managing of the undertaking. W. G. Chace is chief engineer, and James H. Fuertes, of New York, is consulting engineer for the project.

The main engineering features of the system which is some 97 miles in length comprise a construction railway with 105 miles of track, including nine sidings, spurs to gravel pits, yards and so forth; a dyke in Indian bay and a channel for the diversion of the brown water of Falcon River into Showabee bay; a concrete cut and cover gravity aqueduct with appurtenant works 85 miles in length from the intake at Indian bay to a site chosen for a future 250,000,000-gallon reservoir southeast of Transcona; 9.8 miles of 60-inch steel pipe between this reservoir and the Red River; a tunnel under the Red River; 23 miles of 48-inch cast iron pipe between the Red River and McPhillips street reservoir (the city reservoir now in use). The difference in elevation between Shoal Lake and Winnipeg is approximately 300 feet; the location chosen for the aqueduct distributes this head in a remarkably uniform manner along its entire length.

In the fall of 1913 active work was begun and survey parties were put into the field to find the most economical line. At the same time the designing of the aqueduct was in progress to discover the types of construction most suitable and grades proper for the conditions of the country through which the line passes, which country contains numerous large muskegs. The work progressed favorably and in the spring of 1914 the final location was established and the contract was let for clearing the right of way, which varies from 200 to 500 feet in width. A large part of this right of way was obtained by grants from the Dominion Government.

The year 1914 was spent in building a standard gauge railway along the south margin of the right of way between Shoal Lake and Winnipeg, and also in building the dyke across Indian Bay. This dyke is approximately 7,000 feet long and contains about 230,000 yards of material. A large number of drainage and offtake ditches were necessary in order to drain the right of way properly before actual construction of the aqueduct was commenced. Railway water tanks, miscellaneous railway buildings and engineers' quarters were built. Contracts for the aqueduct proper were let during the year 1914.

In the spring of 1915 the aqueduct construction commenced and this will be pushed forward with all possible speed until final completion, which is expected in the fall of 1918. For the work contracts were let in five sections to local contractors and at satisfactory unit prices.

The sand and gravel for the concrete is furnished by the district from their own gravel pits. All of the material is first passed through a screening plant and assorted as to the various sizes and then remixed into suitable proportions so as to make the strongest and most watertight concrete available.

When this work is completed the Greater Winnipeg water district will have a water supply system of permanent character which will supply a very high quality of water in abundance for years to come, or until the population reaches about 1,000,000. When these requirements are exceeded the quantity as supplied by gravity may be greatly increased by pumping, prior to the installation of a second aqueduct.—Christian Science Monitor.

Ocean Temperatures.

The steamer Albatross, which is used by oceanographers, makes records of deep sea temperatures. These temperature observations prove that the ocean has a far more limited range of heat and cold than the land, its maximum surface temperature being about [illegible] degrees F., and its minimum about 29 degrees F. in the most frigid depths, the "cold pocket" between Greenland and Norway. The average ocean temperature at a depth of six or seven hundred fathoms is 34 degrees F. One of the mysteries of the sea is a [illegible] temperature rise of half a degree at a depth of 100 fathoms. This [illegible] temperature [illegible] observed by the Albatross over and over again.—American Magazine.

[illegible] but in the presence [illegible] and love, and [illegible] root, but in the religion of Jesus Christ.—Wm. Ellery Channing.

Still Weeping

"What a knack some small souled people have of judging everyone by themselves. Our tough poor little miserable County Town man seems quite worried over "the great havoc wrought to the Teeswater ball club treasurery by the last Game. Needless to say our Club do not owe a cent to any one, and they have yet to walk off the diamond without playing a game. All "sore spots" kicking, chewing and dirt can go where they rightly belong—to Walkerton.

Schumacher--Gress

A very pretty wedding was solemnized at the home of Mr. and Mrs. Philip Gress, on the 14th con of Carrick, when their second daughter, Violet Lidllyn, was united in marriage to Emerson Calvin Schumacher, eldest son of Mr. and Mrs. Schumacher of the 4th con of Carrick. The bride was given away by her father while the bridal chorus from "Lohengrin" was being played by her cousin Miss Jennie Bell. The ceremony was performed by Rev. L. Pletsch, pastor of the Evangelical Church, Walkerton under an arch of evergreens and flowers. The bride's two sisters Misses Pearl and Verna acted as little flower girls. The bride wore a dress of cream silk mohair trimmed with silk net, guipure lace, and French nots and a tull veil with a wreath of forget-me-nots and carried a bouquet of white asters and maidenhair fern. Her travelling suit was of blue serge and white silk braid hat to match. After the nuptial knot had been tied the wedding party which numbered about ninety-five, partook to the dining room and enjoyed a sumptuous repast. The groom's gift to the bride was a gold pendant set with rubies. The remainder of the evening was spent in games and singing. The bride was the recipient of many costly and useful presents which show the high esteem in which the young couple were held. There were guests from Walkerton, Mildmay, Ayton, and Clifford. The young couple will take up their abode on the groom's farm on the 2nd con of Carrick. The best wishes for a long and happy voyage go with them in their new sphere of life.

Serious Mishap.

Considerable excitement was created in the village on Sunday evening when a collision occurred on Absalom Street Early in the evening two fresh young blades from the country arrived here, and drove their horse up and down street at a rapid clip. Going west on Absalom street they overtook a young couple driving, and swinging their whip viciously, they caused the other animals to take fright and run at a furious gait towards the depot. Before the driver had his horse under control his buggy locked wheels with another vehicle coming east, and a bad mix-up occurred. Both buggies were damaged and it took a lot of repairing to get them into shape again for use. The fellows who caused the mischief sneaked away home, and did not wait to lend a hand to those in distress. It was a miracle that none of the occupants of the buggies were injured.—Mildmay Gazette.

The Walkerton boys who are in this company are:—Privates Vic. Bell, R. Adley, N. Dennis, Ray Hyslop and Fred Jewell.

Death of Mr. Wissler.

Mr. George Wissler of the west ward who suffered a paralytic stroke at his home on Saturday September 4th. passed away in the late hours of Sunday night. The deceased was 73 years old. The late Mr Wissler was one of the pioneer settlers of the township of Carrick and moved to Walkerton some ten years ago, where he has since lived retired. Besides his wife he is survived by a grown up family of two sons and three daughters. The funeral took place on Wednesday morning to the R. C. church, thence to the Formosa cemetery for interment.

Fracas in Carrick.

On Monday Chief Ferguson received a phone call from one of the Gillen boys in Carrick, asking for assistance and advice in dealing with a relative, who had called at the farm, somewhat the worse of liquor, and proceeded to make himself obnoxious, by the threatening to punch Gillen's head and using language, which would not look well in print. Mr. Ferguson advised that an information for trespass, etc. be laid, and although the youth came here for that purpose, he apparently feared the retribution of his erstwhile relative should he do so, and allowed the matter to drop.

County Grants $4000.00 Per Month.

A good representation of almost all the minor municipalities in Bruce County were present at the special session of the county council held at the council chambers here on Thursday afternoon last. The meeting was addressed by Mr. N. C. Dean, the organizing secretary of the Canadian Patriotic Fund, who spoke on behalf of the support of the women and children of our soldiers who are fighting the battles of the Empire in Europe. The result of the session was that the council made a unanimous grant of $3000.00 per month to this great work, which with a former grant of $1000.00 brings the contribution of the County of Bruce to Patriotic work to the sum of $4000. per month or $48000.00 annually as long as the war last. The meeting was marked by great enthusiasm. This meeting and consequent grant was the result of a movement commenced in Walkerton some weeks ago to stimulate patriotic work throughout the county, and was the result of the untiring work of the local committee, of which Mr. D. Robertson K. C. is the chairman and Geo D. McKay, secretary.

Now In The Trenches.

The special company from the 34th. Battalion, which went to England about six weeks ago, a member of which is Pte. Robt. Turner of Walkerton, is now in the trenches at the front, forming part of the Canadian reinforcements which have enabled the extension of the British front. Originally they were brigaded as reserves to the Princess Patricias, but before they left England they were transferred to the first battalion, first division, to which is attached the boys from Bruce and Western Ontario who left with the first Canadian contingent. The special company left Shorncliffe on the first of August and they were in such a fit state of proficiency that they went straight to the front and on the 8th. of August—four days after they left England—they were in the trenches. In a letter received recently at his home here, Pte. Turner, tells of some of his experiences in the trenches. He has had two very narrow escapes. On one occasion when he left the trench for water a German sniper missed him by a hairs breadth, and on another occasion a shell burst close beside him. A comrade with whom he was talking to was badly wounded, but he came through unscathed.

New Shoe Store.

Mr. Chas. Petteplace is having the building formerly occupied by the Red Star renovated and put in readiness for his new boot and shoe store which he intends opening in the near future. Mr. Petteplace has engaged Mr. Sowill of Chesley as his assistant and cobbler.

Butcher Business Changes Hands

Mr. Arthur McIlwain who recently opened a butcher shop here, has disposed of his business to Mr. Jos. Meyer a former proprietor of the Scarboro House in Hanover. Mr. Meyer took possession of his new business on Monday last. Mr. McIlwain will remain a citizen of Walkerton for some time at least.

Walkerton Boys Here.

The following are among the Walkerton boys with the 34th who were here on Wednesday.—A. Farrar, G. Haas, E. Reichenbach, E. Cartwright, R. McCarter, T. Liddle, W. Bryce, Lieut. H. Robertson, Qt. M. A. Earwaker, Howard Gransden, L. Runstadtler, Joe Wallace, Sr., Joe Wallace, Jr., F. Taggart, A. Ballantyne H. Vonhatten and Frank Carpenter.

Lost Horse.

Art Schnurr of the Telescope staff, was unfortunate enough on Tuesday night to lose his driver, which he purchased some time ago. Art in company with some friends drove to a country wedding in Carrick and on finding the stable-room overtaxed placed the horse in an adjoining shed, along with some other horses. Later on in the evening he discovered that the animal had broken through the flooring and fallen a distance of eight feet below, breaking its back, necessitating it being killed shortly afterwards Art's loss is a rather heavy one.

A Trip to the Allies

The ladies of the Soldiers Aid Tea-room, in order to assist in purchasing an army field kitchen, will hold their latest and most enjoyable patriotic innovation on Friday. Sept 17th, 1915. Autos will leave the station (town hall, Walkerton) every half hour from 7 to 9 in the evening and proceed to Belguim, (Mrs. Wm. J. Richardson's), thence to Great Britain, (Mrs. Hugh McNeill's), thence to Italy (Mrs. Arch. Tolton's), thence to France, (Mrs. Ben Waechter's), thence to Japan, (Mrs. Alex McLennan's), thence to Russia, (Mrs. Frank Rennie's) thence home again. Girls at each place will be dressed in national costume and will serve a national dish. Come and bring your friends!

The Fall Fair.

The Northern Exhibition was relegated to the back ground by Military Day. However in the way of an exhibition it was equal to that of former years. The quantity and quality of the exhibits were as good as other years and in some class the exhibits were even more numerous. Space will not permit us to publish the prize list this week, but it will appear in our next issue.

An Orderly Crowd.

Chief Ferguson informs us that yesterdays's crowd was one of the most orderly with which he has had to deal on a big day since he took the position, of Chief. There were no scraps and no arrests made, the only duty he was called upon to perform being the placing of three men in the lockup for the night. As they were merely spifflicated and in no way disorderly, they were allowed to go without paying a fine this morning.

N. B. L. Final Games.

The final baseball matches for the championship of the Northern Baseball League will be played this week. The first game of the series takes place in Wingham on Friday and the final game will be played at the exhibition grounds on Saturday September 25th. Although the Walkerton nine have been weakened by the enlisting of several players, they are confident of being able to worst their opponents and land the silverware

In Hospital at London.

A train of misfortune seems to be dogging at the heels of Private Frank Zettle since he enlisted in the 34th. Some time ago Zettle fell from a horse and suffered a broken arm which necessitated his removal to the field hospital and he is now once more in that institution, having received a vicious kick in the abdomen from a horse which he was tending. Although Zettle was at one time in a serious condition, he is now recovering.

Butcher's Rig Demolished.

The delivery rig of Mr. Jos. Meyer, Walkerton's new butcher, was badly wrecked on Durham st. on Tuesday evening. The delivery horse which is blind and was in charge of a youngster of tender years took fright, when struck by a small boy and jumping to the roadside collided with a telephone pole. Both shafts were broken and the rig and harness were otherwise damaged. It was fortunate that the animal struck the post, for had it not it would have plunged through the plate glass window of Myle's furniture store.

Successful Military Day

Record Crowd in Attendance — Excellent Programme Provided — Gate Receipts, $950.00—Thirteen Recruits Signed Up.

Favored with ideal weather Military Day at Walkerton on Wednesday was in every way a tremendous success. Nothing was lacking to make the day a memorable one, and all things put together, it was considered to be the most successful celebration in the history of the town. There was a record crowd, filled with enthusiasm and intense interest in the day's proceedings and when this is the case, one can rest assured that there is bound to be a feeling of satisfaction prevalent in the crowd, in those taking part in the program and above all in the committee on whose shoulders the full responsibility of making the event a success, and to say the least, the local committee are deserving of highest praise for they left no stone unturned, that would aid in helping to swell the crowd or improve the program.

The day opened with a bright sun beaming overhead and the townspeople soon began to see that their hopes were about to be realized, for before the morning was half spent, veritable streams of rigs commenced to arrive from the surrounding community and from nearby towns, and this crowd was greatly augmented before noon by the arrival of hundreds of autos, and by the arrival of special G.T.R. and C. P. R. trains which carried several coaches well filled with excursionists who came to see the boys in khaki in action and bid a last farewell to a relative or friend who is a member of the 34th, which battalion leaves shortly for England and will soon be in the trenches fighting the battles of the Empire.

The special G.T.R. train carrying the soldiers, about three hundred in number, arrived shortly after ten o'clock and a procession was at once formed headed by motors conveying the commanding officers, after which came the Hanover Band. Thence came the High School cadets who made a very credible appearance followed by the 34th battalion band and soldiers, including the machine gun section, and bringing up the rear were the two field kitchens which were later presented to the 34th by the South Bruce Women's Institute and the Ladies of the Soldiers Aid. The parade proceeded to the town hall, where Mayor Lippert gave an address of welcome, giving the soldiers the liberty of the town etc. Col. Livingstone made an appropriate reply to the Mayor's remarks, This concluded the morning's programme.

The afternoon program commenced at 1.30 with a monster military parade from the armories in which the schoolchildren of Walkerton and district participated and immediately on arrival at the grounds, a football match, between the 34th. battalion team and the Mildmay champions, commenced. The game was very closely contested, the 34th. aggregation who are old-country kickers, giving the Stars a hard tussell and after an hours play, the game was declared a draw, each team having scored two goals. This was followed by a baseball match between the 34th. nine and the Walkerton team, the game resulting in a win for Walkerton by a score of 12—5. Joe Wallace a local boy did the twirling for the 34th.

While the baseball match was on the most interesting part of the afternoon's program was in progress in another part of the grounds. This was the military drills, bayonet exercises, etc., by the several companies of soldiers and the cleverness and precision with which they executed their drills, brought rounds of applause from the massed audience. The club-swinging machine-gun drill and machine gun firing were particularly interesting. There was something thrilling in the measured tread and clock-like work of the men, and this together with their excellent physical condition demonstrated what a few months of military training will do. The firing of the machine guns brought the afternoon's program to a close.

Lieut. Col. Sutherland who was in the fighting in Europe delivered a masterly address. The Col. took the audience to Valcartier training camp thence to the English Camp and from there to the trenches. He then gave a vivid description of his experience in the battles of Langemarck and Ypres. He stated that he was returning to the front with the 71st. and enlarged on the necessity of young men enlisting for the overseas service.

For the evening program the exhibition grounds were beautifully illum-

Jocelin's Penance

CHAPTER XI.

When Brother Tristian had finished his task in the orchard, he left his rake in the garden house, and started back to his cell; traversing the cloister which faced a stretch of the Abbey wall, unbroken save by a postern gate. He took a turn up and down the cloister to stretch his aching limbs, and as he walked he talked to himself in a low and confidential tone; a habit much complained of by his brethren. "He speaks with the evil one, who so converseth," said certain zealous ones, who, laying the matter before the Abbot, asked that their faulty brother (with a winkle in his eye) replied "if ye converse with but yourselves, be duly reprimanded. But the Abbot there will be none to repeat your sayings." Thus did the father rebuke his over-zealous, tale-bearing sons, and little Brother Tristian talked to himself unmolested.

Brother Tristian was head gardener of the Abbey, and his soul was in his art. Each garden bed (they were neatly made in rows, with graveled walks between) bore its name cut in smooth chalk rock like tiny white gravestones. Onions, garlic, celery, lettuce, parsley, poppy, cabbage and carrots were there, each in its appointed place. And woe betide the careless assistant who mixed the seeds, or misplaced a stone. But the flower plot was Brother Tristian's joy and pride; and now, that fall had come, and his outdoor duties had ceased, he was planning a wonderful improvement therein. What this was, was a close secret, but the other monks knew that a rushlight often burned at late hours in Brother Tristian's cell, and he was ever begging scraps of parchment from Jocelin, which he covered with lines and figures. Truly "Out of the fullness of the heart the mouth speaketh," for as Brother Tristian moved placidly up and down the empty cloister, he was all unconsciously giving to the autumn winds his cherished secret.

"Now," said he, with one lean little finger extended to draw imaginary lines in the air, 'around the sun-dial will I plant them, my time-telling plants, and they shall be called the 'Virgin's clock,' in honor of our Lady. Zounds, 'twill be the triumph of all gardening. First will I plant me the Star of Jerusalem; it faileth never, but pops wide ope at the third hour to catch the first peep o' dawn; then the dandelion; it unfolds its cloth of gold at the fourth hour, and the other flowers, each at successive hours. At the fifth cometh my brave hawk's beard, then the viper's grass. The lettuce uncurleth its leaves at the seventh hour. For the next two I will have the Venus' looking-glass (a strange plant for an Abbey garden, methinketh), and the creeping sowsweed. To strike me ten I'll set the purple juniper; then the Star of Bethlehem. Jerusalem's Star again for, lazy little Jack-go-to-bed-at-noon, it shutteth its eyes at midday. To tell the first hour after midday, the succory will unfold, then the squill at the third, maid Marigold bares her bosom to the sun. Ah, my beautiful flower clock! The Abbot himself will come to see it and Dunstan, of Woolich, will go mad with envy that he bethought him not of such a fair invention.

"The four o'clock and wall flower I'll plant to tell the fourth and fifth hour, and at the sixth the lovely primrose of evening shall ope its delicate petals to the sound of the vesper bell. Jocelin of Brakelond may illumine his Missals with rare floral counterfeits, but who can make the pretty blossoms grow as well as old Tristian? 'Twill be the wonder of the age."

"Aye, wonders never cease, brother," said a low, cracked voice in his ear, and Tristian glanced up to see an aged woman in a scarlet cloak peering at him through a cloister arch. She was very, very old. She wore a close black cap with some tatters of a rusty black veil hanging over it, and mingling with a few wisps of dry bleached hair, which clung round her seamed brow like dead leaves on a branch, denuded by winter winds. Her eyes were mere hollows, with one glistening point of light far behind their rheum reddened lids, as if some wild creature crouched within an ancient ruin waiting to spring upon its prey. Her face could hardly be called wrinkled, as no continuous lines were set therein; but both face and hands were like withered petals of a yellow rose which has been crinkled and creased, then parched by the sun. The toothless mouth, with its blackened cracked lips, added to her weirdness, as did the great black staff on which she leaned; for its handle was cut into a semblance of a cat's head with yellow jewels for eyes, which seemed to blink at the startled monk.

"Godamercy! How camest thou hither, dame? No woman entereth these walls save by the Abbot's leave."

"Monks and witches have no sex, old frere. An' I wot if thy Abbot keep woman out of anything, he will do more than mankind hath done since man's wife was made in Eden. How came I hither? Gramercy, by yon postern! Thou wert so bent on extolling thy weeds, I entered unobserved."

"But that postern gate was ever locked, dame. I noted it as I passed with its bar well in the socket," stammered Tristian in dismay, tremblingly running his fingers through his scanty locks, which literally stood on end, and crossing himself before addressing his dread visitor.

"Odds heartlings! old shaveling; hath never heard of the witch of Ely, who hath but to point her staff at any barred door or portcullis, and open it swingeth? And now, wight, stand not staring there!" But Brother Tristian only looked at her stupidly, muttering to himself, "A witch, a cungeser."

"Along with me," she cried, impatiently, striking her staff on the stones. Whereupon, it seemed to Tristian that the cat's eyes flashed fire.

"Whither?" he queried in a faint voice.

"To Bradfield by some quiet way. I would speak with the Lady de Cokefeld."

"Why went thou not in at the Abbot's gate, then? Why pounce upon a poor monk with thy horrid staff? Mary, save me!" expostulated Tristian, feebly.

"Dolt, did I care to become the gazing stock of all the popinjays of two courts? [illegible] haste thee, monk! A secret passage to the Abbott's house."

"A secret way? I know of no way, save the walk down yonder terrace."

"Then to the church, old fearful, to the church," the witch of Ely cried, stamping her foot. But here Tristian replied. Timorous as he was by nature, and much afraid of witches, he would not conduct a witch within the sacred walls of St. Edmunds.

"Never! 'Twould be a sacrilege."

"Ha, ha; never, sayest thou, sir gardener? Then I'll set a spell on thy flower-clock, and the summer's sun shall never shine on it. Wither leaf, and shatter bloom, old canker blossom."

"Nay, nay," interposed Tristian, now thoroughly terrified. What was the sanctity of the Abbey to the safety of his darling flowers?

"Hither, follow me, dame. Quickly, for if I am seen with a woman in followance bethink thee of the scandal." This amused the beldame, and she followed his reluctant steps with a toothless grin at his disgruntlement. When they had entered the church, she walked behind him up the main aisle, counting its pillars as she went. When they were half way to the altar she paused, and passing through an arch, hobbled briskly behind the carved screen of pierce-timber work at the north of the choir. Here she paused, and saying, "Farewell, old wight," she disappeared; right into the great carved pillar, it seemed to Brother Tristian; but though he searched till the shadows of evening drove him from the church, he could find no signs of an opening therein and finally left the church and hurried to his cell.

"Woe is me! Woe is me!" he cried, continually beating his breast and shaking his head. "The brethren were right; in speaking to myself I have communed with the evil one, and he hath finally appeared in this guise. I have been tempted by the devil, and I have yielded; Satan is turned loose in the Abbey," and he leaned his head against the stone wall of his cell, while tears coursed down his sallow old cheeks. "Woe is me; woe is me!"

CHAPTER XII.

Jocelin was chaplain and secretary to the Abbot; so his summons to Bradfield was not, in itself, indicative of his lord's restored favor, for if the Abbot had business with his royal guests, he would stand in need of his secretary. So Jocelin went on his way, unelated at the summons, and much vexed at his carelessness in so nearly revealing the secret of his love to the gossip of the Abbey. He passed down a terrace, through many enclosures, by divers paths, into a small yard-way, and so, through a private door into the corridor on which the Abbot's parlor opened, and entered the room unobserved by its occupants.

Abbot Samson sat there with the Bishops of Ely and Waltham and several dignitaries of the Church. Before them stood the leading advocates of the Abbey, the Earls Faulkenbridge, Albune and my Lord of Clare, with Earl Bigot, a friend of Prince John. The advocates (as were most of the anti-regent noblemen of that time) were clean shaven, with hair cut short on the neck; but the courtier, like his friend and master, the Prince, wore the pointed beard and curling locks, filleted with a golden ribband, the court had adopted in contempt of its smooth-faced, short-locked opposers. As they stood thus, several half-audible comments on Bigot's attire passed between the advocates; for in those days gentlemen had not the manners which of a later date made England's society noted, and men, like children (who are the least artificial of creatures), spoke what was in their minds with brusque freedom.

"A fur pelisse, like a woman, by my halidame!" murmured Albune.

"Thalch!" answered that rugged giant, Faulkenbridge, sucking his teeth in disgust. "So priced and spruce a popinjay I have never seen." If Bigot heard these uncomplimentary remarks, he gave no heed, but whispered from time to time with the Bishop of Waltham, who finally, with much hesitation, addressed the Abbot in a low voice, whereupon Abbot Samson, rising to his feet, exclaimed "My Lord, I was a soldier ere I was a monk, an' by my good sword and my silver cross, I will don mail again ere I humble the pride or sully the honor of St. Edmunds. I'll not cancel away our rights," and he struck a blow in the air as if his clenched hand again held a sword.

"Nay, Father!" expostulated Bigot in a soft, bland voice, "the Prince but claimeth his rights. His lordship the Bishop tells me this wardship has promised the Prince by Prior Roger on the day of thy election. Nay, I know not if he said not, by Brother Samson himself." The Abbot's face was red, and he patted his silken slipper. "By our Lady, this fellow hints of Simony," he muttered. Here the Bishop of Waltham broke in hurriedly, anxious to avert the gathering storm.

"Nay, my Lord, 'twas the Prior who proffered it; an exchange. This wardship for the right of election." The Abbot fairly bristled with rage.

"Since when do Priors give our wards in marriage, and princelings elect Abbots? The Bishop of Winchester long ago held that the power of king-making lay with the clergy, and he proved it, in that he raised Matilda to the throne. Knows the Prince no history? Ye who are his tutors teach him file, methinks. It takes more than the installation of base principles (which ye have so artfully set about) to make a king, Bigot. By my halidame! John heaps insult on injury when he demands the hand of the daughter of my noblest Advocate for a pander, a spendthrift, a libertine, and last but not least, by my troth, a bastard, without a cross in his pouch."

Displeased as the Advocates were by the Regent's demands, they exchanged glances of consternation at this. For while many of the nobles of England were opposed to Prince John, there were few who would have dared to thus criticise the ruler of the realm.

"No head is safe which owneth tongue so hot!" whispered Faulkenbridge to Clare.

"Nay, nay, even though it wear a mitre," answered the other. Albune was much disturbed and the Bishop of Waltham was white with apprehension. Only Bigot maintained his composure; his handsome, dark face suave and smiling as ever.

"Surely the ruler of England can command his vassals, be they ever so high, Father," he protested, stroking back a perfumed curl which had fallen across his rosy cheek. This was the last straw.

"My lord," said the Abbot, in cold fury, "thou forgettest that the Regency lies with the church; as it is, we owe no allegiance to the Regency or the Crown, and of a surety the Pope will uphold us in this just refusal. Announce to His Highness that we will give him audience when he has supped. My chaplain celebrates Vespers in the chapel, my lords," the Abbot turned his back squarely on Bigot, who biting his lips, made a hurried exit, followed by the bishop, who seemed to be mumbling a prayer as he pattered after the irate earl.

As they supped a monk entered and announced that the Princess Rosamund and three nuns were in the courtyard of the palace; having been o'ertaken by night, in a journey from Ely, and craved the hospitality of the Abbot. The truth was, the Prioress, on hearing of John's coming and her son's proximity, for the favorite ever accompanied his brother, could not forbear to hasten to him (regardless of the presence of the Queen) trusting to her tardy appearance and plausible story to gain entrance at Bradfield. Jocelin, who from the elder monks knew well the story of Rosamund de Clifford, looked questioningly at the Abbot, expecting the peremptory dismissal of this ill-timed visitor; but the Abbot's thoughts were not on any ancient quarrel of Henry's wife and mistress; and, then, too, perchance, he cared not for any humiliation which the Princess' appearance would cause the queen and her son. "Why not," he said, aside to Jocelin, "the bastard is here, why not the dam?" And he gave instructions to admit the Prioress.

Throughout the meal, Jocelin sat pale and silent, scarcely touching his food. Through what had passed in the Abbot's parlor, he had realized for the first time what this visit to Bradfield House meant for Rochese. The Prince, in demanding her hand for his favorite, had displeased her powerful guardian. Here was a ray of hope; but it flickered dimly for a moment, and then flared out, leaving Jocelin's heart all the more desolate, for, its faint glimmering. If this suitor was ineligible, the Abbot, no doubt, had others in view. Perhaps Rohese had a lover already, for among all the Abbey Advocates, there was surely some one for whom she had a preference. The thought was as wormwood, and he shuddered at the bitterness which swept over his heart. Faulkenbridge, for all his burly frame and forty years, was good to look at, and my Lord of Clare had a handsome son, his esquire, famed for his beauty and daring. "She is not for such as thou, an' were she free thy oath of celibacy separates thee from her," he told himself.

The Abbot, noticing Jocelin's melancholy, naturally supposed his young secretary was grieving over his past disobedience, and as they went toward the audience hall, he laid his hand kindly on the young monk's shoulder—

"Hast prayed and fasted, my son?"

"Yea, father."

"And repented thy sin?"

"Yea, yea, indeed!" Jocelin answered, earnestly, touched by the gentleness of his usually stern superior.

"Then go in peace, my son. God's benison on thee!" And Jocelin, kissing his hand, fell back among the attendant monks; while the Abbot led the way into the audience chamber. But neither blessing nor pardon could give peace to poor Jocelin, as he brought up the rear of the procession, with hot eyes glaring fiercely for a sight of Geoffrey de Clifford, who had dared stretch forth a rapacious hand toward the ideal set up in his passionate heart.

Prince John had prolonged his feast unduly, being much of a gourmand and careless of the proprieties, which demanded his withdrawal from the board ere his host arrived. So he now rose with his court and withdrew to his dais at the farther end of the hall, leaving the surprised prelate and his monks to pass around the devastated table, while all was confusion: monks scurrying to their places behind the Abbot's chair, courtiers hurrying to their post around the Prince and the ladies in waiting gathering around the Queen. Though such a slight was too obvious to pass unnoticed, the Abbot made no attempt to comment, except to command the removal of the unsightly remnants of the meal.

Prince John and the Queen slightly bent their heads as the Abbot passed them, and he, with extended hand murmured the usual "Pax Vobiscum," though the flash in his eye boded little of peace.

CHAPTER XIII.

It was a sight worth the seeing this gathering of the noblest and mightiest of the realm. The great, arched hall lit by many tapers, shining on the purple and silver of the Abbot's livery; the scarlet and gold of the royal household; the monks' black robes, which but accentuated the brilliancy of the jewel-decked courtiers and ladies. Prince John's dress of crimson, falling to the middle leg, was gold-belted and a jeweled pendant hung from it between his knees. He wore an under tunic of golden cloth, a green-lined mantle, red hose and collar, and sleeves of gold-begemmed cloth. The Queen sat beside him, a stately, portly dame, past life's meridian, her clear dark skin but slightly wrinkled, and the strong mind presaged by her large, dark eyes and Roman nose was fully confirmed by the massive jaw and firm, unsmiling lips. Her dark robes were broidered in golden crescents, and the diamond diadem glittered in her silvery hair like frost crystals on a snowbank.

Near the entrance of the hall on either side were the Abbot's soldiers and the royal body-guard; the latter conspicuous by reason of a great banner, bearing three lions rampant, which the cunning hand of Rosamund had long ago embroidered for the dead King.

John was the first to break the pause following the Abbot's entrance: "We cry thee pardon, Dominus, that we dallied so long o'er our wine, noting not that the hour had passed. But if we receive thee not in all seemliness, blame thyself, who hath so royally feasted us."

"Though something I might 'plain, Prince," answered the Abbot, smiling sarcastically, "'twere passing strange should I find myself amazed, for if your Highness remembers so slight an occasion, you will bethink you that I, as elected Abbot of St. Edmunds, first kissed the princely hand as it held a roasted lark's leg."

The Epiglottis.

A modern engine is dependent to a large extent upon automatically working valves for its efficiency, but the perfected valve was invented by nature and applied to the human body long before mankind began to dream of steam or gas engines. We dignify this valve by the name of epiglottis, and most of us know something about it. It is situated at the back of the mouth just where the air passage and food passage cross. It is the function of the epiglottis to close the windpipe automatically every time we swallow food. If it did not every particle of food would choke us. This valve works with more automatic precision than any ever placed on an engine.

An Appeal to Vanity.

A Mussulman general gained a victory over the Greeks and captured their leader. Having summoned the prisoner into his tent, he asked him what treatment he expected from his conqueror. "If you make war like a king," replied the Greek, "release me; if you make it like a trader, sell me; if you make it like a butcher, slaughter me." The Mussulman general set him free.

A Troublesome Cargo.

"An elephant's shoulder is never still" is a Hindu saying, with reference to the restlessness of the animal. An Englishman tells how the elephant's passion for moving about once came near wrecking a ship.

A number of elephants were taken on board a vessel at Calcutta, and the steamer went down the Hugli river. At night it anchored off Saugor point. The sea was as still as oil, but the ship rolled so much that she was in danger of going over. The elephants had found that by swaying to and fro all together they could produce a pleasant rocking motion. As the ship had no other cargo and rode light the captain was much frightened. The mahouts, or keepers, were hurried down into the hold, and each one, seated on his own beast, made him "break step," but they had to stay there for a long time.

Why We Lack Ennui.

It is a grand thing for the English language that there is no word for "ennui" if the creation had been drab-colored, if there had been no horses, dogs, water rats, or dragon flies; if science and art had been intuitive; if religion had been clear; if all men's conditions had been equal; if men and women were always amenable to reason, and boys were always quiet, then the world might have been somewhat dull; there would have been a justifiable word for ennui in all languages.

BABEL OF TONGUES.

The World's Languages Now and What May be in the Future.

How many men, if asked how many languages there are in the world, could give anything like an accurate answer? The average man's knowledge of ability to speak languages rarely exceeds two besides his native tongue.

It may appear strange, but it is nevertheless true, that there are over 4,000 languages spoken by mankind, while the number of dialects exceeds this. There are more than sixty vocabularies in Brazil, and in Mexico the Nahua is broken up into some 700 dialects. There are hundreds in Borneo, and in Australia there is no classifying the complexities. Let us assume that fifty dialects, on an average, belong to each language, and we have the colossal total of 200,000 linguistic abilities.

A century hence the probability is that there will only be four languages of importance in the world. Central Europe may produce a newer and more straightforward German language. Imperial English may reign alone over the North American continent, while a more business-like Spanish will be used in South American States. Then Russia may take up some more rich Slavonic dialect, which will blend the races of Eastern Europe and Central Asia into a harmonious federation. So that in future these four languages will enter into what may be a never-ending competition.—Exchange.

Got Insulted.

In England it is quite common, instead of saying "Hello" when using the telephone to ask, "Are you there?"

An American who heard it for the first time, thinking some one was endeavoring to have some fun at his expense, replied "No," and hung up the receiver.—Exchange.

"Don't argue with me, sir," said the irascible old gentleman.

"I'm not trying to argue with you," said the persistent person. "I'm merely trying to tell you that"—

"There you go again. I refuse to hear any more."

"Thanks."

"Umph! What are you thanking me for?"

"I just made a bet that you would not have patience enough to hear me state a hypothetical question, and I've won."—Birmingham Age-Herald.

FOR OTHERS TO EMULATE

The directors of the Imperial Oil Company, Limited, have decided to pay all employees who have enlisted, or who may enlist, with the Canadian Contingent for overseas service—in the case of married men—half pay, and—in the case of single men—quarter pay until the end of the war, and in addition, will hold the positions open.

Should any employee who is serving with the colors, meet with a fatality in the course of the war, the directors will continue the payment—in the case of married man—of half pay to his wife or immediate family for six months after his death and—in the case of single man—one-quarter of his salary to his dependents (if any) for six months after his death.

The above applies to all regular members of the staff who were in the service of the company for at least six months immediately preceding the Declaration of War.

WAS RESOURCEFUL.

But He Probably Didn't Get the Job for Which He Applied.

There is a certain middle aged and old fashioned business man who is a little doubtful whether he or the other carried off the honors of war in an interview given to a smart young man.

The smart young man was applying for a berth.

"Let me see," said the merchant; "you've called on me before, but not on your present errand. The first time you represented Up to Date Limited and offered to put our concern on modern lines. Then you came on behalf of Systems & Files and said you were business doctors. And after that you came as the publicity expert of the Newest in Ads company?"

"That is so, sir."

"And are all these—er—companies dead?"

The young man reluctantly admitted that they were.

"Yet after coming here three times to offer to teach us our business when your concerns go down you coolly solicit a berth in this poor, effete old firm. Why, what use are you to us? Look at your record."

The optimist countered that easily. "You never know, sir. I might be very useful. Look what a splendid experience I've had in winding up companies."—Philadelphia Ledger.

The Glad Hand.

We are not isolated units in this universe of ours. We are all of us members of a great world community. All of us are so constituted that our welfare and our happiness depend on the maintenance of good will with others.

To a great extent, however, we always have it in our power to determine just what the attitude of others towards us shall be.

We have this power by virtue of the fact that the human mind tends to be swayed in its critical judgments by the character of the emotional moods experienced. People usually think exactly as they feel.

Hence the value of the glad hand.

The cordial greeting, the cheery smile, the display of genuine interest—all these help to create pleasurable moods in other persons, and consequently prepossess them in our favor.

Whereas the cold, indifferent approach, the flabby handshake and the languid air arouse feelings of antagonism, if not of suspicion and aversion.—H. Addington Bruce in Kansas City Star.

If Your Food Ferments or Disagrees Just Read This!

Thousands of broken-down, despondent dyspeptics have recently been given back their health. A month ago these despairing folks would have scorned the suggestion that anything could help them. Their terrible condition was chronic, and appeared beyond the reach of medicine.

These happy people don't proclaim it was a miracle that endowed them with a new lease of life. It was simply their common sense in selecting a tried and proven medicine, one specially adapted to their particular ailment.

All these splendid cures were effected by Dr. Hamilton's Pills which beyond all question have a strange power to restore a weak or ailing stomach.

If your stomach is tired and overworked try Dr. Hamilton's Pills, and note the prompt improvement. Pain before or after eating will disappear. You'll no longer have that nauseous, gassy, bad tasting sensation. You'll get a real vigorous appetite and digest what you eat. Lots of well digested food is bound to increase your strength, to make you brighter and more ambitious, in a week you'll feel like a different person, in a month you'll be permanently restored.

For folks who are out of sorts, not feeling just up to the scratch, perhaps bothered with headaches or constipation, to them Dr. Hamilton's Pills will prove a boon.

A Land Without Flies.

It should be refreshing and a bit encouraging to the fatigued, hopeless fly fighters to know that there is in the world a country in which there are no flies. The place is the British West Indies. This interesting fact—that there are no flies in British West Indies—starts up a number of questions and curious conjectures. Why is it that they have no flies? Is it that they have lost the seed, or is it that they have some active parasite or animal that feeds on flies, like the South American ant eater, for instance? Certainly it is not that they have no filth. They have heat and moisture, and, if rumor has it true, they have all the filth that is necessary. That these three conditions can exist without any flies is what we do not understand.—Nort Carolina Health Board Report.

Beauty of Zambesi Falls.

To realize fully the wondrous beauty of the Zambesi Falls, Rhodesia, one must have time to linger and watch the ever changing scene. The depths of the chasm below are veiled from sight by the rising columns of opalescent mist, and above the yawning abyss the sun glints and sparkles, weaving the drops into a magnificent rainbow. Three hundred feet below roars and boils the swirling flood as it emerges from the Boiling Pot, rushing on down the zigzag gorge between towering cliffs of rock, narrow, fierce and of unfathomable depth.—African World.

"According to Hoyle."

The first author of books dealing with card games was Edmund Hoyle, who died in London, aged ninety-seven, in 1770. His treatise on whist, piquet and other games are still authorities, and "According to Hoyle" has become a proverb. Hoyle has been called the inventor of whist, which is an error, although he was the first to popularize the game and place it on a scientific and exact footing. Hoyle was a lawyer by profession, but he derived a good income from his books. For his treatise on whist he received £1,000, and the work was so popular that it ran through five editions the first year, besides many pirated editions. Hoyle gave instructions in whist to parties of ladies and gentlemen, charging each £5 per lesson. For some years he held an official court position in Ireland, which paid him $3,000 per year. Hoyle's book on whist was first published in 1743.

The Meteoric Hypothesis.

The nebular hypothesis of La Place has been abandoned in favor of the meteoric hypothesis of Lockyer and planetesimal hypothesis of Chamberlain. All suns, planets and moons, by these two nearly identical theories, were made by the falling in from space of small cosmical bodies, such as the meteors now falling on the earth.

Trillions of year ago there was a meteor moving in space. It is now in the centre of the earth. Another meteor joined this by collision, then another, and this falling in is now going on at a vastly diminished rate, so that comparatively few are now coming in, as may be seen on almost any clear night.—Edgar Lucien Larkin in New York American.

He Ate His Own Words.

Not long ago the punishment for libel in Russia was the requirement that the libeler literally eat his own words. A man who published a small volume reflecting on the unlimited power of the sovereign was seized, tried in a summary way and condemned to consume the objectionable words. In one of the public streets the book was severed from its binding, the margins cut off, the leaves rolled up one by one and fed to the unfortunate author. A surgeon was in attendance to pronounce upon the number possible to give without endangering his life, but he is reported to have set the limit at something like 200.

England is in trouble over the alcohol question; her workmen work too little and drink too much, and so the longed-for munitions are not forthcoming. Do not worry, ye sadly distressed statesmen on the Thames. The world will still go around and Germany will triumph all the same, even though your silver bullets fail you as your copper ones fail you now.—"Die Post".

The other day a Petrograd despatch hinted that the Russian Armies would soon select a favorable line of defence, where they would dig themselves in for the winter. Now comes the Frankfort Gazette with the prediction that the Germans in the East will entrench themselves and not venture into the enemy's marsh lands. It begins to look as though last winter's war experiences were to be repeated on all the fighting fronts, although we occasionally hear that a big drive will soon be made in the West.

WHAT ABOUT RED CROSS?

If all our loose change is going into machine guns—as necessary and legitimate a part of the equipment of every regiment as is the soldier's tunic—who is going to take care of the Red Cross and other activities which are solely dependent upon private generosity? The money that has been wasted by Sir Sam Hughes' Militia Department in the purchase of ancient and decrepit horseflesh would have furnished a good many machine guns, and at a time at Langemarck, for instance, when they might have been the means of saving a good many Canadian lives.

This year Prince Edward Island has full provincial prohibition. Nova Scotia has prohibition outside Halifax, and the Legislature came within one vote of making that town dry also. In New Brunswick only one city and a few rural places have any liquor licenses. The law has been made much more rigid. In Quebec there is a similar advance. Many licenses are wiped out and the greater part of the Province is dry. Manitoba is to vote upon a prohibitory law prepared by temperance workers. Saskatchewan has closed up all her bar rooms and is going on to total prohibition. Alberta has adopted a thorough going prohibitory law. Ontario lags behind every other Province except British Columbia, although public temperance sentiment is very strong—The Pioneer.

GERMAN HATRED OF ENGLAND

Fierce is the tigress when molested in her jungle lair, fierce the swirl of the simoon around the cowering Arab horse men, but fiercer than all, this is the German wrath, which can be be appeased by the utter downfall of the blood soaked fabric of England's Empire.—"Hamburg Nachrichten.".

A LITTLE PREMATURE

There is always a section of the United States press given to boasting, and the swell headedness of it being given to now by reminders the "financial and commercial supremacy os the world" has passed to the United States; and that, as the Ottawa Journal puts it, the rest of the unimportant universe is meekly begging the crumbs from Uncle Sam's table. Of course Canadians always make allowance for this popular national pastime. Some serious matter of fact Englishmen, however are inclined now and then to blurt out the truth, with the result that our boasting relative is eminded of a few homely facts which should prove a great good to the United States. Just a few days ago the cable told us that "one of he best informed British authorities made this statement:

The idea seems to prevail in New York that we are on our knees and begging America to come to our assistance. The situation is exactly the reverse. If America wants to sell Europe any goods, and if Americans hope to continue these sales, they must find a means of giving the usual credits and stabilizing exchange.

Yes, the United States is playing an important part in the financial and commercial world, but to use an old and though somewhat vulgar illustration "its not the only pebble on the beach."

A number of ladies attended the Women's Institute meeting held at the home of Mr. A. McLennan, near Walkerton, on Thursday afternoon Sept 2nd. The program was provided by the Teeswater branch and consisted of a paper by Mrs Moore on "The art of Conversation", a humorous reading by Mrs. Linklater, a paper by Mrs Brill on "The Dangers of Luxury in Modern Life", two solos by Miss Ferguson. A hearty vote of thanks was tendered the ladies for the excellent program given. A dainty luncheon was served by hostess and friends and an enjoyable social time was spent by all.—Teeswater News.

Think It Over.

With the prospect of another hard winter coming our way, a word of public caution could not be out of place. One of the best ways to produce hard times here is to patronize the departmental stores. Every dollar left at home can be, used again and again, and many people are benifitted. But when the departmental stores get our money it is gone for good. Think this matter over seriously, and do every cent of buying at home this fall and winter.

A New Idea

Although many "war" names have been given to babies since the European struggles commenced, perhaps one of the most peculiar, and at the same time interesting, was the one adopted by Mrs. Jobson wife of Fred Jobson, of Woodstock, now of the 34th Battalion at London. Taking the first letters of the more important of the nations of the Allies, viz: France, Russia, England, Belgium and Italy she has christened her baby girl, "Frebi".

Walkerton Defeats Chesley

In the lacrosse match last Thursday evening Walkerton defeated Chesley by a score of 9-7. In the first part of the game it seemed as if it was going to be a walk-over for the locals as the Walkerton boys could not get past the defence. In the third quarter the locals took things easy and allowed Walkerton to score a couple. When they tried to settle down again they couldn't and Walkerton tied the score and aided by the darkness succeeded in notching two more. Joe Cavill refereed to the satisfaction of both teams. The local juniors lined up as follows:—Wendorf, Zimmerman, Green Johnston, Fossald Wright, Brown. Lustig and Krueger.—Chesley Enterprise.

Surveying for Electric Road

The first Hydro Electric railway survey from Guelph to points north has commenced last week, says the Guelph Herald. A party consisting of nine men, fully equipped with their survey instruments, arrived from Toronto, and at once proceeded to the northern outskirts of the city, from where they began working. The Herald learned from the man in charge that they expected to survey a route to Owen Sound and that they would go by way of Orangeville, but did not know as yet what the route would be. It is understood that there are several routes to be surveyed north of Guelph but it will be some time yet before any definite decision will be reached, but it begins to look as though something would be done in the near future.

Lost the Combination

Two weeks ago Saturday the teller in the local Bank of Toronto closed the vault as usual at 1 p.m. and on the following Monday a new clerk who came on here, failed to make the combination work, with the result that all the mechanics from the manager down tried their skill at opening safes but without avail. It was necessary to bring men from the safe works in Toronto to open it up and this was accomplished by drilling holes into the huge steel door and then breaking the combination. It took over a week to get it drilled sufficently to be opened and the safe was closed for two full weeks.—Barrie Advance.

Invented Gas Tank

It may be of considerable interest to our readers to know that A. Strome, who a few months ago opened a garage in the skating rink, has invented the best up to date gasoline tank on the market today, which is now patented and will no doubt be a perfect boon to hardware merchants, as it can be installed in perfect running order or one-hundred and fifty dollars. The tank has a rotary pump with a glass register gauge tube. Should an auto come in and order six gallons of gasoline, but the auto tank holds only four the registry gauge is there in plain sight, anyone can tell exactly how much he is getting. while the drain pipe will return the extra gasoline to the ground tank. A rubber tube connects this little tank which runs directly into the auto tank saving much labor, with no handling whatever. It's perfect safety is another fine feature; no danger of blowing up with a safety tank of this kind. Mr. Strome has already had fifty applications for tanks, and should he see fit to sell his right to a large firm with a royalty, he would make money. 3000 gallons of White Rose gasoline have been sold in the short time since the tank was installed Mr. Strome has also invented an apparatus for jacking up cars which is a great improvement on anything on the market.—Teeswater News.

The Young Mans Problem

If the old saying that every man knows his own business best is generally true it is particularly true when the man faces the issue of volunteering for military service; and it is rather a ghastly impertinence for one delicately to advise another upon this point. If a man feels that he ought to go he should go; if he feels that he ought not to go, he should stay; and hysterical young ladies who confer upon him a white feather or who send him anonymous letters are disregarded. It is probably true that for many citizens the harder task is to stay at home and meet the ignorant opposition of those who do not understand the grave and creditable reasons that persuade many able-bodied young men to this course. A man who is the support of his mother ought surely to be as regardful of his responsibility as the man who has a wife. A man may be the sole support of of his father, or his sisters, or be a mainstay of others who have a claim upon him without advertising the matter to his friends, who may thus be inclined to think he is shirking a national duty in not offering himself for service. Many such a Canadian in these dark days will understand for the first time the meaning of the words, "the heart knoweth its own bitterness."—Mail & Empire.

TOM'S TREE

He was a merry boy, was Tom. When he wasn't whistling he was laughing. Far up the street, long before he came in sight, his cheery whistle could be heard, and in darkest night as in brightest day it give shrill, far sounding hearld of his approach. Nothing could dull the brightness of smile nor the frank sunny directness of his look. Boyish worries and troubles never sobered him; they were soon forgotten, and straightway he seemed as though they had never been.

One day Tom went to the woods and brought home some ferns. Whistling still, he planted them by the door, and carefully watered and tended them till they grew, a green and grateful reward for his care. Now it chanced that a tiny seed had fallen in that soil, and along with the ferns it was brought from its woodland home to the cottage door. Soon among the ferns, fostered by the same care as they enjoyed, there appeared a different green, a little shoot that took shape and stood revealed—an infant tree. Ere long it overtopped the ferns sending lusty branches every way, and soon its shelter afforded a quiet retreat where, private and unobserved the family might gather in the fragrant quiet of a summer evening. Still it grew and Tommy grew, till boyish things were put away and he went forth into the wide world to make his way and do his work.

Tom came home at times, sunny and cheery as of old, ruddy and strong and tall, honored and loved by everyone. The career had begun to unfold, success had begun to smile and the future to grow all rosy with the prospect of a home and love. And the tree? It flourished still—greater and greater it grew till its place seemed all to crowded. Often they gazed upon it in grateful wonder and gladly thought of the day the merry whistling boy had brought it home.

Again he came, but not quite as before. True his smile was as ready as ever, still he whistled through the house, still he gathered sunny cheer all about, but something was different. His step was not so springy, his frame was not so robust, and haunting shadows lay in the brave, open eyes. Tom's sky was overcast, the rosy tint had all gone from the future, and dull and grim and gray the pathway stretched before. He was fighting bravely, cheerfully, desperately fighting a dread disease that, rising all stealthily in a busy day, had remorsely fastened upon him. Oh brave and dauntless spirit! How thou dost reprove our fears and cowardice! How rich and sweet the memory of thy life during those long drawn days!

And Tom's tree—how fared it? Not well it seemed. Some invisible malady had seized it, too, and branch after branch drooped and shrivelled and died. And there they starkly swung amid envisioning green; pitiful reminders of a vigor, a glory departed. Gaunt and nearly naked it stood till merciful winter came and its few remaining leaves were quickly stripped.

They brought Tom home on a winter's night. Valiently he had fought for many months, but now the end had come. Closer and closer had pressed the foe, weaker and weaker the strength that battled, till at length, all spent and weary, though brave and cheerful still, he died. In through the door they carried the wasted, shrunken body, and when the dear ones gazed upon their dead, they saw how weary he had been. Out again, upon a bitter day, out past the shrivelled remains of his tree they bore him, and the tired body was laid to its last rest.

Summer has now come.—The hum of bees, the song of birds, the fragrance of flowers, fill the air and color, and warmpth, and brightness are all about. And Tom's tree—what of it? It is green and flourishing again! Eagerely, gladly its branches reach up and out, up to heaven's sun, out to heaven's glad winds. Its leaves are green, its shoots are strong, its shade is grateful, and birds now may nest there.

Hear now the parable of the tree It is not death that seemeth death. From unseen spaces cometh that which turneth death to victory.—Lucknow, Ont.

Massel-Monk.

A pretty wedding took place at the home of Mr. and Mrs. H. W. Monk of 12th. con. Brant, on Sept. the 1st. when their second daughter Miss Emma, was united in marriage to Mr Wm. Massel, a member of the police force in Toronto. The ceremony was performed in the presence of immediate relatives of the contracting parties by Rev. Mr. Heukel, pastor of the Elmwood Lutheran church, Miss Lenora Monk attending her sister, and Mr. Herman Monk, jr., brother of the bride, being best man. The popularity of the bride was attested by the many valuable presents received. Mr. and Mrs. Massel will live in Toronto The Enterprise joins a host of friend in extending hearty best wishes.—Chesley Enterprise.

FARM GARDEN

BUILDING UP A FLOCK OF SHEEP.

How a large flock of sheep was built up and how it is managed, was told recently by Charles W. Moses, of Ticonderoga, N. Y., a student, in a talk before the Stockbridge Club at the Massachusetts Agricultural College. "The foundation stock was Hampshire Downs but these didn't exactly meet requirements. They were of varying size and the wool was of varying quantity and quality. He wanted a general purpose sheep of uniform size and a fair amount and quality of wool. Therefore, we crossed our Hampshire Downs with Rambouillet, or French Merino, rams.

"However, we now have a little too much of the Merino blood, for often the sheep have the characteristic folds in the skin of the Merino. For this reason we are now adding some Shropshire blood. From this cross we get a lamb in fall weighing about 90 lbs. and a fleece weighing 8 1-2 pounds.

"We have two sheds—50 sheep to a shed. Both sheds face and open to the south. Sheep should not be subjected to any draft, so we always plan to have the walls at least four or five feet high.

"As to feed, we use mostly alfalfa. We have several fields of it. We finish out with the finer hay, using our coarse hay for cattle. We also have pasture, the total acres supporting from 200 to 300 sheep, 15 to 20 cows, and some horses. When first turning the sheep into the green pastures, we go slow. The first few days we let them out only a few hours at a time; otherwise bloating is likely.

"We have two bucks, and two pastures for them, and we always keep a block of salt in each pasture. In winter we grain them enough to keep them in prime condition. In the mountain pasture there is running pasture all the time.

"We used to plan on early lambs, but because of unsuitable conditions, they often were stunted. Now we plan to have the lambs come about spring. As soon as the lambs are able to get around we arrange so that they can get out to the hay and grain without bother from the sheep. Castrating and docking is done when the lambs are three to four weeks old. Coal tar is put on the wound to keep away flies and prevent maggots. About 20 ewe lambs are kept for breeding purposes each year. Usually we have to ship our sheep on the hoof. Before shipping, we feed very little. The sheep will then be ready to eat and put on flesh in the stockyards.

KEEPING CREAM COOL.

Now that warm weather is approaching, every possible means must be taken to get cream on the market in good condition. The warm days that have already passed have had a marked effect in lowering the quality of cream now being made into butter.

Attention must first be paid to cooling the cream just as soon as separated. However, the greatest exposure to heat usually comes when the cream is hauled to market, and the cans are left uncovered, and exposed to the hot sun and dust.

It has been found by experiment that the temperature may be kept more than twenty degrees lower when dampened blankets are thrown over the can or dampened blankets are used than when the cans are left uncovered. In addition, the dirt and dust are kept away from the cans and cream.

It is not only to the advantage of the producer to help in keeping up the quality of the cream so that good prices may continue, but low grade cream cannot be allowed to come upon the market in the future.—H. McCann, Colorado Agricultural College, Fort Collins, Colo.

FOR CUTWORMS.

Mix half a pound of Paris green in 25 lbs. of bran (the proportion for larger or smaller quantities is 1 to 50); the poison should be added to the dry bran little by little and stirred all the time till the whole is tinged with the green color, then add water sweetened with sugar, or molasses, till the mixture is sufficiently moistened to crumble nicely through the fingers. If bran cannot be procured, shorts or flour may be used and for field work may be distributed dry by means of a seed drill.

It is said sweet clover has the peculiar quality to keep flies off horses or cattle. If a sweet clover bunch is hung on a horse flies will not disturb the animal. Cattle that graze in sweet clover all the time have no flies to bother them, because flies will not stay in a field of sweet clover. Tie a bunch of sweet clover on the harness of all driving horses when leaving the farm and it helps wonderfully in preventing their being molested by all kinds of insects.

Provide shade for the cow. She should not be compelled to stand in the hot sun all day and fight flies. It will be ideal if large, shady trees grace the pasture for the cows. Here they they recline and rest after filling up on the long green grass.

A little longer noon hour during the hot weather, with the harness and other encumbrances removed, will assist the horse in going to the field in better shape for the afternoon's work.

Keeping hogs inclosed in a small pen and feeding them an exclusive grain ration is not economical; neither is the practice of feeding them on forage crops without grain.

A TALK ON HOGS.

A few years ago there was a demand for heavy lard hogs. Now the tendency is toward smooth, even hogs of medium weight, of from 225 to 250 pounds, of early maturity. Hogs of this weight should be free from surplus fat, possess smooth shoulders, well laid in with the line of the body, hams moderately heavy, a firm flesh, with flanks well down, so as to furnish a large development of belly meat. The back should be of good length, width and smoothness, showing an absence of large patches of fat above the hams. The best cuts of the hog are taken from the back, loins and sides, hence the importance of good length and depth to the sides. The careful breeder of pure-bred swine keeps informed on just such points and aims to produce in his herd those qualities that most nearly produce the market demand. The scrub hog has no place on the farm, and since the packer and his trade have called for a certain type of hog, it stands the hog raiser well in hand to meet the demand through careful breeding and feeding. Medium-weight hogs, through the demands of trade, have disposed of the old-time 500 or more pound lard hog.

It is interesting to note the results of experiments at the Virginia Station in feeding corn silage "was economical to use in conjunction with corn as a maintenance ration, but not so if used alone." Two brood sows were fed for seven weeks during winter exclusively on silage, the amounts fed per week being 81 pounds in one case and 84 pounds in the other. Of this from 8 to 10 pounds were waste by the animals. The animals lost weight and their general appearance at the end of the experiment "was such as to discourage the future use of silage as an exclusive ration for hogs, though in after-fattening these took on flesh as rapidly as did the ones fed corn, showing that exclusive use of silage had not impaired the digestion."

In the experiments in which the silage constituted only a part of the ration, the animals consumed from 28 to 35 lbs. of silage and 11 to 21 pounds of corn on the cob per week during a period of 18 weeks. The animals were kept in good condition through a severe winter on this ration. By using the silage a saving of nearly one-third in the cost of feed was effected.

Experiments at other stations have not generally been very favorable to the use of silage as a food for swine; nor do the results of experiments at the Virginia Station do more than indicate that silage is worthy of consideration as a component of a cheap maintenance ration, to be used for such purposes as carrying brood sows over winter, and not for fattening.

When used for fattening hogs, four pounds of potatoes is considered equal to one pound of corn. Thus, when corn is worth 40 cents it would be profitable to feed potatoes if they could be purchased for 10 cents.

In the case of breeding sows there is another factor that enters into consideration, namely, that the succulent nature of potatoes tends to keep the system in good condition so that better use is made of other forms of food used. When fed in connection with skim-milk and buttermilk they will undoubtedly make a splendid ration, especially if a little concentrated feed like tankage or oil meal is used to balance the starchy nature of the potatoes.

At the price mentioned—namely, 25 cents per bushel—it is just possible that fully as good results would be obtained by disposing of at least a part of the supply of potatoes and purchasing such foods as middlings, tankage and oil meal. These, fed in the form of slop to sows during the gestation period. However, if one has a cooker on hand, so that potatoes can be boiled and mixed with other foods at a small outlay of labor and fuel, there is no question but what the use of a small quantity daily will bring good results, even when they are worth 25 cents per bushel.

FARM NEWS AND VIEWS.

Save the best calves. More than ever should this admonition be heeded, as there is an increasing scarcity of cattle and sales continue at high figures. Farmers should raise all the stock they can to good advantage, as if not all are wanted at home, there will be a quick demand for the surplus from elsewhere. Do not undertake to raise more than can be cared for in the best manner. Feed properly, keep dry and warm in cold weather, and note what good returns these young growing animals make for the feed and care given. The farm herd should be kept constantly improving by thoughtful selection, breeding and care of animals composing it.

It should not be forgotten that swine form a very important feature on the dairy farm where the skim-milk is kept at home. What is not needed for the calves should be fed to pigs and poultry; both are in increasing demand, and will pay well to give them their proper place on the farm. Breeding sows and young growing pigs should have roomy, warm quarters and be kept well bedded and and dry. With these conditions they will do nicely in winter, and if fed as they should be can be made to grow and fatten as well in winter as in warm weather.

Successful gardening is very largely dependent upon good seeds. Poor seeds always cause disappointment. Even if the plants from poor seeds grow, they are usually weak, grow slowly, if at all, and seldom produce vegetables worth having. When saving seeds select from strong, thrifty, faithful plants and be sure the type is true to the variety. When buying seeds try to patronize reliable firms that have a reputation. Remember, no firm can guarantee seeds to grow, as there are too many factors over which they have no control. They can only assure you the seeds are true to variety and are viable under favorable conditions.

Ordinarily, with all ages of swine, a bushel of shelled corn will produce an average of 10 pounds of pork. In an experiment at the South Dakota Station, on an average for the two years of feeding period of 62 days, a bushel of shelled corn yielded 11.9 pounds of pork. But when an average of 153 pounds of milk was fed with a bushel of shelled corn, an average yield of 17.2 pounds of pork was produced. This was a difference of 5.3 pounds in favor of the milk lots, or in other words, the milk was equal to 5.3 pounds of pork. However, it must not be understood that this quantity of milk fed to a pig without the corn would yield this amount of gain; but when fed in combination, as above stated, similar results are to be expected.

Manure should not be allowed to accumulate in the stables for any length of time. Draw often and spread directly where wanted, where this can be done. If very coarse it would doubtless be better to plow under and so may be necessary to put in large piles to remain until time to plow. Fine manure should be spread broadcast and thoroughly incorporated with soil by the harrowing. The aim should be to make all the manure possible and use it to best advantage on the farm. When this is done it will show its good effects in a satisfactory increase of crops and improvement condition of the soil.

A SPLENDID RECORD

Most people know that the Canadian Pacific Railway traverses over eleven thousand miles of country in Canada, encounters even tropical and arctic weathers; cuts its way through the rugged and difficult country along the shores of Lake Superior; crosses the endless prairies of the west: and finally runs through the glories of the Canadian Rockies where the road in some places has been hewn out of the mountain sides under towering peaks; through great canyons; and in other places tunnels and spiral rails have to be negotiated, all necessitating care in operation. But in spite of all these difficulties the Canadian Pacific has not killed a single passenger in a train accident during the past two years, which is a record Canada can place against the recent boast of the Pennsylvania Railroad not having killed a passenger in three years. Especially so when it is considered that the latter road has not the same climate conditions to face and the easy country through which it traverses.

The Chair of Torture.

The most prominent building in the ancient city of Nuremburg is the castle. One of its two towers was used for torture; the other served as a prison. The castle also contained a museum of horrors until it was purchased by the Earl of Shrewsbury and Talbot, in whose possession these relics now lie. One of them was the chair of torture. It was very heavily made and studded over the seat and at the elbows with blunt topped spikes. To it the victim was tightly bound, and in a short time discomfort began to manifest itself and in time became unbearable. During its continuance the torture was increased in several ways by means of wedges being passed between the legs and screws being applied to the thumbs until they began to bleed.

THE POULTRY WORLD

BACK-YARD CHICKENS' CARE.

The back lot poultryman has these three problems: first, sanitation; second, enforcing exercise sufficient to maintain vigorous health; third, supplying a natural variety of foods.

When fowls are kept in confined yard space both the houses and the outdoor runs must be kept in a sanitary condition. This really means nothing more than keeping them clean. How often to clean is a debatable question, and the answer largely depends upon the climate and partly upon the environment. The ideal housekeeper cleans every day; so does the ideal poultryman.

Unsanitary conditions of any kind must not be tolerated, especially during warm months. Daily removal of all refuse is advisable, since it greatly reduces the danger of disease and of the multiplication of lice and mites. Clean floors, clean nests and even clean walls are conducive to health. The litter on the floor and in the nests should be removed and burned every two or three weeks, depending upon weather, size of the flock, etc.

At this time the house should be sprayed with a good mite killing disinfectant. Many good disinfectants may be purchased. Those who wish to manufacture one may use whitewash or kerosene, with enough carbolic acid to give the mixture a distinct carbolic odor. Spraying is by far the quickest method of application, but less material is required if it is applied with a brush. Kerosene emulsion also is an excellent mite killer, and with the addition of carbolic acid becomes a disinfectant. Roost and nests need an application more often than the rest of the house. In the warmest weather paint or spray the nests and roosts with these mixtures every ten days or so, while once a month will do for the rest of the building.

A tender forage crop which will answer the double purpose of purifying the soil and absorbing and turning to account the fertilizing value of the fowls' droppings should be sown. This crop will be soon consumed or uprooted, and therefore, it is advantageous to have at least two yards for each flock. In this way green food is supplied constantly with the least possible labor. For quick growth sow oats or millet, although almost any small grain will answer the purpose. It is well to sow winter rye or wheat late in the summer in one of the yards, so that a supply of green food may be early in the spring.

The method of feeding should be such that the fowls are compelled to take a normal amount of exercise. Exercise is essential to the health of the hen, but if the hen has plenty to eat she has little inducement to exercise. Unless she is in the best of health she will not lay, hence the need of exercise. Feeding small grains in litter is the most general practice. To feed sparingly at morning and noon and give a full meal at night is a good rule. Exercise of the most vigorous kind may be induced by burying the grains in the earth. This is generally done after the fowls are on the roosts. If given grains in no other way the fowls will be eager to dig them up. The amount of exercise that the fowls will be compelled to take depends upon the depth at which the grain is buried.

Every popular poultry keeper has his method of feeding and his individual preference as to grains. Corn, wheat, oats are mostly commonly fed, but to these barley may be added. Whole corn is almost too heavy and too hearty for the fowl on range and certainly should not be fed to those closely confined. Wheat at present prices is almost prohibitive and barley may be used instead.

Dry mash can be fed economically only in hoppers. Table scraps should, and in many cases will, comprise a considerable portion of the diet. If these are rich, that is, contain much starchy matter, the dry mash should be light or bulky. Table scraps usually consist of pastry, vegetables and meats and the amount of each should be roughly considered at least in making up the dry mash.

It usually pays to chop the table waste to a semi-fluid state, and to this a little bran, corn meal, ground oats or a little of the already mixed dry mash. After mixing all thoroughly while dry add a little boiling water, mix to a moist but crumbly state and feed warm, but not hot. If they are fed liberally with such a mash the fowls will not exercise. Therefore, when table waste forms a large part of the daily ration it should be fed at night rather than in the morning. The fowls will then come from the roosts with empty craws, ready to rustle the litter or scratch in the earth to secure their grain rations.

Where any intensive system of poultry culture is practised two ingredients are lacking in the ration of the laying hen. These are green and animal foods. The table waste may supply substitutes for the green food and insects that fowls gather on range, but probably they will not in a full measure. Besides the green foods already mentioned, ground alfalfa or clover may be added to the mash or fresh vegetables may be used. However, the greatest deficiency is most likely to occur in the supply of animal food. A substitute for this deficiency is found in beef scraps when well tendered and wholesome; but green bone, fed sparingly when sweet; milk, good in any form, if cheap, and other preparations easily obtained.

During the warm weather, especially if a male bird is kept in the flock, eggs should be collected two or three times daily, as many hens are broody at this time. The germs of eggs left under these hens are likely to start. Moreover, heat quickly causes the eggs to deteriorate by enabling the bacteria to multiply rapidly.

On a back lot or in confined area the care of young chicks is a problem that is not nearly as easily solved as the care of grown birds. Pasture, not runs, is what a chicken needs to be grown economically as well as healthily. Therefore duplicate natural conditions as nearly as possible by compelling exercise as with grown fowls and furnish substitutes for the green foods and insects.

To be entirely rid of rats a good cat must be kept. When the neighborhood is overrun with rodents every means of prevention must be used. Grain must be kept in rat proof containers and fed in rat proof hoppers. Starve the rats out and they will disappear. To overfeed in the litter means a meal or more for the rats.

Put the chick houses away from other buildings and raise the coops above the ground sufficiently high to let the light underneath. No rat will stay there. To get a non-chicken eating cat raise one or more kittens with the chickens. Poisons may be used by placing them under wire cages so constructed that rats may enter but fowls and chicks cannot.

Cement walls which extend two feet or more below the ground level and a foot or more above the surface do much to keep out rats. Fine wire nailed to the sill and extended two or more feet below the ground level will also keep the rats out. Covered windows are about the only protection against bad cats.

Methods of preventing and destroying mites have already been given. Body lice may be destroyed by using any of the many good kinds of lice powder on the market or by applying a little finely powdered sulphur through the fluffy feathers at the rear of the body. A little lice powder or sulphur in the nests is a preventive. A dust bath of coal ashes will assist in eliminating body lice.

THE HOUSE OF THREES.

Curious Architecture of England's Most Peculiar Building.

The most peculiar house in the United Kingdom is probably the triangular one at Rushton, in Northamptonshire. Its design is supposed to typify the trinity.

This singular building has three stories, and each story has three windows on each of the three sides, while each of the windows in two of the three stories is in the shape of a trefoil—the three leaved shamrock. In each of the other windows there are twelve panes, arranged in three fours, and the panes throughout are triangular.

Three gables rise on each side, and from the centre, where their roofs meet, a three sided chimney surmounted by a triangular pyramid terminates in a large trefoil. The smoke issues from three round holes on each of the three sides of the chimney.

Three Latin inscriptions, one on each side of the house, have each thirty letters, while over the door there is another Latin inscription of three words, the English of which is, "There are three that bear record," and on each side are the carved figures of three angels bearing shields.

Inside the house each floor contains three three-sided apartments. The length of each of the walls by outside measurement is thirty-three feet four inches—that is, exactly thirty-three and one-third feet. — London Telegraph.

Photographing Bullets.

Moving pictures have unlimited possibilities apparently for the study of rapidly moving objects. An apparatus capable of making pictures at the rate of 100,000 a second has been made. With it seventy-two pictures of a revolver bullet were taken while the bullet moving ten inches. Pictures of a bullet passing through a stick of wood showed a curious condition. The bullet passed completely through the thin stick and was well on its way before the wood gave any signs of distress; then some tiny splinters started out, following the bullet, the stick began to split, and after the bullet had proceeded some distance the stick suddenly fell to pieces.—Chicago Herald.

IN THE CLUTCHES OF RHEUMATISM

The Great Suffering of a Calgary Lady Before Relief Was Found.

There is still a very prevalent belief that rheumatism is due to cold or wet weather. This belief is probably due to the fact that when the blood is thin and watery there is an acute sensitiveness to atmospheric conditions and a change to wet weather often means a return of the excruciating pains. Rheumatism, however, is rooted in the blood, and it can only be driven from the system by building up and enriching the blood. Hot baths and outward applications of liniment may give temporary relief, but cannot cure. If the disease is not attacked through the blood, it simply fastens itself more firmly on the system, and the sufferer ultimately becomes hopelessly crippled. The truth of this is proved by the case of Mrs. Frank Ford, of Calgary, Alta. Mrs. Ford says: "I was an almost helpless cripple from rheumatism. It seemed to have settled to every joint. My arms and hands had to be bandaged. My ankles were so swollen that I had to use crutches. After doctoring for a long time and growing steadily worse, the doctor advised me to go to Banff Springs. I stayed there for eight weeks taking daily baths and returned home poorer in pocket by about $150 and not one bit improved in health. I then entered a local hospital, but did not derive any benefit. I was in such constant pain that I almost wished to die, and I felt sure I would be a lifelong cripple. It was at this stage that a friend who had been greatly benefitted by Dr. Williams' Pink Pills urged me to try them. I began the use of the Pills and after taking them a few weeks the swelling in the joints began to go down and the pain was relieved. This greatly encouraged me and I continued the treatment until in the course of three months the cure was complete. I had thrown away the crutches, would walk anywhere and do my own housework and I never felt better in my life than I do at the present time, and all this is due to the use of Dr. Williams' Pink Pills. I have also given the Pills to my daughter who suffered from anaemia and she has gained in flesh and become a strong, healthy girl."

If you are suffering from rheumatism or any weakness of the blood give Dr. Williams' Pink Pills a fair trial and they will speedily restore you to health and strength. Sold by all medicine dealers or by mail at 50 cents a box or six boxes for $2.50 by The Dr. Williams' Medicine Co., Brockville, Ont.

Silent Tragedies.

It is only the life of violence, the life of bygone days that is perceived by nearly all our tragic writers, and truly one may say that anachronism dominates the stage, and that dramatic art dates back as many years as the art of sculpture. To the tragic author it is only the violence of the anecdote that appeals. And he imagines, forsooth, that we shall delight in witnessing the very same acts that brought joy to the hearts of barbarians, with whom murder, outrage and treachery were matters of daily occurrence, whereas it is far away from bloodshed, battlecry and sword thrust that the lives of most of us flow on, and men's tears are silent to-day, and invisible and almost spiritual.—Maeterlinck.

HOW MEN DIE IN BATTLE.

(Buffalo News)

Men who die in battle die very much alike.

Few can comprehend the tragedy who do not see it, which is, perhaps, just as well, since the actual circumstance is largely robbed of its dramatic veneer and robbed of heroics that the artist and the writer give it.

The powers of visualization do not enable us to picture a man receiving a bullet for a principle, whose wound is cauterized by hope, patriotism, sacrifice, unselfishness and all those fine sensibilities that move men to death unafraid.

Will Levington Comfort came more nearly to describing a soldier's death in battle than any other man of the pen guild, but used too many words.

Verestchagen came more nearly representing the actuality on canvas, but his colors were too bright.

The standard of dying is then somewhat vague to us. But we should say the tennis champion, Anthony Wilding, died well. Though he was killed in action months ago, his story has just reached England.

He commanded a trench party and because his range was imperfect he built a platform to raise the gun. Because he would not ask another to expose himself to the German fire Wilding stood head and shoulders above the "dirt line" from 5:30 in the morning until 4:30 o'clock in the afternoon, when a shell dropped into the trench beside him, leaving not enough of him for his comrades to bury.

Beside his cap and side arms, laid aside during the heat of action, they found a letter to his mother and this note to the "next of kin":

"For really the first time in 7½ months I have a job on hand which is likely to end in gun, I and whole outfit being blown to hell. However, it is a sporting chance and if we succeed we will help our infantry no end. I know the job exactly and the objects in view, from my study of them, which is the only way to play business or war. * * *

"He just crumpled up and flew into pieces," says the comrade who carried the recollection home to England.

"The sporting chance" was against him, but the hearts of red-blooded men warm more than a little when they hear how he took it when the chance came.

Wilding was a splendid member of the brotherhood of courage.

THE GREATEST RAILROAD.

Africa's Famous Cape to Cairo Line Will be Unique.

When all the great railroad trunks of the world have been built, a decade or two hence, four of them will appear upon the map in heavy black, indicating that they surpass all others in importance. These will be: The Pan-American, from the arctic wastes of Canada to the Strait of Magellan; the Transsiberian, from the Atlantic to the Pacific across northern Europe and Asia; the Transpersian or some other line, from the southeast of Europe to India, and the Cape to Cairo.

The Pan American and the Indo-European railways may surpass the Cape to Cairo as commercial arteries, and the Transsiberian will doubtless figure more potently as a strategic line, but for the sheer interest of the country traversed—for the picturesque variety and romantic appeal of the panorama running like double cinematograph films past the car windows—the great African trunk can never know a rival.

Six thousand miles across 65 degrees of latitude; a score of climates, and the lands of a hundred different peoples or tribes; the second longest of the world's rivers and two of its largest lakes; the greatest dam ever built, conserving water for the world's richest lands; the most imposing and ancient of all temples; the greatest waterfall, and the most important gold and diamond mines, and finally one of the last great expanses of real wilderness, the only place in the world where the wild beasts of the jungle may be seen in their primitive state from a train—all these seen, traversed or experienced in twelve days! Surely there can never be another such railway as this.—Lewis R. Freeman in World's Work.

Why Athletes Get "Stale."

The question of short versus long periods of practice in training the human muscles for any particular kind of work is obviously one having far-reaching application. Some interesting experiments on this subject were carried out by Dr. K. S. Lashley, of John Hopkins University. Acquisition of skill in archery was selected as the subject of observation. Twenty untrained persons were divided into three groups. One group shot five arrows with the English longbow per day; another twenty shots per day; and the third, forty shots. The results showed conclusively that the group shooting only five times a day improved in accuracy with less expenditure of time in practice than was required by either of other groups for the same amount of improvement. A report on the experiments says: "The relatively great efficiency of short periods of practice continuing for many days is in accordance with the results of the study of animals and of speech habits in men, the length of practice periods required is usually too great for maximum efficiency."

An Ancient Phrase.

The frequently quoted "I do not pin my faith upon your sleeve" is traced in sentiment to feudal times, when the partisans of a leader used to wear his badge pinned upon their sleeves. Sometimes these badges were changed for specific purposes, and persons learned to doubt: hence the phrase, "You wear the badge, but I do not intend to pin my faith on your sleeve."—New York American.

THE NEW BRITAIN

The war, which is transforming everything, has transformed England. Our politicians do not seem to know it, but we are to-day, we never shall be again, the same people with the same conditions and the same days of looking at things that we were a year ago.

At the first touch of war the antagonisms of party shrivelled up. They are remembered now only as an incomprehensible nightmare. Great Britain, as never before in her history, became a political unit. The slate was wiped clean at a stroke of all the barren animosities and contentions of faction. In the House of Commons, but lately a whirlpool of strife, and throughout the country, where passion only a few days earlier had been wrought up to little, if at all, below boiling point, the concord was absolute and unbroken.

A generation hence we may again have parties in Britain. Meanwhile we are heading straight, if not for a dictatorship, at least for some sort of Committee of Public Safety with all but absolute powers.

This, then, is one of the first results of the war for Great Britain. The country has found out, is disenchanted with, and utterly revolts from the politicians and their party game. It will not return to the old moorings. It will, on the contrary, insist on some very radical changes in the forms and methods and machinery of our public life.

But the political unity of the nation, induced by the outbreak of the war and confirmed by all that has happened since, found a far more momentous counterpart in a social unity. One of the compensations of war is its value as a purgative of self. It has visibly in the past twelve months drawn all classes closer together and evoked a spirit of genuine fraternity. Rich and poor beneath the compulsion of a common affliction have realized that they are all alike Britons and bound as such to stand together and help one another and the nation through the storm.

We are not a social democracy before the war. We are well on the way towards becoming one now. We shall be one before the longdistant peace is concluded. Already some three million of our best men, drawn from every occupation and every rank in life, have mingled with one another, have learned to understand and sympathize with one another, in the new armies. Another three millions may yet have to be added to them. And this great force of hard, clean men, with all the nonsense of social distinctions knocked out of them, trained into an equal brotherhood in the severest school of courage and efficiency, is the backbone of Britain during the war, and will continue to be its backbone through the not less anxious decades of peace.

The war has fused as nothing else could have fused us into one people. Of what account is "the guinea stamp" to-day? Gone is the vicious consideration that wealth has always claimed and received in the plump security of these islands. Duke's son and cook's son are fighting shoulder to shoulder, great ladies slave like barmaids at refreshment buffets; a shopwalker and a grocer's assistant wear the V. C.—the new patent of nobility.

We have learned in the first year some memorable lessons. We have learned particularly how much the State can do for the common weal that it has never done before. If the spirit of caste and the worship of wealth have sensibly weakened among us, so also has the fetish of property. Private ownership of the services and utilities that are indispensable to the life of the community has disclosed some staggering flaws. An industrial system that still in the main regards money as the beginning and end of the relationship between employers and employed has bitterly and to our national humiliation revenged itself upon its creators.

Is there anybody who after the experience of the last twelve months does not look upon the duties of the State in regard to land, mines, and railways—to take but these examples—from an angle that would have seemed incredible a year ago; who does not realize that in the wholesomely economical and disciplined future that awaits us we shall have to pour all our resources and "Socialize," as it is called, many of our productive agencies to keep going at all; and who does not see already that the old days of happy-go-lucky individualism have vanished?

But another and a not less vital revelation of the war has been the change it has wrought in the status and activities of women. There were people before the outbreak who said that women could not vote because they could not fight. We all know better now. We all know that you cannot wage war without the help of women, that their fire and self-sacrifice and compassion and organizing talents are an essential part of a modern nation's military strength. The war already has done more for the sex than anything they could do for themselves, and in the new Britain which is now being hammered on its anvil—a Britain intolerant of party politics, socially remade, pivoting upon its citizen soldiery condemned for its everlasting benefit to thrift, and pursuing, perforce, vast schemes of economic reconstruction—in this new Britain women are destined more and more to share in the opportunities and responsibilities of men.—London Daily Mail.

THE CANADIAN GOVERNMENT

Offers Suggestions for Fruit Preserving.

In an advice circulated throughout Canada, the Fruit Branch Department at Ottawa suggests as being best for preserving purposes, certain brands of peaches: St. Johns, Elbertas, Crawfords and Smocks, and for plums Bradshaws, Gages, Lombards, Reine Claude.

The advice is timely and to it may be added that many of the most successful makers of preserves have for years insisted on securing from their grocers the St. Lawrence Extra Granulated Sugar (Pure Cane).

It is well-known that the slightest organic impurity in sugar will start fermentation in the jam, and St. Lawrence sugar which tests over 99% pure has never failed the housewife. Grocers everywhere can fill orders for this sugar. The best way to buy it is in the original sealed packages 2 or 5 lbs. cartons, 10, 20 and 100 lb. bags.

Girls' Banks in Germany.

There is a kind of savings bank for girls in Germany which might well be imitated in this country. On the birth of a girl the parents can insure her in one of these banks for a sum that will give the child on the completion of her eighteenth year a small capital to start in life with, to follow her profession or to finish her studies, or to serve as a dowry. In the event of her marriage. The annual premium is a fixed sum and comparatively light and scarcely proves a burden. It certainly must prove a great help to a girl when she arrives at the age of discretion to [illegible] the interest of a nice little fact of her own.—St. Louis Globe-Democrat.

Must Sing National Anthem.

The Bishop of Huron has ordered that the first verse of "God Save the King" be sung in all the Anglican Churches throughout the Diocese, morning and evening until the close of the war. This, with the special service for the war keeps the thoughts of the men at the front and the patriotic spirit constantly, before the people.

Magistrates may go on Salaries

To be placed on a salary basis rather than fees was the claim of a committee representing the associated Police Magistrates of Ontario, which appeared before Premier Hearst and Hon. I B Lucas, attorney-general. The members of the deputation pointing out that 200 police magistrates were inadequately recompensed for hearing cases that some times last two or three hours It is understood that the ministers agreed that the police magistrates had a sound complaint and promised relief.

MILITARY DAY

luated by scores of colored lights and presented a great appearance. The evening performance which was attended by a large crowd, included boxing bouts, wrestling match, clubswinging and military drills was drawn to a close about ten o'clock by the masterly rendering of the National Anthem by the massed bands. This was the grand finale of one of the best and most successful celebrations in the history of Walkerton.

As a stimulous to recruiting, the day was a success, Capt. Klein and Lieut. Farrel, signing up thirteen men for the 71st battalion. They are:—David Neske Walkerton, Edwin Durrer Chepstow, Oswald Lumley Walkerton, Elmer J. Gregg Pinkerton, Samuel J. Reaburn Pinkerton, Harry W. Schill Mildmay, Leo. J. Herringer Mildmay Alex Thompson Cargill, and the following Englishmen who have been employed in this locality for some time:- Edwin Harriston, Geo. T. Leonard, Fred J. Hawkef, Thos. Watbrooke and Thos. Feirn. Several other young men have promised to don the khaki and as the result of the visit of the 34th, it is expected that many more will join the 71st.

The receipts at the gate and grand stand for the day amounted to $850. To this amount will be added the entrance fees of fall fair exhibitors and receipts from other sources which will reach a considerable amount. Of the total receipts, $150 is first to be given to the patriotic fund, $112 to the fall fair and the balance after expenses are paid will be contributed to the Patriotic Fund.

The thanks of the townspeople is extended to the officers and men of the 34th, who presented the program. A more respectable, orderly, well behaved band of soldiers could not be gathered together. Every courtesy was shown them and it is very gratifying to those interested to know that the soldiers were well pleased with their day's outing and state that the day was an enjoyable one and claim that they received better treatment in Walkerton than in any town they have yet been. They left for London on their special train about eleven o'clock.

Now in the Trenches

The Eighteenth Battalion of the Canadian Army which has been training in England for several months is now in the trenches in France and according to despatches from London, is defending three miles of battle-line. In this battalion there are many Bruce boys including several from Walkerton and in the days to come the casualty lists will be scanned with anxiety.

Jewish New Year.

Wednesday evening of last week at sunset the Hebrews commenced the celebration of their New Year. It was the first day of the seventh month of the year 5676, according to the Jewish calendar. On that day the trumpet is sounded according to a mosaic command and burnt offerings are made. The modern custom however, is to hold services of prayer when each individual takes an inventory of his sins of the past year and prays fervently for forgiveness.

Open Season For Game.

The following will be of interest to the local sportsmen who wish to know the open season for the various games: Duck, from Sept. 15th. to Dec. 15th., both days inclusive; geese, Sept. 15th. to April 15th.; grouse, Oct. 15th. to Nov. 15th, both days inclusive; plover and snipe, Sept. 15th., to Dec. 15th.; hare or rabbit, Oct. 15th to Dec. 15th; black squirrel, Nov. 15 th. to Dec. the 1st.; mink, Nov. 1st to April 30th; muskrat, Dec. 1st to March 31st. No muskrat can be shot or trapped during the month of April.

The Horrible Example

The Flesherton Advance taking Walkerton as the horrible example of the results of the open bar, has the following to say:—

"If you want an object lesson on the benefits of local option, and the baneful results of the open bar, subscribe for a Walkerton paper. From 2 to 6 cases of a sensational nature resulting from too long a lingering at the beer pump, are recorded in the Walkerton papers every week. It makes good news from an editorial standpoint, but from a moral view point it is not an honor that our sister town should be proud of, and it is safe to say the victims do not feel elated at the publicity inspired by their actions. Local option has proven times over that if it does not introduce total prohibition it throttles the traffic to such an extent that the newspapers suffer a great dearth of news concerning drunks and disorderlies.

The Voter's List's Act.

Notice is hereby given that a Court will be held pursuant to the Ontario Voters' List Act by his Honor the Judge of the County Court of the County of Bruce at the Law Library in the Court House in the Town of Walkerton on Saturday the 30th, day of October, A. D. 1915 at 3 o'clock P. M., to hear and determine complaints of errors and ommissions in the Voters list of the Municipality of Walkerton for 1915.

Dated this tenth day of September, A. D. 1915.

Persons sending in personal correspondence or other news items in unsealed envelopes should remember that a one cent stamp is sufficient. Printers' copy is not subject to the war tax but the flap on the envelope must be unsealed.

Keep The Lord's Day.

This is quoted by an exchange from an exchange, so it is doubly worthy of consideration. "There is, unhappily, less and less emphasis put upon the importance of a reverent and restful observance of the Sabbath by young people, as well as older. The familiar caricatures of former strictness are much more frequently heard than is earnest plea or counsel against frivolity and secularization. The excursions, the bikes, the automobile and motorcycle runs, the camp, are the order of the day, and their influence is to dissipate any sense of responsibility for attendance upon worship or the practice of devotional meditation or reading. This is to be feared, is not an exaggeration of conditions, and it is difficult to see how thoughtful people can fail to deplore it and be concerned about it. There are commercial institutions which still recognize the value of Sabbath observance. It is related that the Bank of England has a list of twenty questions which are presented for answer for every man young or old, who applies for a situation in the Bank. The first question is, "How do you spend your Sundays?"

"Mine" Reporter Arrested
Walkertonians will remember the visit to this town some two years ago of promoters who were selling shares in a coal mine which was alleged to have been discovered near Shelburne. Several citizens mostly women invested sums ranging from $500 to $3000 and as it was discovered that the mine was a fraud, a warrant was sworn out for the arrest of the promoters. Nothing transpired until Thursday last when one of the men Gordon A. Bonter was arrested in Toronto by detectives. Bonter who had less than 25c in his pockets was taken to the police station and was remanded until Friday of this week for a hearing on charges laid against him in Toronto. He will then be brought to Walkerton to face several charges of fraud laid against him.

Gipsy Woman Arrested.
A band of gipsies struck town on Tuesday, among their number being the usual fortune teller. The woman proceeded to practice her vocation at the G T.R. depot and by working a smooth game, succeeded in having several of the sterner sex part with considerable loose change. A complaint was soon laid against her and she was arrested by Chief Ferguson on the criminal charge of obtaining money by fraud, and placed in the lockup. As the woman had two small children to care for, and pleaded hard for liberty and those who prosecuted having received their money back and did not wish to press the case, the court modified the charge to that of vagrancy and on the woman paying the costs incurred, allowed her to go. The caravan at once left town and headed for Formosa.

Bread Still 12cts
In another column of this paper appears a communication from the Walkerton bakers protesting against an item which appeared in a recent issue of the Telescope, in which we commented on the present cost of bread which despite great reduction in the price of flour has not been dropped from the war-scare price of 12c per loaf. There is very little in the letter worthy of our attention, for we still maintain that the price of bread in Walkerton is unnecessarily high: Bread in Durham was reduced to 10c per loaf over two weeks ago, but in Walkerton it still remains 12c. and according to the bakers will remain at that price for a time at least. What we want is a square deal for the working man and as they considered that they were not receiving such from the bakers, a good many housewives have commenced baking their own bread, thereby saving money.

Visited London.
At a rally of the Western Ontario Chapters of the Imperial Order of the Daughters of the Empire, held under the auspices of the Municipal Chapter of London, the Walkerton Chapter was represented by the vice-regents and the secretary. The meeting was held in Cronyn Hall which was beautifully decorated for the occasion. The chief feature of the meeting was a most interesting address by Mrs. MacDougall of Montreal who reported that the Order had raised, besides the Hospital Ship Fund, nearly half a million dollars for patriotic purposes. A resolution was passed asking the Western Ontario Chapters to give a motor ambulance to be used where it was most needed. After other business had been disposed of, the delegates were driven to the camp where they saw the troops march past and were the guests of the London ladies at an afternoon tea. Some of the delegates had the privilege of dining with the officers of the 34th. Battalion and inspecting the camp, and were especially impressed with the neatness of the camp and the efforts made to secure the comfort of the privates of the Battalion.

BORN

CUNNINGHAM—In Greenock on Sunday, Sept. 12th., to Mr. and Mrs. J. A Cunningham, a daughter.

DEAN—In Walkerton on Sunday, September 19th, to Mr. and Mrs. Arthur Dean, a daughter.

TOLTON—At the Bruce County Hospital, Walkerton on Tuesday, September 21st. to Mr. and Mrs. Edwin Tolton (nee Miss F. McNeill), a son, (stillborn).

JONES—In Walkerton on Sunday, Sept 20th to Mr. and Mrs. Mac Jones (nee Miss Evelyn Heffernan) a son.

MARRIED

EIDT—HODGE—In Tarrytown, New York, on Thursday, September 16th., Mr. Fred A. Eidt, eldest son of Mr. and Mrs. N. Eidt of Walkerton, to Miss Florence E. Hodge of Tarrytown. Mr. and Mrs. Eidt will reside in Tarrytown.

Pinkerton Fair.
The annual fair of the Pinkerton Agricultural Society will be held on Friday of this week, September 24th.

Soldiers at Paisley Fair.
A company of 34th. Battalion, London will be at Paisley Fair Wednesday, Sept. 29th., with machine gun section and battalion band. Grand military tournament—drills and exercises, machine gun firing, etc., afternoon and evening.

At Stratford Normal.
Among those who are attending the Stratford Normal School from this locality are:—Dorothy Armstrong, Hanover; Hilda Bierworth, Elmwood; Verna Donnelly, Pinkerton; Jean Everett, Walkerton; Nettie Gunn, Glamis; Sara Little, Walkerton; Hattie Long, Walkerton; Sylvia Mielhausen, Elmwood; Mary Webb, Glamis and Gordon Pinkerton, Pinkerton.

Rural School Fair.
The annual Rural School Fair for this section of Bruce was held under the supervision of Mr. N. C. McKay on Monday afternoon. Although the attendance was not up to that of the past two years, there was a good crowd of school children present and their exhibits were numerous and of excellent standard. We regret that, owing to the absence of Mr. McKay to other fairs, we are unable to publish the prize list this week, but it will appear in our next issue.

The First Prize Map.
Boisie Farewell, son of Dr. and Mrs. Farewell of Walkerton was among those to secure honors at the Canadian National Exhibition at Toronto, the young lad, having been awarded first prize for the best map of the Dominion of Canada. Boisie is to be congratulated on his success. The prize winning map is now on exhibition in the window of Hunter's Drug Store and is worthy of inspection by school pupils and older citizens. The accuracy of the map and its lettering would indicate that hours of ardent toil had been spent in its drawing. However, the boy achieved his aim and in the honor secured was amply repaid for his trouble.

The Trip to the Allies
The "Trip to the Allies" on Friday last, which was put on by the ladies of the Soldiers' Aid was a genuine success. There were some 150 tickets sold and the ladies cleared over $50 which money will be devoted to paying for the field kitchen presented to the 71st battalion. Some fifteen autos were detailed to accomodate the crowd of excursionists, the first load leaving the town hall shortly after seven o'clock and the last load returning about 2.30 Saturday morning. The first of the Allies to be visited was Belgium, Mrs. W. J. Richardson's, next was Great Britain, Mrs. H. McNeill's, then came Italy, Mrs. Archie Toltons, then France. Mrs. B. J. Waechter's then Japan, Mrs. Alex McLennan's and last of all was Russia, Mrs. Frank Rennie's. Each house was tastily and beautifully decorated in the national colors and at each place the excursionists were served with a dainty lunch consisting mainly of the national dish of the country visited. The trip was a decidedly enjoyable one and was so successful that the ladies are contemplating holding another to a different section of Brant in the immediate future.

Death of Dr. Sinclair.
On Tuesday afternoon there passed away one of Walkerton's most prominent and public spirited citizens, in the person of Dr. L. Sinclair, who died at his home on Durham St. after a short illness from a general breaking up of his system. The late Dr. Sinclair, who was in his 77th year was born in Lobo, tp. County of Middlesex, on April 15th, 1839. He received his early education in a country school and later taught for several years. He then entered Ann Arbor as a medical student and graduated in the class of 1861. In April of that year he entered the United States Army Medical Service at Nashville and Resaca in 1865. He later returned to Canada and started a practice, at Napier, Middlesex County, where he met and married Julia Ann Finkle widow of Dr. Wm. Henderson, who predeceased him in November 1908. The deceased came to Walkerton and started a practice in 1868, and has practiced here continually during the intervening forty seven years. Dr. Sinclair was the pioneer medical practicioner not only of Walkerton, but of Bruce County. During his many year's of service here, he became the town's most well known citizen and took a great interest in all matters pertaining to the public life of the municipality. He served several terms at the council board and the installation of the waterworks system in Walkerton, and the erection of the Bruce County Hospital are largely due to his initiative. He is survived by one daughter, Miss Corinna Sinclair of Walkerton and one son Dr. Herbert H. who has been his partner for the past twenty-one years. The funeral will be held this (Thursday) afternoon at 2.30 o'clock to the Walkerton cemetery.

Barn Burned.
During the heavy electricial storm of Thursday evening last, the barn of Mr. Frank Hanmore, on the 6th. concession of Brant was struck by lightning, and destroyed together with the contents by the fire which followed. Mr. Hanmore who had prepared to thresh the following day, lost the entire season's crop and his loss was a heavy one. The reflection of the conflagration was plainly visible from town.

Defeated in Wingham.
The first of the final games for the Free Press Trophy, between the Walkerton and Wingham baseball teams at the latter town on Friday last, resulted in a win for Wingham by the score of 11—1. The game was reported to have been a fast one no score being made by either team until the sixth innings, when Wingham notched three and Walkerton one. In the remaining three innings, by timely hits, the home team managed to score eight more while the Walkerton nine were held scoreless. The locals are confident that they can defeat their opponents in the final game here on Saturday afternoon. If they succeed the teams will then play a sudden death game either in Harriston or Teeswater to decide who gets the silverware.

COMMUNICATION

Editor of Telescope

Dear Sir:

For public information, I am sending you a list of names of men who have enlisted with the 71st battalion, Canadian Expeditionary Forces. A perusal of the names and places of birth would be of general public interest. Of thirty-three men who have enlisted, it will be noticed that nine were born out of Canada, and twenty-four are Canadian born, and that of the twenty-four Canadian born, eleven bear German names.

These figures show that the number of Canadians who offer to do their duty to their country is still smaller in comparison to those born in the Old Country than it should be, when one considers the very small number of the old country men in this part of the country.

These same figures should also give the quietus to those who delight in speaking of every one who bears a name of German origin as one who is disloyal. The fact that eleven of the twenty-four Canadian born have such names should set thinking many who have no such names but who are continually shouting loyalty, (but doing nothing) and insulting others who are in most cases more loyal than they are themselves.

Recruiting is still going on and more men are wanted and there are still here a large number who should come and enlist. Among these is a man who several weeks ago wrote to the Bruce Herald and Times complaining that men who had been rejected for overseas duties had been sent to Tobermory to do guard duty, and claiming that only those should be sent there, who wish to do training to fit them for overseas. If the writer will come forward now like a man, he can enlist and receive five or six months of the very best training for the front something which he could not get at Tobermory for many reasons.

I am also enclosing you for publication a list of those who have volunteered their services but who, through no fault of theirs have had to be rejected and the reasons for rejection I think is owing these true young men to publish their names so that they will not be criticised as others are deservedly being criticised,

Jocelin's Penance

The Prince, not knowing if these words were uttered in jest or reproof, hesitated before replying, his cheek flushing under its flaxen beard; then, choosing to see but the humorous side of the happening, said laughingly:

"By the rod, Abbot Samson, more than one prince of the Church hath kissed a greasy paw; for methinks I have heard of Abbots who had woman-cooks or focariae; though, Gramercy, the fellowship stopped neither at board nor hearth."

"Come," interrupted the Abbot impatiently, "let us speak of weightier matters. Your Highness, by Earl Bigot, hath made demands for the disposing of a certain wardship." The Prince turned petulantly to Bigot, who stood near with Counsellor Geoffrey:

"Roger, you spoke me not of this."

"My Prince," responded the courtier, with easy familiarity, "when I sought thee after the Abbot's audience thou went at table, and forbade the delivery of any such rude pratings," casting a spiteful glance at the Abbot.

"True, true: I said you nay, I remember, and you pressed not the matter," responded John hastily, not anxious that the Abbot should hear his disrespectful words repeated. "Come hither, now, sorry herald, and deliver thou the Abbot's message, though that were useless with his Lordship in the presence." But Bigot, who much desired to keep peace between his master and the Abbot for a time at least, hastily moved to the royal side, and, in a low voice, gave John a very softened version of the Abbot's cavalier refusal to transfer the wardship of the Lady de Cokefeld. He represented the Abbot as loth to surrender so rich a wardship and desiring of a fief in another hundred, as a bonus for the forfeiture.

John waved him away—"Pooh, pooh, Sir Abbot, thou art right—'tis a rich wardship, and I confirm thy decision," and ere the astonished Abbot could speak, he went on, "but, Father, bring forth this richly dowered ward of thine and let us see what thou art so loth to part with." Seeing by the Abbot's face that a refusal of this was imminent, the Prince motioned to Bigot, who went out. Dumbfounded at the good humor with which the Prince seemingly received the curt refusal of his demands, Samson answered more gently than hitherto:

"I pray thee, your Highness, have me my ward excused. The maid is unaccustomed to courts, and would be discomforted at appearing before such a great company. Besides, what matters her appearance to thee?"

"By the blood!" exclaimed the Prince, with a sly glance at Geoffrey; "should I not wish to see my sister that is to be? Zounds, if she be fair, I'll salute her right brotherly."

"Thou art ever ready to so salute, my Prince," murmured Geoffrey in his ear.

The Abbot's face expressed both anger and bewilderment. "Highness," he began, but his utterance was stayed by a commotion at the hall's entrance.

Henry Bigot had not far to go in search of the Lady de Cokefeld; indeed, she was on her way to the hall when she met the Prince's messenger. Ignorant of the contested wardship, and unconscious that the Abbot had but kept her in retirement to hide her from the two greatest libertines of a gross age, after some days of semi-captivity she felt a great curiosity to see for herself what the royal visitors were like. So, knowing Samson would refuse her permission to pay court to Queen Elinor, she had privately dispatched a messenger to her majesty that very evening, craving permission to attend on her, as was her right, as the daughter of so noble a subject as Adam de Cokefeld. Permission granted, Rohese now entered the audience chamber, escorted by Bigot, and attended by Mistress Mary and Mordred, bearing her trailing skirts.

"Holy Saint Francis!" exclaimed one of the monks. "By Jesu!" cried more than one courtier more softly, and the Prince's heart gave a leap within him, as he murmured, "By Christ's blood! The fairest maid in all England." And indeed, Rohese was fair enough to make any pulse throb quickly. As she came toward the dais, Geoffrey's sensual face lit up as he feasted his eyes on her loveliness, and stepped forward that she might approach him closely as she passed. Already he had thought, "Nay, Jack can have the chink; I'll enjoy the maid."

Rohese was dressed in damask robes of shades of green and blue, curiously wrought with pearls, so that one saw therein all the hues of the peacock's plumage; her veil gleamed silver white against the rich fabric, and a fan of peacock plumage sparkled in her hand. Her richly tinted hair lay along her back in two great plaits, bound here and there with ropes of pearls, the braids falling far down her train, gleaming there like two red-gold serpents. A murmur of admiration went up from the crowded hall, and Rohese, fearful of the Abbot's displeasure, and frightened at her own temerity, quickened her pace, and after bending over the Prince's hand, knelt at the Queen's footstool. Elinor, her stern face grown kind, lifted the blushing girl, and with a few words of greeting and encouragement, seated her on a cushion at her feet. And John eagerly leaned forward from his throne to whisper to her something which made her blush the more, though she answered him only by a slight shake of the head.

Thus she sat, the cynosure of all eyes, for all the world must stare now, as all the world—that is, that part which formed the Prince's court being well trained in Sadi's maxim—"Should the Prince at noonday say 'It is night,' declare you behold the moon and stars;" praised the maid Prince John had called the fairest in all England.

And poor Jocelin, chagrined at their gazing, looked upon her radiant beauty, too, and grinding his teeth, dug his nails deep into the flesh in the jealous rage and despair of impotent love, while in his ears there rang the minstrel's rhyme:

"There dwelt a page in castle Clare,
And oh he loved his lady so!
And yet she moved so proud and fair—
She did not care—she did not know,
She did not care nor know."

CHAPTER XIV.

"Surely, Prince," said Samson, "Roger of Bigot delivered not my answer aright."

"Yes, My Lord, he told me thou demurred somewhat relinquishing so rich a holding. An' by our Lady, I blame thee not, since mine eye hath looked upon the most precious part of the trove. 'Ah, a monk hath an eye for beauty!'"

"Demurred somewhat!" thundered the Abbot. "An' this to me. Am I to be juggled with in mine own castle as a nurse dandles a puny child who frets and will not take its pap? I deny thee this wardship, John of England, and will hold this female Advocate, and bestow her hand at mine own pleasure."

In the tense silence the Prince's strenuous breathing could be heard, as flinging aside his mother's restraining hand, he rose, and with a rage-purpled countenance, shook his fist at the Abbot.

"Deny, deny! God's blood, thou deny! An Abbot whom I created but yesterday. Thou forgettest whose subject thou art, proud monk!"

"The church is subject to none save the most high God, Prince John Sansterre. The ring and the crosier are emblems of that power no king can bestow! Beware, lest thou bring upon thee the interdict of the Church by seeking to snatch from her her just perquisites." At this direct threat of excommunication, a murmur went round the hall.

In the middle ages, when tyranny and superstition were rife, excommunication was the iron sceptre by which the Church ruled prince and subject. The excommunicated were shunned like lepers by their friends, families and servants; and for any communication with persons beneath this dread, a lesser excommunication or privation of sacraments was incurred, to be lifted only by penitence and absolution.

John felt that he had gone too far. This Samson was a formidable enemy, who, besides wielding spiritual power, was not without material means of wreaking his vengeance, for John's quick eye had caught the glint of steel from beneath the robes of a hundred monks, and saw that the corridor outside was filled with men, who, though they were dressed as servitors, each bore in his belt a Sheffield blade, and each hand went to hilt at sound of Samson's voice. Vainly had Bigot essayed to stay his master's wrath, as had Geoffrey and the Queen. Now, no restraint was needed. John was a coward; one who struck in the dark; or, at best only when all power lay behind him, and he knew that with Richard alive he was never secure. There was one card more to play. If Rohese would accept him as guardian, the Advocates might side with her against the Abbot, and this result in the consummation of John's plans. The beauty of the maid had fired his incontinent blood, and the fief of De Cokefeld was rich; Geoffrey was clamoring for recognition of his services; the country already groaned under taxes, and with coffers depleted; he must have money. So his tone was conciliatory.

"How now, my Lord Abbot, forgive my untimely heat! Let us not quarrel e'en o'er such a pretty puppet as this. But hath the maid no say? Methinks the Advocates who so long served under his father's banner should somewhat consider her preference." The Advocates visibly approved of this, as they thought the Abbot's proceedings too aggressive and masterful by far.

"Mary's heart, he acts as if he were the Pope himself," my Lord of Clare said to Faulkenbridge.

"Thou art right, my bucco. Father Hugo was ever ruled by our decisions. This one hath not even questioned our opinions."

"See, sweet," went on the Prince, mellifluously, lifting Rohese's head and pointing to Geoffrey, who struck an effective attitude, and regarded the shrinking girl with a bold glance, he intended to be enticing and subduing; "wilt not exchange the dreary life in thine old Keep for the gaiety of court? Become the Prince's ward, lady, and there stands a gallant husband ready for thee; spruce and pricked, who will govern thee gently, though he love thee hotly. What say'st thou, pretty minion?"

Obscured by the crowd stood a tall, slender nun, whose white tunic and pectoral, black hooded cloak and ebon staff proclaimed her the Prioress Rosamund, and, forgetful of prudence, she now pushed forward the better to comprehend that which so nearly concerned her son. Ten years younger than Queen Elinor, her Greek features still retained their youthful beauty, and despite her habit she was a handsome, stately woman. The noise of her movement, though slight, was noticed by the Queen, who, turning, found herself face to face with her hated rival of old. The almond-shaped eyes of the Prioress contracted (they were green as the sea on a sunlit day, and flecked with gold like the jeweled eyes of a toad); her thin lips tightened into a scarlet line, and she proudly and defiantly met the withering glance of Elinor. Time and circumstance may teach men to forget, but women, in whose hearts the fires of jealousy are kindled, hate always—through life—yea, after death.

"Remove that wench!" commanded Elinor to the captain of her guard, her pointing finger shaking with anger. The green eyes flashed, and the thin lips of the Prioress opened as if to speak, but Geoffrey, who had been furtively watching his mother during the Prince's proffer, now caught her eye. Like Henry of old, he ruled this scheming, haughty woman with a glance, and warned by her look she held her peace. The Abbot here interposed.

"Madam," he said to the Queen, "the lady Prioress is my guest." So Elinor, biting her lips at this public rebuke, said no more, being forced to sit and watch the white, cat-like face of her enemy light up with a triumphant smile.

"What say'st thou, Lady de Cokefeld?" urged the Prince.

Rohese was at bay. Abhorring the proffered change of guardianship, she more abhorred the proffered bridegroom; yet how dared she speak before so great a company, and reveal to the Prince the thoughts which surged within her proud young mind? She only shook her head, drawing away from the familiar touch of the Prince.

Abbot Samson then said to her: "Answer, thou, Rohese, wilt have as guardian the Prince, and give thy hand and fortune to Geoffrey de Clifford?" Rohese shuddered at this name and stole a contemptuous glance at the bastard; this was the son of ill-famed Rosamund de Clifford; this libertine, execrated by the parents of England. (For like a serpent, his slimy trail had gone over many a fair home, leaving shame and misery in its wake.) My lady of Clare had told her much of this man. To her surprise, a hand now came stealing upon hers, and looking up she saw the Queen with an intent frown watching her face eagerly and warningly, while the royal hand pressed hers encouragingly. Thus supported, Rohese, rising, bright-eyed and composed, turned to the Abbot:

"Nay, nay, my dear, new-found father, though his highness load me with jewels, and set me among the noblest and fairest of his court, I'd not exchange my liege and my guardian. And by my Christendom! I am well content to bide a maid, an' God wot a De Cokefeld would ne'er mate with Rosamund Clifford's son." The Abbot smiled a stern approval. John looked blankly astonished. The Queen patted her hand kindly, and murmured, "Well fought, little De Cokefeld." But Rohese, sinking back on her cushion, frightened at her own vehemence, felt but one eye upon her. The Prioress glared from her corner like a tigress ready to leap upon its prey, and Rohese felt that this must be the mother of Geoffrey, and realized that she had made an implacable enemy.

"Thou hast had thy answer," said Samson, grimly. "Come, Lady de Cokefeld, it grows late; maids should not bide from bed so late."

"A merry revel to you all, my guests. Your Highness, there are here some right skilful gleemen who will more than compensate for our heavy company. Ho there, master of the hall, bring forth the choicest wines, and let the music play!" And as a gay madrigal struck up, the Abbot, with a haughty obeisance to his royal guests, led Rohese from the hall, followed by her attendants, and the long line of monks, with eyes bent low, and meekly folded hands. The Queen and her ladies presently retired, and the advocates and the rest of the court were left to nightly revelry; though John, Geoffrey and Bigot sat moodily apart, while the music rang and the cup went round.

As they went toward the stairway leading to the gate chamber, Rohese said penitently, "I pray thee, my Lord, forgive my coming thither against thy commands. I was but curious to see a great court assembled."

"Well, thou'st thy wish, girl. Woman ne'er obeyed God or man 'gainst her desire since first she disobeyed in Eden. But thou'lt pay dearly for this night's work, I fear. Once the wolf smells blood he'll not leave the trail. And Geoffrey de Clifford has been flouted by the fairest maid in England. Well for thee, child, that Samson's strong arm wields the crosier instead of Hugo's. 'Tis a lucky chance thou'rt housed with me, as it has turned; for the Prince is minded to take thee by force, Rohese. I saw it in his eye; and ever God's forbode when he's done with thee, why thou'll be fit for his Favorite's wife," and the Abbot ground his teeth as he turned away, leaving Rohese with scarcely strength to climb the stair, assisted by wide-eyed Mistress Mary, half ready to weep, seeing her lady so disturbed. Slowly they passed up the great marble stair; the attendant at its foot extinguished his taper and went away, and 'twas then a dark figure stole from behind a pillar nearby, and murmuring, "O, my sweet, my brave lady," kissed the stones her feet had trod ere he departed into the gloom like one of the shadows of the night.

CHAPTER XV.

The next morning Rohese sat up in bed with a start: though hardly awake, she felt there was some alien influence about her. Looking through the open door of her apartment across the Gate chamber, at Mistress Mary's door, she saw that, contrary to custom, it was closed. Had her tire-woman wakened, and gone to the buttery for their breakfast? No, it was too early, as the gray light showed. Rohese turned restlessly on her pillow, and then cowered beneath her coverings, for on a low stool in the centre of the little room she glimpsed a figure so weird that she hastened to shut out its sight. At this a rattling, "Ho, ho," proceeded from the intruder, and Rohese, reassured by this sound that her visitor was human, summoned courage to peep from beneath the coverlid.

"How, now, my little milk liver? 'Tis many a year since I visited thee. Alackaday, to find thee grown such a fine coward. Fie upon thee, De Cokefeld's heir! Art frightened at Bernice of Ely? Hast forgotten 'Old nurse'?"

"Oh!" Rohese came fully into view now, and sat up, curiously regarding her visitor, none other than that ancient beldame who had so frightened Brother Tristian.

"Welcome, dame," she cried; "how quaintly thou art dressed. Set my fear to that, and the fact that 'tis ten years since I last saw thee."

"Lawk, I'm not strangely decked. I but wear the red and black livery of my master. Hast not heard of the witch of Ely?" Rohese looked at her with startled eyes, crossing herself mechanically, and murmuring her old childish prayer. "From all sorcerers, witches and dark and evil things, good saints, deliver us," before she began falteringly:

"I wot not, Dame Bernice —"

"Of course! Ten years agone, when thy father was alive, I had no more mind to be burned at the stake or wear the bridle, than now, and when my yearly visitations were made to my nurseling's child, I donned the russet gown and kerchief of a village wife. Thy father was a stark man, girl, and mad 'gainst sorcery."

Rohese gazed at the crone wonderingly. "And didst really nurse my granddam, dame?"

"Aye, that I did, from two years old; and by paddock's maw, I saw the Lady Frances, thy dame, born, married and buried, an' lifted thee in these arms, a red, squirming brat, when first thou camest to this weary world. Wonder not, then, that I came hither to seek thee, e'en in mine enemy's stronghold. The Church doth ever love a witch-a-sizzling." And Dame Bernice chuckled at her grim jest.

"And now what I have come so far to tell must soon be told ere the minion scratch at the door I've locked so fast upon her. I was stayed last night on my way hither, for the Abbot's silver cross hung on the secret panel by which I strove to gain entrance into Bradfield; so I could not pass, but needs must spend the night as best I might in the passage, till at cockcrow I 'scaped by another way and came hither in search of thee, too late to stay thy attendance on the court." When she had shown that she knew all that had occurred in the audience chamber, she continued:

Thrive Without Sunshine.

The doctrine that sunshine is necessarily helpful and beneficial to the health is not always true. The Turkish men and women upset this theory completely. Across every window in a Turkish home are lattices to keep out curiosity and sunlight. The Turkish women get as little sunlight outside of their homes as they do inside.

At the age of twelve the Moslem woman takes the veil and she is never seen without it. The only chance she gets to let the wind blow on her face is when she is seated in the courtyard and within the walls of her own home.

In spite of the fact that the men and women get so little exercise and fresh air, they are strapping big and hardy people. Few Americans can match them in physique or powers of endurance.—St. Louis Republic.

Minard's Liniment Cures Dandruff

The Tragedy.

The shoemaker sat
With his rat-a-tat-tat,
While fitting my shoes with new soles,
new soles.

And there stocking footed
I sat as if rooted
With holes in my socks, blooming holes, holes, holes.

Alas, what a sin to
Look out through the window
And see Mary passing, my sweet, my sweet.

But how could I hallo
And how could I follow
With holes in my socks and no shoes on my feet?

I begged the shoemaker,
The blooming old faker,
To give back my shoes without soles,
without heels.

But though they weren't done, he Demanded the money
And turned a deaf ear to my frantic appeals.

So off down the street
On her dainty, small feet
Walked Mary, sweet Mary, with swift graceful stride.

And but for the stocking
Large holes in my stocking
For sure, without shoes, I'd 'a' walked at her side.

NOTHING TO EQUAL BABY'S OWN TABLETS

There is nothing to equal Baby's Own Tablets for little ones. They are absolutely safe and are guaranteed free from opiates and never fail in giving relief from the minor ills of babyhood and childhood. Concerning them Mrs. Albert Bergeron, St. Agapit, Que., writes: "My baby was suffering from constipation and teething troubles and Baby's Own Tablets quickly cured him. Now I always keep them in the house." The Tablets are sold by medicine dealers or by mail at 25 cents a box from The Dr. Williams' Medicine Co., Brockville, Ont.

The Seven Seas.

The phrase "the seven seas" has been current for some time—was so current when Kipling universalized it twenty years ago to denote all the great waters of the earth. Its use divides into seven parts the tripartite ocean (the Atlantic, Pacific and Indian oceans) as the north and south Atlantic, the north and south Pacific, the Indian, the Arctic and the Antarctic oceans. It is interesting to note that Roman Italy had its "seven seas," the chain of salt lagoons about the mouth of the Po, separated from the Adriatic by strips of sand or embankments. The lagoons were in ancient days much more extensive than now, and the "Septem Maria" afforded a continuous means of internal navigation from Ravenna to Altinum.—New York Times.

SAIL BACKWARDS.

Feats of Seamanship Performed With Square Riggers.

Square rigged ships can, in case of necessity, be made to sail rudder foremost, and there are many cases known where ships have sailed in that reversed order. Only a few years ago a case was recorded of such backward sailing.

One instance where the manoeuvre was employed by a genius in battle tactics rather than under the need of marine disaster is a brilliant chapter in the history of Old Ironsides. This account is taken from Maclay's naval history:

"The sternmost ship was observed luffing up so as to take a raking position across the Constitution's stern. Mindful of his danger, Captain Stewart suddenly braced his main and mizzen topsails flat to the mast, shook all forward, let go his jib sheet and quickly but swiftly backed, under cover of the smoke, abreast the rear ship. The manoeuvre was executed in beautiful style. The yards swung around almost as soon as the order was issued; the ship checked her course, trembled for a moment and then began backing. As if by magic the Constitution had dropped astern and almost before the enemy was aware of it was alongside of the sternmost ship with every gun of her formidable battery reloaded and double shotted."

The clipper ship Dreadnought lost her rudder in a gale in the winter of 1862-3, and Captain Samuel Samuels performed the great feat of sailing her backwards for more than 600 miles and into safety safety in the harbor of Fayal.—New York Sun.

Saved His Dog.

Lord Rosebery is a great lover of animals, and on one occasion he actually went so far as to risk his life for a favorite dog. His lordship was on board a steamer when suddenly his dog fell overboard. Much distressed, Lord Rosebery asked the captain to stop the ship, a request which was refused.

"If it were a man overboard," said the captain, "why, then, of course"—

"Oh," said Lord Rosebery, "that can be easily managed," and, to the captain's astonishment, he leaped overboard after the dog himself.

Naturally, the steamer was promptly stopped, a boat was lowered with all speed, and both dog and master were rescued, none the worse for their experience.—London Tit-Bits.

GREAT SALE OF ORGANS AND PIANOS

Ye Olde Firme of Heintzman & Co., corner King and John streets, Hamilton, Ont., are offering 50 organs at a great reduction in price. Instruments bearing the names of such well-known makers as Bell, Doherty, Karn, Dominion and Uxbridge are being sold as low as $15 to $40.

Good practice pianos from $50 to $100. Write for complete list of prices and terms.

Battleships Now and Then.

A battleship to-day is not the same as a battleship in Nelson's day. The old wooden three decker could only be destroyed by long and desperate close quarter fighting. It would stand hours of battering. It would take hundreds of shot and still be capable of fighting. But today one unlucky shot, one blow from a torpedo, and the great fighting machine is a heap of scrap iron.—London Graphic.

Metalized Cartridges.

Because of the scarcity of copper cartridges are now made by the process of spraying metal in a liquid form on the paper shells, which answers all the purposes of the metal cartridges and has some advantages over them, principally in the fact that the metallized cartridges are lighter and a soldier is therefore enabled to carry more of them.

ELECTRICITY AND WATER.

Little Danger in Turning a Hose On Heavily Charged Wires.

The slight danger that firemen run through the electric current passing from heavily charged wires up the stream of water they are squirting is proved by an experiment conducted by Ugo Tartaglini and reported in La Scienza per Tutti.

A trolley car wire charged with a direct current of 525 volts had one end grounded; on the other end he directed a stream from a hose with a nozzle fifteen millimeters in diameter. At 2.20 meters distance a voltmeter attached to the nozzle registered twenty volts. At sixty-five centimeters distance it registered seventy volts and at twenty centimeters 210 volts. The average man can stand a current of fifty volts without serious shock, so a fireman who holds his nozzle five or six feet from a live wire runs no great danger.

Mr. Tartaglini made the same experiment on two lines of alternating current, one with 2,200, the other with 4,600 volts, and the voltmeter did not register any current in the stream of water, although a slight shock was perceptible when he put his hand into it. With a chemical extinguisher he got a current of 1,550 volts at 225 millimeters from a wire with a current of 2,050 volts.

Settled the Duel.

Lord March, afterward the Marquis of Queensberry, was not accustomed to view a duel with unbecoming apprehension and usually attended an affair with an air of enjoyment that often was decidedly displeasing and embarrassing to his adversary. But he was served at last with that sauce which the proverb explains is for the gander as well as the goose. It was when he was challenged to fight an Irish sportsman. Lord March appeared on the ground accompanied by a second, surgeon and other witnesses. His opponent arrived soon afterward with a similar retinue, but added the weight of a polished oak coffin, which he deposited on the ground, end up, with its lid facing Lord March and his party. Lord March became decidedly uncomfortable when he read the inscription plate, engraved with his own name and title and the date and year of death, and peace was patched up.

Don't blame the child, the chances are it can't help it. This treatment also cures adults and aged people troubled with urine difficulties by day or night.

Volcanoes and Disease.

Many strange and exaggerated accounts have been given of terrible diseases in human beings, lower animals and plants as a result of volcanic activity. In a prize essay by Dr. H. J. Johnston-Lavis it is shown that there is no direct connection with disease, but that volcanic outbursts may indirectly cause or increase epidemic disease in several ways. The poisonous fumes may have irritating and depressing effects on the eyes and throat. The disturbance of water courses may bring about the infection of wells and surface supplies with sewage, and interference with ventilation of houses may result from the accumulation of ejected materials. The moral depression from fear, with hunger from the cutting off of food supplies, may have the effect of lessening the resistance of the organization to infection.—Exchange.

A Fateful Game of Chess.

It is a Spanish tradition that the fate of Columbus hung on a game of chess. For years the great navigator had haunted the Spanish court, trying to interest some one in his plans, but at last he determined to abandon the country and visit France. The night before his intended departure he sought an audience with the queen to communicate his intentions and to take his leave. The queen asked him to wait while she made another effort to interest the king. She found Ferdinand engaged in a game of chess and, disturbing him by her entrance, caused him to lose a piece. Annoyed and irritated by the incident, the King, after rudely denouncing Columbus and his schemes, informed Isabella that the result of the petition would depend on the result of the game. It grew worse and the chances were all against the launching of the expedition. But the queen overlooking the board, whispered to her august spouse a suggestion relative to a move that would be advantageous. The king followed the advice, the completion of the game was quickly reversed, and Columbus' dream of years was realized at last.

When Men Powdered Their Faces.

The use of powders for the hair and face, which began in the sixteenth century, infected the men. Henry III. had the habit of parading the streets of Paris, his face covered with white and red paste, like a faded coquette, and his hair filled with violet powder and scented with musk. Powders were made of all colors, and the infatuation was such that servant girls were afraid to be seen in public with their hair of the natural color and, not being able to buy that used by their employers, employed sawdust as a substitute.—London Mirror.

An Artist's Impromptu Solo.

Pierre Garat, the singer and exquisite of Napoleonic France, was not merely a glass of fashion and a wonderful, self-instructed singer, but an artist devoted to his art. "Put in the following," asks Percival Miall in his biography, "an example of sincerity in art or of love of attracting attention?"

Coupigny had supplied him with a "romance" to be set to music. Whenever the two met Garat replied, "I have not hit upon an idea yet." One day Coupigny was walking down the Rue Neuve des Petits Champs. Hearing a sound of some one running up behind him, he turned. It was Garat, who seized him by the arm, dragged him up the stairs of a neighboring house and, halting on the first landing, exclaimed, "I've got it!" At once he began to sing the romance through at the top of his voice. The inhabitants of the house began to open their doors, heads were projected over the bannisters, finally they began to approach. But Garat, having finished, tore down the stairs like a monkey, dragging the bewildered poet with him.—Youth's Companion.

Compulsory Change of Name.

A notable instance of compulsory change of name occurred in Scotland in the seventeenth century, when the clan Macgregor was ordered to abandon and forget its ancient patronymic. The English Government thought by this means to stamp out the spirit of Rob Roy's redoubtable kinsmen, and so sternly was the decree enforced that the use of the old name was treated as a capital offense. For the time the clansmen submitted and took other names; but, so far from forgetting the old designation, later generations proudly reverted to it, and today there are more Macgregors in the world—to the world's gain—than ever before.—London Standard.

He Got the Apples.

"Once upon a time," began the teacher, "two little brothers started to Sunday school one Sunday morning. Their way led past a fine orchard, where the trees were bending down with ripe, luscious apples. One of the brothers proposed going into the orchard and getting some fruit, but the other refused and sped away, leaving his companion greedily devouring the apples.

"Now, it happened that the owner of the orchard saw them, and the next day rewarded the good boy who refused to steal the apples by giving him a shilling. He got a prize for his honesty, and what do you suppose the other boy got for his dishonesty?"

"He got the apples!" yelled every member of the class.—Exchange.

THE NEW BRITISH EMPIRE

An authority makes the statement that the British Empire, before the war, comprised 11,451,862 square miles, excluding Egypt, the Soudan and Cyprus, which were technically Turkish. The Empire has increased by some 3,236,000 square miles, or nearly one-third, during the first year of the war. This figure includes the Cameroons, the conquest of which is not yet complete, and is a Franco-British enterprise, so that the territory will probably be divided.

The new territories captured, incorporated in the Empire, or added to our sphere of influence, are:

	Sq. miles
Egypt	400,000
Soudan	951,060
Cyprus	3,500
Arabia	1,200,000
German Southwest Africa	322,450
Togoland	33,700
German New Guinea, including Kaiser Wilhelm's Land the Bismarck Archipelago and the Caroline, Pelew, Marshall, Solomon and Marianne groups of Islands	100,000
Samoan Archipelago	1,050

Of the Arabian Peninsula, the Aden Protectorate (about 9,000 square miles) belonged to Great Britain. Turkey owned about 436,000 square miles, native independent states occupied about 163,000 square miles, and the remainder comprises huge deserts, sparsely inhabited by nomadic tribes. It has a total population of some 4,870,000.

THE ZEPPELIN RAIDS.

The bombardment of defenceless towns and cities, the sinking of defenceless, harmless ships, and the dropping of bombs from Zeppelins on non-combatants are some features of German "frightfulness." The German newspapers have for many months promised that London would be destroyed by these airships, that its people would be wiped off the face of the earth and its buildings demolished. They have boasted gleefully of what they were going to do, and the people greatly rejoiced thereat. Of course this is not war, and it is not magnificent. It is savagery, assassination and murder. But that seems to be war according to the German mind. This week several raids have been made on London, and many women and children killed or maimed, and this devilish work may go on if no retaliation is made. The aeroplane raids of the British and French are confined to attacks on military positions, railways, etc., and are carried out in daylight. The German raids are made in the dark, and no attempt is made to confine the attacks to military positions. The busy streets of London are now their object of attack. Their aim is to kill and injure as many non-combatants as possible. This air warfare is of a piece with their submarine warfare: kill and slay no matter whom, no matter where.

We believe in fighting the devil, for the Kaiser must be a devil, with his own weapons. For every raid on a British or French town or city, we would advise a similar raid on a German town or city. British airships are capable of doing it, and larger aeroplanes are being built, we understand, that will have no difficulty in flying to Berlin and back. Give the German a dose of his own medicine.

This war is opening people's eyes as to the principles which govern trade between nations. The Detroit Free Press complains that the United States are getting too much gold from Britain—so much that the bankers do not know what to do with it, and as it is being piled up in their vaults it is bound to depreciate in value. Britain is importing too much, and as it is too busy fighting to manufacture much for export, it sends gold instead of goods to pay for its purchases in the States. If the States cannot use the gold to advantage, it becomes a dead loss to them. It might pay the States to admit British goods free. The gold comes in free.

Mr. John Redmond, M. P., in an address at a convention of Nationalist delegates from the County of Tipperary recently, declared that Ireland recognized that her whole future liberty and prosperity depended upon her courage and loyalty to her pledged word to-day. A victorious ending of the war is, then, the first necessity of Ireland. I say to you, "Let us help to bring that about, not alone by our courage upon the battlefield, but by scrupulously maintaining the political truce, and by promoting and inculcating wisdom, toleration and unity amongst all classes of our people at home."

◆

Judging by the comments of some English newspapers on Germany's yielding to the United States, they want this country to take charge of Germany's submarine warfare against their boats, armed as well as unarmed, and conduct it in a more gentlemanly fashion. In fact, they would like to have us stop it altogether. This is rather complimentary to the United States, but it is a little too much to imagine that this country desires to act as umpire in all international scraps. We aim to protect the rights of our own people, but not to say how Germany shall manage her naval operations in all details.—Philadelphia Record.

What the English papers are pointing out is that Germany's concessions, made at the request of United States do not protect the rights of the United States people. There is a big "if" in connection with the proposed immunity from death of passengers on liners and the U. S. seamen on board freighters will have no protection. They will go to the bottom whenever a German submarine can get a crack at the vessels they are on board.

An illustration of the financial progress throughout the two older provinces of the Dominion during recent years, with respect to banking facilities, is shown in a new edition of a Bank Map of Ontario and Quebec which has recently been issued by the Department of the Interior at Ottawa. According to the information which has been incorporated in the publication the number of branches in operation in 1901, the first year for which statistics of this nature are given, totalled approximately 500, in comparison with 2,000 at the present time. This interesting compilation of current banking information is valuable also as a Railway Map, showing as it does the location, on the various main and branch lines, of all towns and cities. This, together with other general information, makes the publication very useful for reference purposes. A copy may be procured free of charge upon application to F. C. C. Lynch, Superintendent of the Railway Lands Branch, Department of the Interior, Ottawa.

◆

Now some of the United States newspapers are wondering what would happen if some of those German Zeppelins should bomb to death United States citizens living in London. One paper says that "Besides a numerous colony of American citizens and their families in London, for instance, we have a perfectly good ambassador whose career we should not like to see cut short by a German bomb. We have a consul general and his staff. There are other United States officials, military, naval and commercial attaches, who are not residing in London for their health or pleasure, but to attend to their country's business. A United States ambassador who should take up his quarters in a British fortress or travel in a British battleship could not claim immunity from attack, but 100 miles from the recognized firing line and dwelling on what is technically American soil, he should not be subjected to the peril of sudden death." If American lives are thus lost in London, Mr. Lansing might have to send another note to Berlin.

◆

The editor of the Victoria Colonist, who is a veteran of the Fenian raid campaign, and outside the age limit, was quite annoyed the other day on receiving two white feathers from some woman who thought that he should be at the front. Evidently she was not personally acquainted with the editor, or she would not have made that mistake. Our contemporary gives several instances where men have been insulted by the reception of such feathers, and he asks:

"Do the people who indulge in this base practice realize for a moment what they are doing? Do they realize that they are exhibiting the lowest kind of sneaking cowardice? To insult a man to his face is bad enough, but it has the merit of a certain degree of courage. To send him an anonymous insult is on a par with blackmail. We happen to know that some of this miserable work has been done by a few very silly women and in some cases by young girls, persons who are so ignorant of human nature that they are unable to realize that to insult a man in this way will have only one effect, namely, to influence him against offering his services. The practice shows an absolute lack of appreciation of the gravity of the crisis with which the Empire is confronted."

Wooed By a Pauper

CHAPTER I.

Then I saw as in a vision,
The whole world stretching with eager hands
Towards a mystic figure, holly-crowned and rubicund,
Which, from its torch, scattered on all earth,
The fires of love and plenty.
It was the Spirit of Christmas!

Christmas was approaching. You knew it from a thousand signs and tokens beside the remarkably distinct intimation of the calendar with its "twenty-fifth of December" in red letters and its "Christmas Day" in Old English type.

Old men knew it, for they shook their heads and grumbled at the cold and the weather.

Young men knew it, and they smiled at forthcoming evening parties and friendly suppers.

Young women knew it, and joined the young men in anticipation of balls and other opportunities of love-making; and the schoolboys knew it, and smacked their lips as dreams of plum-pudding, pantomimes and Christmas boxes disturbed the last few remaining days of their school term.

Others knew it, to whom the approaching time of merrymaking, of peace on earth and good will toward men brought no visions of happiness and joy to come. The poor shivered at the approach of the jolly king and remembered that for them there were no plum-puddings, very little peace and but the mockery of good will.

Some others, higher up in the social scale, were as little pleased at the proximity of the season of rejoicing.

For instance, let us avail ourselves of the novelist's precious privilege, and, taking you, kind reader, with us, enter unseen the library of a grand mansion in Belgravia.

Though we had entered in the orthodox and ordinary way, we should have scarcely been heard, for wealth had spurred luxury to its utmost, and the feet of the happy mortals who pass the threshold of Sir Richard Wildfang's town house, if they do not tread on roses, Persian fashion, make as little noise traversing the thickly carpeted hall and still more luxuriously covered staircase.

Footmen, as silent as the statuary which flanks the painted walls, hover to and fro, ready to do Sir Richard's will. Grooms and coachmen linger with hands in their pockets, all on the alert to saddle or harness for him Sir Richard Wildfang's high-bred cattle.

Let us look at him. We find that Sir Richard is young, handsome—stay, is there much of the beautiful in his compact head, dark, thick hair and expressive eyes? Is not the beard a trifle too sleek, the hair a little too dark and the eyes somewhat more restless and evading than those features should be to reach the standard of beauty?

It is a mooted question. Some of his friends said that Sir Richard was handsome, others declared that his face lacked frankness, and his eyes especially, that bold, open look which Englishmen and English women prize. Sir Richard himself thought—ah! there again, was there any man living who knew exactly what Sir Richard thought on any subject?

Sir Richard came of an old family—Wildfang the Merciless, came over with William, the Robber—and Sir Richard had added to his lineage a large amount of wealth. He was the owner of great merchantmen, the promoter of gigantic monetary schemes, the proprietor of several snug things, each, so it was believed, worth a fortune in itself. His name was well known and respected on 'Change, and his mercantile honor irreproachable. Of the honor which characterized his private life and pleasure people never troubled themselves to inquire.

Sir Richard was a young man, and wealthy, and that was enough for the Belgravia mammas and their marriageable daughters also. Had they inquired into Sir Richard's life, ten chances to one they would have found it blameless—rumor seldom settles, raven of ill luck as it is, on the head of the prosperous man.

"Sir Richard was an eminently liberal, benevolent, right-thinking gentleman," said the world; and who, upon examining his banker's book, would have said otherwise?

"Man has two characters," said Talleyrand, "the one he shows to his friends and the other which he reserves for himself."

Let us see Sir Richard in both.

In the library, or Sir Richard's own room, as it was called, he himself was always writing and reading. There was a goodly supply of books; there were maps on elaborate stands, there were screens to shut out the draught and to shade the light. A fire burned brightly in the ormolu grate; in case its heat should scorch the delicate olive complexion of Sir Richard, a glass screen of pressed ferns and seaweeds was placed before it. The lamps—there were more than one—were exquisite specimens of modern ornamental art. One near him was shaded with a cool, green-glass cover, which threw, notwithstanding its coolness, a rather disagreeable tint upon Sir Richard's face.

But it did not matter. No ladies ever entered that, his business apartment, and few men for whose opinion as to his personal attractions Sir Richard cared.

Has the reader realized the luxury and comfort with which Sir Richard softened even the hard matters of business?

A gentle knock at the door evoked a sharp:

"Come in."

A servant entered.

"Mr. Dewlap, sir."

"He may enter."

The servant stood aside and allowed a stout, thick-set man, with a pale, careworn face, rendered restless and acute by a pair of keen eyes, to enter.

This was Mr. Dewlap, Sir Richard's confidential man of business, if the title is not a misnomer, Sir Richard reposing confidence in no one.

"You are late. I have been expecting you this last half hour," he said, in a cold, imperious way, that was painfully acute in its feigned calm.

"I am sorry, Sir Richard, but I was kept waiting at Lloyds'."

"Ah! you have been there; well?"

"I am sorry," said Mr. Dewlap, taking the chair toward which Sir Richard had waved his white hand. "I am sorry to bring bad news, sir, but the Arethusa has come to grief; the fearful storm in the Baltic has sent her to port, with nine hands lost."

"Nine hands!" retorted Sir Richard sharply. "Never mind the hands—the cargo, man, the cargo!"

"The cargo, Sir Richard, is entirely ruined."

Sir Richard leaned back and raised his hand to his face. It grew pale; or did the sickly green shade produce that unpleasant hue?

"All spoiled," he repeated. "Dearly bought and only half insured. Bad news, indeed."

"I regret, Sir Richard, I deeply regret," said Mr. Dewlap, "that there is still worse. I looked in upon Brooks, the stockbroker, as I passed, seeing light and hearing voices, and heard that Vincent, of Manchester, had—Great heaven—Sir Richard!"

The man arose and leaned forward in alarm.

Sir Richard had fallen back in his chair, with his face deadly white; it was not the lamp this time; and his teeth clinched as if he were near death.

As Mr. Dewlap approached him he waved him back with his hand, raised himself as if with an effort, and, brave to the last, with that courage which bad men share with heroes, looked his man full in the face.

"I beg your pardon; a sudden faintness. I have been writing too long, and overlooked my dinner hour. Don't be alarmed; it has passed. You were saying that Vincent, of Manchester—"

Mr. Dewlap, used as he was to his master's coolness, was too astonished for the moment to continue.

"I hope, Sir Richard, I was not too sudden, I—"

"You forget," said Sir Richard with a wan smile, "you have told me nothing yet. Has anything happened to Vincent, of Manchester?"

"They have failed, Sir Richard."

"Failed!" Sir Richard repeated, with a shrug of his eyebrows. "That is bad for us, Dewlap. Have the goodness to hand me that daybook No. 3."

Mr. Dewlap fetched the book from a shelf, and Sir Richard opened it and examined a page; his hand was so raised while he did that his face was hidden from his confidential clerk.

There were great drops of cold perspiration upon his white forehead and one bead fell upon the open book.

He shut it quietly, calmly, and handed it back.

"Very bad, but not so bad as I thought. Anything else?"

"No, Sir Richard. Here is the day's account and the passbook. Are there any letters?"

"Only these; nothing of importance."

"Then I may go, Sir Richard?"

"Yes, good-night."

Mr. Dewlap returned the salutation with all respect and reached the door.

Sir Richard called him back.

"Dewlap."

"Yes, Sir Richard."

"I forget to caution you—not a word of the Arethusa or Vincent."

Mr. Dewlap looked offended.

"It is not likely, Sir Richard."

"Just so; the caution was not needed. By the way, did you obtain that copy of Daniel Newton's will?"

"Yes, Sir Richard, you will find the draft among the papers. The whole of the money is left to Stella Newton unconditionally."

"Ah, I shall find it here. Thank you. Good-night."

The door closed. Mr. Dewlap had gone, and Sir Richard was alone.

Then the mask fell. The chair was pushed back, and the man in that character which he reserves for himself stood upright.

Look at the face now and you will not call it handsome. It has dark lines of despair, of rage and despair; cruel curves around the mouth, and a catlike gleam in the eyes.

"The Arethusa cargo spoiled, Vincent gone, and the bank near its last gasp! In the name of the fiend I am ruined! Oh, if I could live these last six months over again, how differently would I use them! Rash idiot not to be content. I might have guessed that luck would turn upon me and desert me. Heavens! I cannot realize it! I—Sir Richard Wildfang—ruined! No!" And his hands clenched each other like wild animals. "No! I will not realize it! All is not lost while there is a plank to hold together. Fifty thousand pounds would save me. I could hold on for another month, for two or three months perhaps, if I were sure of the lump at the end. And, by heavens, I will be! Where is the will?" [illegible], he said. "Where is the will?"

He turned to the table, and with impatient fingers and darkly overcast face scattered the papers in search of the copy which Mr. Dewlap had spoken of.

A knock at the door. He turned with the aspect of a wolf.

"Come in."

"Lord Marmion."

In an instant the lines had gone, and the face was smiling, pleasant, careless and almost handsome. He turned with outstretched hand and grasped that of his visitor.

"My dear Marmion, delighted. Come in."

Lord Marmion was a contrast to Sir Richard.

He was short, fair, genial, and frank as a boy of fifteen.

He seated himself in a chair, and eyed the room with a pleasant, approving smile.

"So this is your business den, is it, Wildfang? I shouldn't mind working myself if I were allowed to do it in such comfortable quarters. Why, it's a bachelor's paradise. Well, how are you?"

"Capital. I am always well," replied Sir Richard, falling into an easy chair opposite that of his guest, and looking at him with an easy, genial smile. "And you are, too, to judge from your appearance?"

"Oh, I'm always well. But I dare say you wonder at what brought me here?"

"Curiosity, perhaps; an impulse of friendship, I hope," said Sir Richard, rising and walking to a cabinet.

"A glass of sherry. Amontillado, I shipped it myself," and with a nod of emphasis he poured some into two glasses.

"Thanks," said his lordship, finding the sherry [illegible] haven't answered my question, and I don't suppose you can till I tell you. I've come on business."

"Really," responded Sir Richard, with polite astonishment. "Then you had the right of admission after all. And pray what is the business?"

"Well," said the young lord, looking around and then at his companion with a frank and amused smile, "you know old Newton—pretty Stella Newton's father?"

"I've heard of pretty Stella Newton, as you call her."

"Ah, yes; everyone has," said his lordship. "She is the only beautiful girl I know, and that's a fact."

"Rather hard upon the rest of her sex. But go on."

"Well, it's a rum thing, you know, but I'm Miss Newton's guardian—trustee. What do you call it?"

"Call it what you please, but go on, and I shall understand you."

"Well," continued Lord Marmion, "her father, old Daniel, was my governor's head man: a sort of business adviser, and that sort o' thing. Now, old Daniel made a lot of money speculating, and when he died he left me executor and Stella Newman's trustee."

Sir Richard refilled his glass, raised it to his lips, and looking over it with a curious expression, nodded.

"I understand," he said; "an onerous trust, if Miss Newton has much money."

"That's it, you've just hit it," said the young lord, slapping his leg. "Now this money has been in my hands for some time, and I've taken no trouble about it, but they tell me I ought to invest it. I don't know what they mean, and I hate going to the lawyers about it, because they are such old women and worry my life out into the bargain. Well, I thought the matter over, and remembered you. Of course you are the very man to help me. You're the best business man in the world—every one says so, and you'll know what to do with the money."

Sir Richard Wildfang's heart throbbed as if it were a wild beast caged in his bosom.

He raised the glass again and smiled.

"Passing the compliment, my dear Marmion, with a simple 'thank you,' let me go on to say that you are reposing great trust in me."

"Of course; why shouldn't I?" said Lord Marmion, "you must trust somebody, and I'll trust you against all the world. Come, don't let's bore ourselves to death over the affair. Take the money and invest it. You know how to do that well enough. Will you do it?"

"I would do anything to oblige you, my dear Marmion," said Sir Richard warmly. "I will."

"Well, business is over, and now I must be off."

The door closed upon the trusting youth, and Sir Richard fell into his chair, trembling.

"Luck!" he breathed, "never let me blame you again! Richard Wildfang's luck never deserts him. Ruined! Who says so? Not I; while Stella Newton's fortune is in my grasp and she is alive to make it my own. Everybody knows her, do they? The most beautiful woman in London. Richard, your work is cut out for you. Stella Newton and her fortune must be yours."

Another knock.

His face composed itself into his business calm again.

"Come in."

It was a letter.

Sir Richard looked at it questioningly and slowly opened it.

He arose with a murmured imprecation, as the letter dropped in his hand. It was short, simple, and to a heart not entirely stone, touching.

"Dear, Dear Richard—I have found you at last. Oh, how could you leave me so cruelly when I loved you so fondly, so truly? Richard, I am ill unto death, and starving. If you ever loved me, have pity on me now and save me. Lucy."

His thin lips compressed themselves tightly, and he turned with an amazed gravity to the servant.

"Who brought this—this—begging letter? If the person should come again have her removed from the door. I know nothing of her."

And as the servant, bowing low, retired, he flung the letter with a cruel laugh, into the glowing fire.

CHAPTER II.

"My dear Stella, circumstances alter cases!"

The speaker was Mrs. Newton, the person addressed was her daughter Stella, upon whose beauty Lord Marmion had passed so decided an encomium, and the scene was the small drawing-room of Mrs. Newton's villa at Hyde Park Corner.

As a slight pause followed the lady's enunciation of a well-known axiom, we will fill it by remarking that Mrs. Newton was a thin, pompous lady, good at heart, but of lofty ambition, whose sole aim and object in life was to see her daughter Stella well married.

Mrs. Newton came of a trading stock; her husband, whom Lord Marmion had spoken of as old Daniel was of trade also; he had made money, and Mrs. Newton was endeavoring to impress upon her daughter the necessity of a solemn watchfulness of the main matrimonial chance.

Stella Newton justified Lord Marmion's laudation.

She was—shall I call to your mind, reader, that superb portrait of the Spanish orange-girl which Murillo has left us, add to it, as the cookery book says, a dash of Sir Peter Lely's picture of a countess, and you have a fair idea of Stella Newton's outward appearance.

Her inner portrait she shall herself in her own words and actions reveal.

At the moment of her introduction she was seated in an attitude of easy negligent grace upon a blue satin fauteuil; in her hands was a half-closed book, in her lap was curled a Mora [illegible].

She smiled thoughtfully, almost daringly, and glanced at her image as it was reflected in one of the numerous mirrors with which the room was fitted.

"Mamma, I have heard that before so often that I begin to doubt it. Say that feelings alter cases, and I will respond readily enough. Tell me plainly, mamma, why I should think of marrying Lord Marmion before he has ever said a word on the subject?"

"Stella, you are really incorrigible! Lord Marmion is too well bred a nobleman to speak out like a common—er—er—"

"Sweep," suggested Stella, with arch sweetness.

"Gentleman," continued Mrs. Newton. "You must judge from his actions, from such apparent trifles as his manner when he meets you, or says good-by, or hands you a fan, or in fact does any one of the usual politenesses for you. Does he blush when he shakes hands with you?"

"Never," emphatically replied the beautiful girl, with a merry twinkle in the deep lustrous eyes.

"Well, then, that is a sign that he thinks more deeply than most men," retorted the world-minded woman, with quick promptness. "Does he lower his voice when he talks?"

SUNDAY SCHOOL LESSON

Lesson XIII.—September 26, 1915.

Obedience and Kingship—Review—Psalm 72: 1-20.

Summary.—Lesson I. Topic: Rebellion by intrigue. Place: Mahanaim, east of the Jordan. Absalom was the third son of David and was ambitious to become king of Judah. His older brothers were dead and he undertook to win the favor of the people, that he might drive his father out and take the throne. David fled from Jerusalem and after a while Absalom came out with a large army to defeat his father. His army was defeated and he was slain.

II. Topic: King David's proclamation. Place: Jerusalem. While David was still alive another of his sons, Adonijah, attempted to take the throne. He called the people together with the expectation of being crowned. David heard of it and called an assembly and appointed Solomon king. David gave Solomon his advice to obey the Lord fully, for God had promised to continue his descendants on the throne if they would obey him.

III. Topic: A prayer for wisdom. Places: Gibeon; Jerusalem. Solomon made a sacrifice to the Lord at Gibeon. The Lord appeared to him there in a dream, and asked him what he should give him. Solomon asked that he might have wisdom to rule his people. The Lord was pleased with his choice and gave him wisdom, also riches and honor, and the promise of long life if he would obey him.

IV. Topic: The temple dedicated. Place: Jerusalem. David had made large preparations for building the house of the Lord, and Solomon carried out the plan fully. It took seven years to complete the temple. At the time appointed for the dedication of the house of the Lord the ark of the covenant was put in the most holy place of the temple. The glory of the Lord filled the temple.

V. Topic: Solomon's queenly visitor. Places: Sheba; Jerusalem. The fame of Solomon as the wise and rich king of Israel spread far and wide. The Queen of Sheba went from the south of Arabia to see Solomon and to learn about his wisdom and greatness. She took large presents with her. When she had seen his splendor and heard his wisdom, she said that not half had been told her.

VI. Topic: The result of sin. Place: Shechem. Rehoboam, Solomon's son, expected the people to make him king at Shechem. The ten northern tribes said they would accept him if he would make their burdens lighter than those put on them by Solomon. Following the advice of the young men he refused and they revolted and made Jeroboam, a former servant of Saul's, their king.

VII. Topic: Jeroboam's policy. Places: Shechem; Bethel; Dan. Jeroboam feared that if the ten tribes continued to go to Jerusalem to worship the Lord, they would return to the kingdom from which they had separated; therefore he set up images of calves at Bethel and Dan to represent God, and made those places centers for worship, thus plunging the nation into idolatry.

VIII. Topic: Reformation in Judah. Place: Jerusalem. The Lord sent a message of encouragement to Asa, the king of Judah, by Azariah. He undertook to destroy idolatry and he restored the great altar of sacrifice. He called an assembly of the people and they entered into a solemn covenant to seek the Lord and obey him.

IX. Topic: Divine sovereignty vindicated. Places: Samaria; Cherith; Zarephath. Elijah, the Lord's prophet suddenly appeared to Ahab and announced that there would be an extended drought in Israel. Ahab wished to kill Elijah, but the Lord miraculously cared for him at the brook Cherith, and later at Zarephath.

X. Topic: The claims of Deity. Place: Mount Carmel. At the end of three and a half years the Lord led Elijah to go to Ahab. He went, and he told Ahab to gather the prophets of Baal at Carmel. There would be a test to show who was the true God. The followers of Baal tried in vain to call fire from heaven to consume their sacrifice. God answered Elijah's prayer.

XI. Topic: God's gifts to Elijah. Places: Jezreel; Beersheba; Horeb. Jezebel was enraged at Elijah because of his opposition to Baal and threatened to kill him. The prophet fled to Beer-sheba and then to Horeb, where the Lord talked with him and sent him to anoint Hazael king of Syria, Jehu king of Israel, and to anoint Elisha his own successor.

XII. Topic: The God of nations. Place, Samaria. Benhadad was king of Syria. He besieged Samaria and demanded that Ahab give up everything to him. Ahab refused and the Lord sent a prophet to declare that Benhadad would be defeated. Benhadad and his men became drunken and the small army of Israel defeated them.

PRACTICAL SURVEY.

Topic: National history.
I. Intrigue.
II. Intercession.
III. Inconstancy.
IV. Intervention.

I. Intrigue. Along with the kingly character and conduct of David we trace the chastening hand of the Lord even down to his last days. The one dark sin of his life forever cast a shadow over his family. The bitter anguish that filled his soul when Absalom stole away the hearts of the people and openly attempted to usurp the throne, did not come from the possible humiliation of losing the kingdom, but from the consciousness that his own sin had brought such sorrow upon his family as to result in the rebellion of a beloved son against his sorrowful and ever-penitent father. A second time he met disloyalty and intrigue when his son Adonijah attempted to make himself king regardless of the Lord's promise that Solomon should succeed his father. If David and Bathsheba regarded that promise as God's assurance to them of their complete forgiveness, an attempt to thwart that desire could only remind them afresh of their folly. The unfaltering trust which upheld David in his declining years enabled him to meet each trial as it came and so to deal with his wayward sons as to prove his parental love and concern and yet to show a strong [illegible] of the kingdom over which he ruled. Because of his loyalty God thwarted the attempt of intrigue to prosper.

II. Intercession. The memory of David's life and character, together with his last counsel, made Solomon conscious of the great responsibility which came upon him with his accession to the throne of Israel. His early training, his knowledge of the affairs of the kingdom and his sincere devotion to God, enabled him to carry out the plans which seemed marked out for him. The loving-kindness of God is strongly portrayed in the night council which he held with Solomon, whose heart was then tender and devout and most suited to choose what was best for his own equipment and the welfare of the nation over which he was to rule. His spirit of intercession in behalf of others continued and was manifest in his prayer at the dedication of the temple, where he embraced all men in his prayer for atonement for sin. That his gift of wisdom was used to bless those who sought his counsel is seen in his interview with the Queen of Sheba, to whom was made known the worship of Jehovah.

WAS SO WEAK
WOULD HAVE TO STAY IN BED.

Milburn's Heart and Nerve Pills Cured Her.

Mrs. J. Day, 234 John St. South, Hamilton, Ont., writes: "I was so run down with a weak heart that I could not even sweep the floor, nor could I sleep at night. I was so awfully sick sometimes I had to stay in bed all day as I was so weak. I used three and a half boxes of Milburn's Heart and Nerve Pills, and I am a cured woman to-day, and as strong as any one could be, and am doing my own housework, even my own washing.

"I doctored for over two years, but got no help until I used your pills."

Milburn's Heart and Nerve Pills are 50c per box, 3 boxes for $1.25, at all dealers or mailed direct on receipt of price by The T. Milburn Co., Limited, Toronto, Ont.

III. Inconstancy. That no man can confine the effects of sin to his own lifetime was evidenced in the state of things when Solomon's son came to succeed his father. The evils which were permitted to exist within the borders of God's chosen nation had their effect upon the rising generation. That they had weakened the character and rule of Solomon was evident in the complaints which the people offered when they were about to proclaim Rehoboam king. That Solomon's dealings with Rehoboam had not prepared the way for the best development of his character or the deepening of his religious life, comes out in his opening career as king over the ten tribes upon their revolt against the rule of Rehoboam.

IV. Intervention. Under Rehoboam the kingdom of Judah fell into grievous sin until the whole land was polluted with idols and heathen worship. The watchful eye of God marked the time of victorious warfare, which he granted to Asa, and through the prophet Azariah directed the king in a national revival which included the displacement of an idolatrous queen, the extinction of the Sodomites and the destruction of idol worship. In Israel the sin of Jeroboam increased. In Ahab's reign an idolatrous queen, Jezebel, was allowed to bring in her prophets and set up her altars to Baal, and overthrow the worship of Jehovah. The merciful intervention of God was manifest in sending Elijah to declare a drought, the fitted punishment for apostasy. The vindication of God's supreme rule and power was made on Mount Carmel. When Ahab still ignored the God of Israel and Benhadad sought to subdue Israel unto Syria, God proved himself the God of all nations and the preserver of his people, that all kings might know that the gods of the heathen were as nothing before his might and power.

SECRET OF SUCCESS.

Be Efficient and Do Things That Other People Do Not Do.

A man has a weary time awaiting to rise in the world by force of sympathy, by getting somebody else to pull him along. You see such people standing around expecting compassion and a lift from some who have succeeded.

But this is not the way success is attained. That comes by working for it, by being worthy of it, by doing one's best, if it comes at all. The world is full of failures because a man hangs back and depends upon others.

Efficiency is the sweetest word in the language. There is no real success without it. And what does efficiency consist of? Of sobriety, honesty, diligence, patience, happiness, unselfishness, good habits and putting in full time.

Of course a man can not rush by [illegible]. He may gamble, [illegible] and [illegible] money, and never [illegible]. But such riches don't last. They [illegible] a man pretty hard finally.

CONSTIPATION
CAN BE CURED.

There Is Nothing To Equal Milburn's Laxa-Liver Pills For This Purpose.

Mrs. A. Cumming, Manchester, Ont., writes: "I have been troubled with constipation for over five years, and feel it my duty to let you know that your Milburn's Laxa-Liver Pills have cured me. I only used three vials, and I can faithfully say that they have saved me from a large doctor bill."

Milburn's Laxa-Liver Pills regulate the flow of bile to act properly on the bowels, and thus keep them regular. Irregular bowels are the main cause of constipation.

The price of Milburn's Laxa-Liver Pills is 25c per vial or 5 vials for $1.00, at all dealers or mailed direct on receipt of price by The T. Milburn Co., Limited, Toronto, Ont.

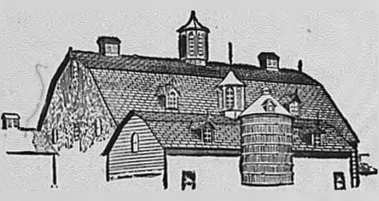
FARMERS!

Why Metallic Roofing and Shingles are not as durable as "Brantford Slates"



Brantford Asphalt Slates

For Houses and Barns

We are making colored and plain Asphalt Slates suitable for roofing any class of building, particularly farmers' buildings.

SPECIAL OFFER We are making a special offer to roof the first house or barn in your locality at about cost price and guarantee it's lifetime for ten years against leakage.

Electricians will tell you that Asphalt, from which Brantford Asphalt Shingles are made, is an excellent insulating material, and does not deteriorate when exposed to the elements, being proof against acid, salt, alkali, rust and corrosion.

Galvanized iron is subject to all these agents of destruction, as well as other enemies, viz., rust and moisture from the inside of the barn, produced by the heating of grain, moisture from cattle, etc. It is also open to attacks from the elements without, and both processes are working toward its ruin at the same time. In other words, condensation is causing the destruction of Metal Roofing and Shingles, while Asphalt Slates retain their wearing qualities indefinitely.

Therefore, Asphalt Slates are, in the end, the cheapest roofing material you can buy, and, as they are now made, the most attractive in appearance, as well as being waterproof and practically fireproof.

LOW PRICES We have succeeded in producing them at about the same price as wood shingles. Let us figure with you at once.

There is no reason why the farmers of our country should put up with leaky roofs when we have acres of material we can supply quickly, at moderate prices.

ROOF-LEAK PAINTS (in Red, Green and Black) This splendid material is especially adapted for old Shingles and Metal and Felt Roofing of all kinds. In fact, any material that will take paint, can be made to last years longer by an application. Put up in large open-mouth cans of 1, 2, 3 and 5 gallons.

EDITORIAL

Rumors of a fall election are rife. Well, Librals don't want it, for the Empire's sake, but the Government has the say, and if it so decides, so be it. Amid the uncertainty the only thing for Liberals to do is to get ready as far as possible.

Sir Robert Borden during his recent visit to Britain conducted himself with discretion and dignity. One evidence of his discretion is that he got on the same platform as Sir Wilfrid Laurier in regard to Imperialism. He sees clearly that Canada will not lightly surrender its rights of self-government. We shall next see him climb back on Sir Wilfrid's naval platform, where he was in 1910, and where he should have remained.

United States manufacturers are supplying the British market with goods that used to come from Germany. It is stated that "a huge organization, representing close upon a hundred United States manufactures, has been set up in the centre of the distributing area at London. From it pours a constant stream of such varied goods as drugs, cutlery, electro-plate, glass and pottery, toilet requisities, shaving sets, gloves, hosiery, blouses, powders and perfumes, brass ware, woven underwear, and both men's and women's outfitting generally, to be dealt with by the host of travellers employed by the undertaking, which has the financial backing of one of the largest business firms in the world."

MEMORIES

As I sat at my window one evening,
And the sun, with its fast fading light,
Seemed to reflect the beauty of heaven
Before the darkness of night,

And I longed for the rose-hue of morning,
As I sat in the quaint arm-chair,
For the suspense of waiting and longing
Seemed greater than I could bear,

For my thoughts were flooded with memories
Of the days that had gone by,
And my eyes were forever seeking
The far and distant sky;

For I know that the same blessed heaven,
With its cloud and sunshine and light,
Was a symbol of love and affection
For the boy who had gone to fight,

He laughed in his boyish fashion,
As he kissed me good-bye that night,
At my hopes and fears for his safety,
For he was my one guiding light,

He bid me await his coming,
As his love was forever mine,
And to love him with love's true devotion,
Pray for him—but not to pine,

How often, oh, how often,
When my heart was fit to break
I have knelt and prayed to heaven
To guard him for my sake,

For my heart is in his keeping
O'er the ocean wild and wide,
And, oh, for the wings of an angel,
I'd soar away to his side.

For I love him, aye, forever,
With his dark-eyed boyish grace;
And my heart is filled with longing
For to see that dear sweet face,

—P. L. Hanes.

T. I. Thomson, a former member of the commons for North Grey, has been appointed sheriff of the county, filling the vacancy caused by the death of Chas. H. Moore. Mr. Thomson was a hardware merchant of Owen Sound for 29 years and is president of the Farmer Transportation Co of Toronto.

The electricity sub-station is now about completed, but we can't brag about its smooth appearance. It is a long little red brick painted inside and out with a thick concrete foundation and a concrete roof. It has two windows and a door, and looks like a big packing box.

The Truancy Act

The rural public and separate school Truant Act is now strict, and every child between the ages of eight and fourteen years will be reported to the inspector if not in attendance for 80 per cent of the teaching time in the month. Reports must be made under penalty and this warning is intended to help teachers, truant officers and inspectors to discharge their duties in accordance with the new Act.

Another Victory for Carrick

Messrs A. F. and G. Auld of Eden Mills Ontario, exhibited a yearling shorthorn heifer which took first in her class and Junior Championship at Brandon, Regina, Saskatoon, Edmonton and Toronto Fairs this year. This animal was bred by Mr. Jas. G. Thomson of Carrick, and it is just another evidence of the high class stock Mr. Thomson is breeding.—Mildmay Gazette.

VIOLENT ATTACKS OF DYSPEPSIA

Suffered Tortures Until She Tried "Fruit-a-tives"

ST. JEAN DE MATHA, Jan. 27th, 1914.

"After suffering for a long time with Dyspepsia, I have been made well by "Fruit-a-tives." I suffered so much that at last I would not dare to eat for I was afraid of dying. Five years ago, I received samples of "Fruit-a-tives" and after taking them I felt relief. Then I sent for three boxes and I kept improving until I was well. I quickly regained my lost weight—and now I eat, sleep and digest well—in a word, I am fully recovered, thanks to 'Fruit-a-tives.'

MRS. CHARBONNEAU.

50c. a box, 6 for $2.50, trial size 25c. At dealers or sent postpaid on receipt of price by Fruit-a-tives Limited, Ottawa.

Mrs. Caldwell and daughters, Misses Hazel and Vaddie, attended the fair at Walkerton.—Durham Chronicle

Is it a Craze?

At the recent meeting of the county council, Mr Reene who represented Mr H. C. Ames, M. P. of Montreal, and Chairman of the Canadian Patriotic Fund, stated that some one overburdened with patriotism started the machine gun craze. All the money that has been so subscribed, amounting to $2000,000 would not add one more gun to the number which the government has already ordered. The government would of course accept gifts, but he thought the money could go to other and better purposes. —Wiarton Echo.

Struck by Lightening

A despatch from Durham on Friday last says:—"In a severe electrical storm here last evening, Miss Shortt, teacher of Vickers' School three miles west of town, was severely burned, as the result of a stroke of lightening. She was sitting near the window when the bolt came, which stunned her but did not render her unconscious. Her clothing was set ablaze, and before the flames were extinguished she was badly burned about the chest and limbs, which will necessitate absence from her duties for a few weeks at least. A dog lying at her feet was instantly killed. Miss Shortt's home is in Arthur. She was at her boarding-house, the home of Wm Livingston, Bentick, when the accident took place.

OLD COUNTRY NEWS

HOW THEY WON THE V. C.

His Majesty the King has been graciously pleased to award the Victoria Cross to the undermentioned officers and non-commissioned officers and men in recognition of their most conspicuous bravery and devotion to duty in the field:

Captain John Fitzhardinge Paul Butler, the King's Royal Rifle Corps, attached Pioneer Company Gold Coast Regiment, West African Frontier Force.

For most conspicuous bravery in the Cameroons, West Africa, on Nov. 17. With a party of 13 men he went into the thick bush and at once attacked the enemy in strength about one hundred (including several Europeans), defeated them and captured their machine gun and many loads of ammunition. On Dec. 27, when on patrol duty with a few men, he swam the Ekam River, which was held by the enemy, alone and in face of brisk fire completed this reconnaissance on the further bank, and returned in safety. Two of his men were wounded while he was actually in the water.

Captain Charles Calveley Foss, D. S. O., Second Battalion, Bedford Regiment

For most conspicuous bravery at Neuve Chapelle on March 12. After the enemy had captured part of one of our trenches and our counter-attack, made with one officer and 20 men, having failed (all but two of party being killed or wounded in the attempt), Captain Foss, on his own initiative, dashed forward with eight men, under heavy fire, attacked the enemy with bombs and captured the position, including the 52 Germans occupying it. The capture of this position from the enemy was of the greatest importance and the utmost bravery was displayed in essaying the task with so very few men.

Capt. John Aidan Liddell, 3rd Battalion Princess Louise's (Argyll and Sutherland Highlanders) and Royal Flying Corps.

For most conspicuous bravery and devotion to duty on July 31, when in a flying reconnaissance over Ostend, Bruges and Ghent, he was severely wounded, his right thigh being broken, which caused momentary unconsciousness, but by a great effort he recovered partial control after his machine had dropped nearly 3,000 feet, and notwithstanding his collapsed state, succeeded, although continually fired at, in completing his course and brought the aeroplane into our lines half an hour after he had been wounded. The difficulties experienced by this officer in saving his machine and the life of his observer cannot be readily expressed, but as the control wheel and throttle control were smashed and also one of the under carriage struts it would seem incredible that he could have accomplished his task.

Lieut. Frederick William Campbell, 1st Canadian Battalion.

For most conspicuous bravery on 15th June. During the action at Givenchy Lieut. Campbell took two machine-guns over the parapet, arrived at the German first line with one gun and maintained his position there under very heavy rifle, machine-gun and bomb fire, notwithstanding the fact that almost the whole of his detachment had been killed or wounded. When our supply of bombs had become exhausted this officer advanced his gun still further to an exposed position and by firing about a thousand rounds succeeded in holding back the enemy's counter-attack. This very gallant officer was subsequently wounded and has since died.

No. 8980, Corporal William Cosgrove, 1st Battalion, the Royal Munster Fusiliers.

For most conspicuous bravery in the leading of his section with the great dash during our attack from the beach to the east of Cape Helles on the Turkish positions on 26th April, 1915. Corporal Cosgrove on this occasion pulled down the posts of the enemy's wire entanglements single-handed notwithstanding the fire from both front and flanks, thereby greatly contributing to the successful clearing of the heights.

No. 168 Acting-Corporal Issy Smith, 1st Battalion, Manchester Regiment.

For most conspicuous bravery on 26 April, near Ypres, when he left his company on his own initiative and went well forward towards the enemy's position to assist a severely wounded man whom he carried a distance of 250 yards in safety whilst exposed the whole time to heavy machine-gun and rifle fire. Subsequently Corporal Smith displayed great gallantry when the casualties were very heavy in voluntarily assisting to bring in many more wounded men throughout the day and attending them with the greatest devotion to duty regardless of personal risk.

Captain Richard Raymond Willis, 1st Batt. the Lancashire Fusiliers.

No. 1293 Sgt. Alfred Richards, 1st Batt. the Lancashire Fusiliers.

No. 1809 Pte. Wm. Keneally, 1st Batt. the Lancashire Fusiliers.

On 25 April, 1915, three companies and the headquarters of the 1st Batt. Lancashire Fusiliers, in effecting a landing on the Gallipoli Peninsula to the west of Cape Helles, were met by a very deadly fire from hidden machine guns, which caused a great number of casualties. The survivors, however, rushed up to and cut the wire entanglements, notwithstanding the terrific fire from the enemy, and after overcoming supreme difficulties, the cliffs were gained and the position maintained.

Amongst the many very gallant officers and men engaged in this most hazardous undertaking Capt. Willis, Sgt. Richards and Pte. Keneally have been selected by their comrades as having performed the most signal acts of bravery and devotion to duty.

Capt. Lance George Hawker, D.S.O., Royal Engineers and Royal Flying Corps

For most conspicuous bravery and very great ability on 25 July, 1915, when flying alone, he attacked three German aeroplanes in succession. The first managed eventually to escape; the second was driven to ground damaged, and the third, which he attacked at a great height of about 10,000 feet, was driven to earth in our lines, the pilot and observer being killed. The personal bravery shown by this officer was of the very highest order, as the enemy's aircraft were armed with machine guns, and all carried a passenger as well as the pilot.

NOTES.

The death has occurred of Mr. John Edenborough Smith, of [illegible] Overton road, Hillsbro', who for many years held the post of chief cashier at Messrs. Cammell, Laird & Co., Sheffield.

A girl of 21 named Nora Pheasant, Long Marstone, Tring, Herts, was summoned at Berkhamsted petty sessions for harboring a corporal of the Northumberland Fusiliers, who was a deserter. When the police called she denied that the soldier was in the house. The magistrates fined the girl £6, and told her that had she been a man she would have been sent to prison.

A deputation of Manx rating authorities waited on the Governor of the Isle of Man and pointed out that, owing to the holiday season failure, many people would be unable to pay their rates. They asked that the Government should relieve the ratepayers to the extent of one-third. His Excellency, in refusing, said that the rates in the Island were much lower than in England. Applications for borrowing powers or for the suspension of sinking funds might, he added, be considered.

Kent is preparing for its annual invasion of hop-pickers, and in a week or two 50,000 men, women and children will be travelling for their month of work in the hop fields. This year it is said that the hop harvest will be good in the Maidstone district, but not so heavy in other parts. Most of the hop-pickers are women, and they come from many southern towns. The hop growers expect that, in spite of the war, there will be no shortage of hands, and already there have been many applications for employment received by them.

The death is announced at Linlithgow, West Lothian, of Mr. James Struthers, who was almost a centenarian. He was the possessor of a cornet picked up on the battlefield of Talavera, Spain, and with this instrument he once tramped on foot from Linlithgow to London, a distance of over 400 miles.

The freedom of Peterborough has been conferred on Dr. Thomas James Walker, on the occasion of his 80th birthday. Born in Peterborough he has been in practice there for fifty-five years. He has a family of thirteen children, and six of his sons hold commissions in the army. Dr. Walker is the second freeman of the city. The 2nd Godalming Troop of Boy Scouts, working two days a week in parties of four, have made a new path to the top of Hydon Ball, Surrey, the latest acquisition of land by the National Trust, between Haslemere and Godalming. The trust, in recognition of the boys' voluntary service, have named the track "The Scouts' Path." The path gives easy access to the picturesque upland, which hitherto was reached only by four steep tracks.

The Westmeath Hunt Committee at a meeting in Mullingar decided to continue hunting, because if once stopped it would be difficult to survive, because the sport supplies practically the only incentive to the breeding of light cavalry horses, and because the sport provides training for young officers and young horses, and through it much money is circulated in the country.

Corporal L. Barnett, of the Coldstream Guards, who won the D. C. M. in France, was charged at Windsor with stealing letters and postal orders belonging to men in the regiment. He was found guilty of three charges, which he admitted, and was sentenced to eighteen weeks' hard labor. Barnett pleaded that he must have been mad at the time, and said he would have to forfeit his bounty.

A special service for the beginning of the harvest ingathering, was held at 6 o'clock on Monday morning week, at the parish church at Dalton Holme, near Hull. The service, which was attended by many men and women reapers, included special prayers and psalms. Immediately the service was over the farm hands began harvesting.

The Middlesbrough Guardians last Thursday received from the parish of Maltby a portrait of Mr. Thomas Flintoft, who has represented Maltby on the local board of guardians for sixty-three years. He is eighty-four years old, and it was explained at yesterday's meeting that his absence was due to his being exceedingly busy working on his farm.

As an electric tramway car was travelling along [illegible] road, Bradford, last Thursday afternoon the controller fused and caused some alarm among the passengers. A woman, Mrs. Maggie Sutcliffe, Barnes View terrace, Manningham, Bradford, jumped from the car with a little girl in her arms. She struck her head against the pavement as she fell and died almost immediately. The little girl was uninjured.

TURBANS.

The turban of velvet holds a popular place in the millinery world at the present time and it would seem that the less the trimming, the smarter the hat. Usually a touch of silver braid or grosgrain ribbon, or a flower serves the purpose. The hat shown features a trim turban of black velvet with a masking piece of soft material with a military braid binding. The effect is entirely smart.

Care of the Ear.

Never be alarmed if a living insect enters the ears. Pouring warm water into the canal will drown it, when it will generally come to the surface and can easily be removed by the fingers. A few puffs of tobacco smoke blown into the ear will stupefy the insect. Never meddle with the ear if a foreign body, such as a bead, button or seed enters it. Leave it absolutely alone, but have a physician attend to it. More damage has been done by meddlesome attempts at the extraction of a foreign body than could ever come from its presence in the ear.—Health.

(By La Raconteuse.)

The [illegible] brimmed hat for late summer and early fall is considered quite correct. Here a wide brim [illegible] chiffon frill of silk net is combined with a soft round crown of black velvet. Two single sprays of black paradise afford the only trimming and rise gracefully from the centre front. This type is considered generally correct with afternoon frocks or [illegible] frocks.

WITH CANADA IN OLD KENT

A Briton's Interesting Story of the Great Camps.

Every Man Anxious to Bring Fame to His Home.

[illegible]

If you cross the county Downs in Kent at the present time, and ask the first soldier you meet if you are in the neighborhood of the Canadian camps, you will receive the reply, "Yes sure." In the accent which seems to English ears to hail direct from "Chicawgo," but it is pure Canadian.

There are many thousands of Canadians camped on the Kentish Downs. A hundred years ago the Kentish yeomen trained there to meet Napoleon's threatened invasion. Eight hundred years ago, along the same line of hills but a little further west, the Saxons marched to meet the Norman invaders, and two thousand years ago the Britons camped along these hill-tops to watch the coming of the Romans. Today Canada [illegible] the Downs, and if you ask the Canadian soldier whether he likes the [illegible] he replies, emphatically, "Yes, sure." It [illegible]

ALL THE TYPES.

Canada has [illegible] her hallmark on every one of these thousands of her sons [illegible] Whether from the land of the west, [illegible] far west, or the north [illegible] they come from every corner of Canada [illegible] It is in the eye, whose glance is as straight as that of a machine gun, and in the [illegible] which is as firm as a steel plate, and in the poise of the head, which is as lofty as the Rocky Mountains. There is an air of assurance and confidence in the walk, as if each man felt quite sure that the earth was made for Canadians, and a super-American [illegible] of independence, which is all part of the same [illegible] look.

There are not merely battalions, but brigades of these tall bronze-complexioned [illegible] Canadians [illegible] Kentish Downs. [illegible]

So far as England has heard much about them [illegible] their arrival, but for three months they have been at home on the Kentish Downs, and [illegible] the little straggling [illegible] Kentish battalions. All the girls have [illegible] Canadian admirers [illegible]

The [illegible] of the Maple Leaf. [illegible] The [illegible], indeed, more Anglo-Saxon than the English, for they [illegible] the pioneer bearing [illegible] the Anglo-Saxon [illegible] a few centuries [illegible] They are more [illegible] than we are ourselves.

MARCHING AS TO WAR.

Take your stand on some edge of the Downs, a few miles from the [illegible] and watch a brigade of the Canadians swing over the hillside. They are marching as to war, battalion after battalion, each with its mule train of ammunition, [illegible] and a line of cooking stoves [illegible] the smoke trailing from chimneys. After them come the guns, [illegible] toward the [illegible] for the night. It is a really formidable brigade, made and [illegible] in Canada. [illegible] where the dead of [illegible] have been buried during a thousand years, and as you watch these roving fighters swing by, the breasts of many of them bare to the sun and the breeze and their great [illegible] breast with the joy of living, you begin to forget that they are all from Ontario and that they [illegible] by that [illegible] name of Canadians. You see in them the [illegible] England and made England.

They [illegible] prepared for the defence.

LIGHT ON ENGLAND.

The fight [illegible] most of the day, and ends when the invaders, bridging a canal, turn the defenders' flank and gain the country at their rear. Like all true soldiers, when the fighting does not immediately concern them, some of the defenders snore peacefully in the shade at noonday under the trees, awaiting the signal for action. Here and there one of them gazes over the countryside, with eyes for the beauty of the view.

"Sure, I never thought England was like this," says a New Brunswicker. "I always imagined England was all built up; I didn't think there'd be fields and sheep and trees. I guess I'll have to have a good look round England when this war's through."

The real excitement of the day is that of the scouts, who crawl round cornfields, lie in wet ditches, and escape capture by miracles. A scout comes in, galloping, pulls up beside the officer who sent him out, and reports. He wastes no time in saluting, but just shakes his head and says, "Nothin' doing'." There is no excess of ceremony, but the Canadian officers and men understand and respect each other's worth.

It is a fine sight to see these Canadian battalions march past on the [illegible] for there are no regiments in the British army which march better and that is saying a great deal. You can see that every man of them is proud that he is a Canadian, and means to make everybody proud of Canada.

Like their cousins the Americans, the Canadian soldiers have a well-formed souvenir habit. They have [illegible], old Sheffield plate tankards, [illegible] little thing to remind them of their visit to England.

"I think the real reason why that [illegible] Bibles in the churches," a Kentish sexton said, "was that he [illegible] the Canadians would be coming."

"[illegible]," replied a Canadian soldier, "I [illegible] like the chain, too."

Many of them will either take living souvenirs back to Canada, or they will come and settle in England, when the war is over. All the girls for miles around have engagement rings.—London Daily Express.

PLUMED ENERGY

The Little House Wren Exemplifies Modern World Spirit.

There is no better expression of the modern world-spirit than is to be found in the life history of the familiar little house wren. It is the very embodiment of restless energy. Whether he is singing his song of joy, searching for his food, building his home, attending to the wants of his young, or scolding the cat, he seems to be doing the task in hand as if the whole world depended upon its being done as speedily and as thoroughly as possible. While he is searching for it he is up and down, in and out, here and there, at such a rate that the eye is puzzled to follow him. When he is making a home he seems to be animated by the fear that the world's supply of sticks and dried grasses and feathers will become exhausted before he finishes, unless he finishes at once. When he is feeding his young he shows a similar anxiety lest the food supply should become exhausted before the little ones have had their share. When he sings, as he constantly does, he sings with all his might. In the opening bars the notes are sent from his little throat in such confusion as to defy melodic arrangement. If you are close enough to catch the opening you may suspect that he is stuttering. It is merely the result of intensified energy. The notes are sent forth with such a rush that they block each other's way. But at no time is his wonderful energy more clearly exemplified than when he is scolding, as he often is. It may be the cat, or a house sparrow, or even another wren from a neighboring house. He pours forth his scorn upon the intruder as if he would wipe her off the face of the earth. And when he has succeeded, to the extent of ridding the neighborhood of his home of the hated presence, he changes his tune, and the victory is announced and celebrated in a burst of song that is the very expression of uncontrollable joy.

The house wren makes a very delightful visitor. It is easy to make friends with him. Provide a little home for him, and then don't appear to pay too much attention to him, and he will reward you through the whole season for a variety of pretty and interesting ways, by a constant outpouring of song, and above all by a charming display of confidence and even companionship. After you have helped him to chase away the cat a couple of times, or joined with him in an alliance against the sparrows, he becomes your trusting friend and performs his most wonderful feats under your very eyes.

He is not depending upon you, mind you, for a shelter for his nest. If you provide a box, well and good. He will use it, and pay you promptly and liberally during the entire run of the lease; but if there be no box he is not discouraged. He will find a place for his nest, in a corner of the verandah, may be, in a hole in the fence-post, in the folds of your garden coat that you have left out over night. But he prefers a box, because it is readymade, and affords him the protection he needs from his enemies. Any kind of a box will do, but it is better not to be too large, because he is liable to keep on carrying in sticks and other building material while there is a space to be filled. A deep cigar box, or something about that size, will do. Make the hole about seven-eighths of an inch.

This is large enough to let the wren in and small enough to keep the sparrow out. If the hole be too large the sparrows are likely to take forcible possession. If you cut a narrow slit on each side of the hole, running parallel with the bottom, you will make it easier for Mr. Jimmie Wren to unload his sticks; but if you do that you will miss an interesting exhibition of wren-engineering. The slit is a convenience; but Jimmie can get along very well without it. He alights at the hole with a stick, say, two inches long and grasped in the middle, and, of course, it blocks the progress. But only for an instant. He turns the stick around so that one end points downward, and then opens his bill as if to let it fall. But he doesn't. He lets it slip through just a little bit and grasps it again. This process is followed till he has the stick by the end, when he shoots into the hole pulling the precious bit of timber with him.

He seems to go through the same performance every time he arrives at the entrance with a twig too long to be carried in by the centre. He never seems to learn by his experience. He is very human in this respect. We are all accustomed to keep on doing the same thing over and over again in the same wasteful, faulty way, and when somebody comes along to show us a better way, we denounce him as a disturber or an anarchist or at least as a faddist. Didn't our fathers and grandfathers do the thing we are doing the way we are doing it, and wouldn't it be sacrilege to change?

Jimmie Wren is very human, too, in another characteristic. A good deal of his energy is wasted. He is constantly dragging sticks and beginning nests that are never finished. Wherever he sees a suitable opening he must lay the foundations of a nest. It will never be used. It will never be finished. What difference does that make? He feels the impulse and obeys it, without thinking of results.

The house wren is no mean songster. The melody is pleasing and the volume is surprising, considering the size of the throat from which it comes. He is also a very useful bird to have around the garden. His food is largely made up of garden pests. He raises two and sometimes three, broods in a season, and as he is a good provider it is surprising the number of insects a family of wrens will dispose of in a single season.—Woodstock Sentinel-Review.

WATER AND LIGHT.

Why One Can See Deep Into the Sea When High Above It.

The reason why one is able to see to a greater depth in water when he is at a considerable height above it than when he stands on a level with it is because of the absence of pronounced refraction by the molecules of water. One above the surface of perfectly still water, looking exactly downward toward the centre of the earth, will see an object deep in the water by means of rays of light that have been reflected vertically upward. Therefore there is no reflection or bending the rays out of their straight course from object to eye.

But if you attempt to see an object at the bottom of a lake when standing on the bank the light has to traverse a much greater thickness of water, which quenches a portion, or maybe all, of the waves of light, and all not quenched are bent to quite a distance out of the original straight line [illegible] the well known index of refraction of light of one kind from water to air is 1.336, or the ratio of the sines of angles of incidence and refraction.

Proof: Place a straight stick in a basin, and it will appear to be straight as it really is; pour in water and the stick will appear to be bent by the phenomena attending refraction. For without refraction of light by glass, for instance, we would not have telescopes and microscopes.—Edgar Lucien Larkin in New York American.

Bullet Stopping Tricks.

Five feet of clay, three feet of loose earth, or two and a half feet of sand will stop a modern rifle bullet at the closest range; but, curiously enough, as the layman may think, ramming earth hard reduces its resisting power, and high velocity bullets have less penetration in sand at short than at medium range. Eighteen inches of sand between boards is bullet proof, also nine inches of well built brick work. Soft wood, like fir, across the grain is bullet proof at point blank range if forty-eight inches thick, or at 500 yards if half as thick. Similarly, twenty-seven inches of hard wood, like oak, is point blank proof or fifteen inches at 500 yards. Half an inch of wrought iron or mild steel, a quarter of an inch of hard steel, or a fifth of an inch of special steel is bullet proof. So are six inches of shingle, [illegible] inches of coal, or, as some people will be surprised to know, eight feet of snow.—London Express.

Was Constantly Troubled With Boils.

HAD NINE ON HIS ARMS AT ONCE.

Boils are caused by bad blood, and unless the blood is made pure you cannot expect to get rid of them.

Ointments and salves will do you no good. You must get at the seat of the trouble by using a good internal blood purifying medicine such as that grand old remedy Burdock Blood Bitters.

Mr. Samuel Buckler, Tatamagouche, N.S., writes: "Last summer I was constantly troubled with boils. I had nine on my arms at once. I thought it was caused from bad blood so I got two bottles of Burdock Blood Bitters, and before the first bottle was done I began to feel a great deal better, and before the second one was finished I did not have a boil, nor have I had one since. I cannot recommend B.B.B. too highly."

Burdock Blood Bitters is manufactured only by The T. Milburn Co., Limited, Toronto, Ont.

HAD CHOLERA INFANTUM.

Doctor Said He was In a Very Dangerous Condition.

Mothers cannot watch their children too closely for signs of cholera infantum, as this disease carries off thousands of infants during the hot summer months.

Mrs. Geo. W. Garland, Prosser Brook, N.B., writes: "Last summer my boy Joe, then a year old, was taken sick with cholera infantum. He was so bad the waste matter from the bowels looked as if it had come from a broken boil. I sent word to the doctor who was at a neighbor's, about a mile distant, and he said my boy was in a very dangerous condition. He sent me some tablets which made the child vomit, and when he learned that they caused vomiting he sent me more tablets to stop it. In the meantime I had been giving Dr. Fowler's Extract of Wild Strawberry, which I continued using, and when the bottle was all used my baby was cured. I though it only fair to let you know about it."

Dr. Fowler's Extract of Wild Strawberry has been on the market for the past 70 years, and is known from one end of Canada to the other as a positive cure for all bowel complaints.

When you ask for "Dr. Fowler's" be sure you get what you ask for as there are many rank imitations on the market.

The genuine is manufactured by The T. Milburn Co., Limited, Toronto, Ont.

Butler's Reply.

There was a time, while Lyman Trumbull was chairman of the senate committee on judiciary, than Benjamin Butler was chairman of the judiciary committee of the U. S. house. It was at this period that a delegation from one of the southern states visited Washington with a desire to secure the impeachment and removal of the federal judge of their state. They interviewed Mr. Butler as to the probability of carrying such a measure through that session.

"I don't know," was Mr. Butler's reply. "I am chairman of the judiciary committee of the house. The necessary action can be had here. But Lyman Trumbull is chairman of the senate committee, and Judge Trumbull is troubled with two things—the dyspepsia, which makes him miserable, and conscience, which makes him uncertain."

FARM AND GARDEN

AUTUMN SOWN CROP EXPERIMENTS.

About two hundred and eighty-five varieties of winter wheat and a large number of selections and crosses have been grown under experiment at the Agricultural College within the past twenty-six years. Nearly all the varieties have been carefully tested in each of five years, after which the inferior brands have been discarded and those which have given the best results have been continued in the experiments. Within the past year forty varieties, fourteen hybrids, and a number of straight selections were grown under test. Of the named varieties fourteen have been grown in each of twenty years, and the results of these are of particular value. The average results for the twenty-year period show that the following varieties gave highest average yields of grain per acre: Dawson's Golden Chaff, 51.4 bushels; Imperial Amber, 48.5 bushels; Early Genesee Giant, 47.1 bushels; Egyptian Amber, [illegible] bushels; Early Red Clawson, 46.6 bushels, and Rudy, 45.8 bushels. In Ontario during the past year it was comparison with these yields the Turkey Red gave an average of 43.7 bushels, and the old Treadwell variety 42.1 bushels per acre.

From enquiries made throughout Ontario during the past year it was evident that the Dawson's Golden Chaff is still the most extensively grown variety of winter wheat in Ontario. Seventy per cent. of the answers mentioned Dawson's Golden Chaff as the most extensively grown variety in the different counties. This variety, in the results at Guelph for twenty years, has given an average of practically three bushels per acre more than any other variety grown under similar conditions. The Dawson's Golden Chaff was originated in Ontario thirty-four years ago. It produces a very stiff straw of medium length, beardless heads with red chaff, and white grain which weighs slightly over the standard per measured bushel. There seems to be evidence that the Dawson's Golden Chaff is improving somewhat in quality for bread production. Farmers' Bulletin No. 616, of the United States Department of Agriculture states that the Dawson's Golden Chaff is probably the leading variety of soft white winter wheat in the North Central and the North Atlantic States. It also refers to the wheat as follows: "This variety stands up well in the field and is above the average in winter resistance. The grains are somewhat harder than those of most other white wheats. In several milling and baking tests that have been made it has given a good yield of flour, rather low in total protein content, but containing gluten of excellent quality." The Imperial Amber variety produces a large amount of straw which is medium in strength, a bearded head with red chaff and a red grain of very good quality.

In the experiments conducted at the College in 1915 the winter wheat gave an average yield of grain of 12.5 bushels per acre over the average of the past twenty years. The straw was somewhat heavier but the grain weighed one-half pound per measured bushel less than the average.

For nine years in succession experiments were conducted in treating winter wheat in different ways to prevent the development of stinking smut, and the results have been very satisfactory. In the average for five years, untreated seed produced 4.2 per cent. of smutted heads, while seed which was immersed for twenty minutes in a solution made by adding one pint of formalin to forty-two gallons of water, produced a crop which was practically free from smut.

Owing to excessive rains this season a considerable amount of winter wheat throughout Ontario became sprouted before it could be harvested. Information regarding the value of sprouted wheat for seed purposes is important. In each of two years when winter wheat was sprouted in the fields, germination tests of the grain were made. The following results show the average percentages of germination for each selection: Skin over germ, unbroken, 91; skin over germ, broken, 76; sprouts one-quarter inch long, 30; and sprouts one inch long, 18. Not only were the sprouted seeds low in germination, but the plants produced were very uneven in size.

CO-OPERATIVE EXPERIMENTS.

Three hundred and eighty-eight farmers throughout Ontario conducted experiments with autumn sown crops during the past year. Reports have been received from thirty-seven counties and districts throughout Ontario. Those sending the greatest number of reports were Nipissing, Simcoe, Ontario, Hastings, Huron and Parry Sound. The greatest number of good reports were furnished by Simcoe, Ontario, Welland, Lambton and Haliburton.

Five varieties of winter wheat were distributed last autumn to those farmers who wished to test some of the leading varieties on their own farms. The average results of the carefully conducted co-operative experiments with these five varieties showed the following yields per acre. Imperial Amber, 25.8 bushels, American Banner, 22.5 bushels; Banatka, 30.5 bushels; Crimean Red, 27.1 bushels, and Yaroslaf, 28.5 bushels.

In another co-operative experiment the Petkus winter rye surpassed the Imperial Amber winter wheat by an average of [illegible] pounds per acre.

The co-operative experiments with hairy vetches and winter rye for fodder production showed that the yields in tons for green crop per acre were as follows: Hairy vetches, 11.1 in 1915, and 11.1 in the average of four years; and winter rye, 8.7 in 1915, and [illegible] in the average of four years.

DISTRIBUTION FOR EXPERIMENTS IN 1915.

As long as the supply lasts, material will be distributed free of charge in the order in which the applications are received from Ontario farmers wishing to experiment and to report the results of any one of the following tests: 1, Three varieties of winter wheat; 2, one variety of winter rye and one of winter wheat; 3, spring applications of five fertilizers with winter wheat; 4, autumn and spring applications of nitrate of soda and common salt with winter wheat; 5, winter emmer and winter barley; 6, hairy vetches and winter rye as fodder crops. The size of each plot is to be one rod wide by two rods long. Fertilizers will be sent by express for No. 4 this autumn and for No. 3 next spring. All seed will be sent by mail except that for No. 4, which will accompany the fertilizers.

FORAGE PLANT TEST.

Bulletin No. 81 of the Division of Forage Plants, Dominion Experimental Farms, gives a summary of results reached at the central and different branch farms and stations throughout the country, and can be had free on application to the publications branch, Department of Agriculture, Ottawa. There are included also some recommendations as to the varieties to grow, or crop production methods to follow, as deducted from the results of experimental work in the various provinces. A variety of tests at the central experimental farm in Indian corn showed that the best varieties in ears of twelve experimented with were Quebec Yellow, Windus Yellow Dent, Canada Yellow and Free Press, and that, while of the ensilage varieties proper, Argentine Yellow gave the highest yield in tonnage, White Cap Yellow Dent, Golden Glow, King Philip and Wisconsin No. 7 reached a more advanced stage of maturity. Eighteen varieties of turnips were tested, thirteen of mangels, five of carrots, and four of sugar beets. Of the turnips nine varieties produced over 2½ tons dry matter to the acre. Of the mangels half a dozen varieties yielded 3 1-4 tons of dry matter to the acre. Of the carrots White Belgian gave 24 tons, 400 pounds of crop with 2 tons, 1,905 pounds dry matter to the acre and Ontario Champion 25 tons of crop and 2 tons, [illegible] pounds dry matter.

With a view of securing data, bearing on the possibility of producing field root seed profitably in Canada, a great number of seed roots were selected, not only at the Central farm, but also on most of the branch farms and stations in the eastern Provinces. At the Central Farm about 12,000 mangels of the Long Red variety, and 2,000 Magnum Bonum Swede turnips were stored for the purpose from the general field crop. In addition, about 2 tons of mangels of the Long Red and Yellow Intermediate types were selected from the plots grown for variety tests by the division of forage plants.

In leguminous forage plants many tests were made for hardiness, quality and quantity, in order to arrive at a proper understanding of the nature of a number of Canadian grasses and sedges, arrangements were made to secure, through exchange, a representative collection of grasses and sedges from Northern Europe. About a thousand [illegible] were secured for this purpose and sent forward. The reports from the superintendents of branch farms and stations will be found of the greatest interest, each especially to farmers in the respective provinces represented.

THE POULTRY WORLD

SHAPE OF THE BEST HENS.

Whether the shape of the hen's body influences egg production or egg production influences her shape, or both, we cannot say, yet we do see that good egg producers have regular shaped bodies, in the form of a wedge, the back being one side of the triangle, the breast being another and the third side being the distance from the pelvic bones to the back point of the breast or keel bone.

It matters little whether shape influences egg production, or egg production influences shape, for the fact remains that the hens which are producing large numbers of eggs usually conform to this wedge shape, and we believe that something can be told of pullets even before they begin to lay.

Shape assists therefore in selecting the best producers. But where it is possible to trapnest for at least thirty days, much can be told of a hen's value as an egg producer by the rythm of egg production. The number of eggs produced by a hen without missing a day is called a cycle. The number of eggs in each cycle tells whether the egg organs have the ability to produce eggs rapidly and the frequency with which these cycles are repeated tells whether the hen has a constitution which will stand up under the strain of heavy egg production. In other words the number of eggs in the cycle tells the hen's breeding and repeating the cycles tells of the constitution.

If a hen lays four or more eggs to the cycle and repeats the cycles with only one or two days missed she is a good hen. If a hen lays three or less eggs to the cycle and misses two or more days between cycles she is of little or no value as an egg producer.

The hen which lays twenty or thirty eggs in one cycle, then misses ten or fifteen days, should be classed with the hen which lays regularly, but lays only one or two eggs in the cycle. The first has well developed egg organs with a weak constitution while the second has a strong constitution and weak egg organs.

This method of selection is of value where the hens are trapnested for only two or three months during the breeding season, or if a hen has been trapnested during the breeding season and should get killed the rythm of egg production would give an idea of the value of the offspring.

EGGS THAT DON'T HATCH.

Infertility of eggs is not due to the method of setting, neither is a weak germ. These are always due to something that precedes their being placed under the proper conditions for incubation. To the male has been attributed in the past most of the cause of infertility; careful investigation shows that the female plays just as important a part in producing [illegible] germs as the male.

Some authorities attribute the lack of fertility among the Wyandottes to incompatibility between the females and the particular cock bird. If perchance eggs are very poor in fertility it is as advisable to look to the hens as to the male birds. Many times change in environment, or feed, or in the male will bring round desired and improved results.

Seldom is the trouble due to mating too many hens to the male, for there are in existence many examples of splendid fertility where forty to fifty hens are mated to one male. One mating between the two sexes should insure fertility in several eggs and has been known to last as long as twenty-eight days.

Dead germs and dead chicks in shell are too often attributed to faulty incubation. Such a cause can never be proved until eggs from the same birds are placed under hens and in incubators at the same time. It is the belief of the writer that eggs with good, strong, vital germs will hatch under almost any normal condition.

NOTES.

The hens require good care to get through the strain of molting with unimpaired health, so that eggs will be plentiful later on.

Hens confined in small runs need plenty of range and access to insects of all kinds more attention than the flock that has

Even the hens that have the freedom of the fields need to be fed a variety of [illegible].

The man who grows up with his business is the one who makes the best go of it.

A dog that sucks eggs is a pretty hard proposition to deal with. Peppered eggs are as good as anything we ever tried, but I sometimes think you either have to get rid of the dog or the hens.

The busier the hen the more eggs she is putting in the basket.

Filthy water will bring on disease faster than you can cure it with stuff out of a bottle.

Wheat helps pullets to come to laying sooner than almost any kind of grain I know of.

Grabbing a hen by the wing is like trying to lift a fellow by the ear.

Ducklings rarely die except from sunstroke or being caught out in big storms. They should not be given liberty for the first fortnight at least. Kept in a run on short grass, alike screened from cold winds and shaded from the sun, there will be few losses. After three weeks old a daily bath will do them good, if the weather is warm.

Depend upon good feeding for eggs, not upon spices and stimulants. These are useful enough to tide over brief troubles such as chills, but all tonics lose their power after a time; and stimulants undermine the constitution.

Keep the different ages of chickens apart, or the young ones will suffer from bullying. Far better to keep transferring the younger chicks from the rearing ground to more distant pastures. If there is not room for all to have liberty, give the pullets all the range possible, and shut the table cockerels up in wired pens.

TUMBLEWEED.

This Curious Bushy Growth is the Clown of Vegetation.

Though Mark Twain tells about coyotes and prairie dogs, animals which I looked for, but sorry to say I did not see, he ignores the tumbleweed, the most curious thing—animal, vegetable or mineral—that crossed my vision as I crossed the plain. I cannot understand why Mark Twain did not mention this weed, because he must have seen it and it must have tempted him with its comical gyrations.

Tumbleweed is a bushy plant which grows to a height of perhaps three feet and has a mass of little twigs and branches which make its shape almost perfectly round. Fortunately for the amusement of mankind it has a weak stalk, so that when the plant dries the wind breaks it off at the bottom and then proceeds to roll it over and over along the land. I well remember the first tumbleweed I saw.

"What on earth is that thing?" cried my companion excitedly, pointing out through the car window. I looked. Some distance away a silence-buff colored thing was making a swift, uncanny progress toward the east. It wasn't crawling. It wasn't running, but it was travelling fast with a rolling, bouncing, careening motion like a barrel half full of whisky going down hill. Now it tilted one way, now another; now it shot swiftly into some slight depression in the plain, but only to come bounding lightly out again with an air inimitably gay, abandoned and funny.

Soon we saw another and another. They became more and more common as we went along until presently they were everywhere, [illegible] their manila [illegible] from the prairie and piled high against the fences along the railroad's right of way like great, concealing snowdrifts.

Tumbleweed is the clown of vegetation, and it has the air as it rolls along of being conscious of its comicality, like the clown candidate in the dog show which goes and [illegible] the basket behind the trainer's back or the circus clown who runs about with a rolling gait, bounding, turning double and triple somersaults and running on, tripping, falling and turning over and over again.—Julian Street in Collier's Weekly.

HORSES AT THE FRONT.

(By Annie S. [illegible], in the Glasgow Herald.)

Baker's horse and dealer's horse and stately carriage pair,
Hunting horse and farmer's horse, they muster in the square;
A saddle on for [illegible] and a label on the mane—
Off to [illegible] and cross the [illegible].

Comrade of your toil or [illegible], black or brown or grey,
Take a last long look at him, and let him trot away;
Shining hoof on every foot, [illegible] tail and mane,
Here's a horse will never step the Border roads again.

Fight we must, and fight we can, but [illegible]—
Starving [illegible] behind the trench or shattered by a shell,
Moaning in the darkness for the mercy of a gun—
And [illegible] on things He made—for [illegible] have none.

First of all the [illegible], black or grey or brown,
Take a last long look at them and let them leave the town—
Here's the King's horse, shod and shorn, bound for Belgium's plain,
Here's a horse will never step the Border roads again.

Stand we must, and stand we shall, to keep a plighted troth,
Land to land is [illegible] friends and Heaven must judge [illegible] both,
Win we must, [illegible] foreign force our island rights destroy,
But [illegible] share the fear and pain, and never the victor's joy.

Helpless, yet our helpers true—grey and brown and black,
Fare you well or fare you ill, there's now no turning back;
See the King's horse, shod and shorn, bound for Belgium's plain,
Never one of all the troop will whinny here again.

If Thin, Nervous, Run Down, Depressed, This Will Help!

The wear and strain of life has tended in recent years to produce nervous debility in a large percentage of our population.

Thousands are affected with a feeling they can't exactly describe. They are always tired and droopy, lack ambition, have poor appetite, look pale and suffer from depressing headaches and insomnia.

This condition is full of peril. It is the stepping stone to invalidism, the beginning of a shattered constitution.

We advise everyone in this condition to take a good medicine at once and try to get well while yet there is time.

Probably no better advice can be given than to use Dr. Hamilton's Pills, which have become famous in restoring the sick to good health. A general toning up of the system at once takes place. The whole body is vitalized by richer and purer blood. The appetite is increased, food is digested and naturally strength rapidly increases. Headaches go because the bowels are regulated and all wastes are carried off.

There is no experiment about using Dr. Hamilton's Pills because they certainly restore the sick, as a trial will quickly prove. Just as good for the old as the young, and suitable to the needs of women and children. This grand family medicine should be in every home.

The HouseKeeper

When boiling meat, if a wire teapot stand [illegible] put in the bottom of the kettle and the meat laid on that to cook it will not stick to the kettle and burn.

Put pieces of soap into a pan and pour out enough boiling water to dissolve them, making a thick jelly. Keep in a jar. This will be found very useful for flannels, blouses, etc.

Wash a range off with cold coffee, having a little ammonia added, before applying blacking, and it will be readily polished.

Wine stains which have dried on table linen or napkins should be moistened with whisky before the linen is laundered.

After you have dusted a mirror, a little camphor on a cloth will brighten it.

When washing woodwork, take a pail of water, one-half pint of vinegar, and a soft rag; woodwork will look like new.

If butter is hard to cream don't warm it. This changes the texture of it. Instead, run it through the vegetable ricer. This breaks it into small pieces and it can then be readily creamed.

[illegible] for breakfast, just before taking from the stove, add [illegible].

To finely chopped, boiled carrots, add a tablespoonful of chopped fresh parsley and a liberal tablespoonful of hot butter with pepper and salt to taste. The combined flavor is delicious, and persons not caring for carrots, as a rule, will eat them prepared this way.

A teaspoonful of sugar added to the water for boiling meat will give it a rich brown color and the flavor will be much improved.

To make soap jelly, so often recommended in the cleaning of delicate things, melt any good laundry soap in water over a hot fire until it becomes liquid. When cold it will form a jelly, and should be molded in small jars for use at various times, when required.

If your kettle burns dry take it from the stove and place it immediately in a pan of cold water. This will save the food from having a scorched taste unless, of course, it is very badly burned.

PRISONERS OF WAR.

Code of Honor by Which Their Treatment is Governed.

In ancient times prisoners of war were made slaves or [illegible] inhuman treatment of prisoners.

Prisoners are subjected to the punishment [illegible]. Neither must they be placed in a convict prison, although they may be detained in a fortress, camp or town. [illegible] in the power of the government of the [illegible] and not under the control of those who actually capture them.

All personal belongings remain in the custody of the prisoners, but arms, horses and military papers can be confiscated, [illegible].

Governments can put their prisoners of war to work, but only such work as accords with the prisoner's rank and capacity; also the work must not be excessive or relate to military matters, and [illegible] labor be paid for.

A prisoner always lives in hope of being exchanged for a prisoner of his own government. The exchange is effected in accordance with agreements, in which time, place and method of exchange are fully detailed. SMILE, HANG YOU! SMILE!

(Ottawa Journal)

Courtesy counts for success in business in Ottawa anywhere.

Fifteen years ago a resident of this city, then a stranger, went into a hat store. Several hats, unsuitable to the customer were jammed down on his head. With a third or fourth failure the clerk became peevish and irritable. Finally he walked away from the customer.

Clearly the shrewd professional man watched the course of events at that hat store. It went smash in less than three years and a live wire who knows how to be civil has since made a comfortable income at the same stand.

Discourtesy the public will not stand for to-day.

To the business man who does not advertise civility makes less difference for he doesn't meet many customers anyhow.

Chats With the Doctor

BY A PHYSICIAN

VAPOUR BATHS.

Vapour baths are very useful for promoting perspiration, and are thus valuable in many diseases, but it is as well to consult a medical man before taking them although a strong, healthy person is not likely to suffer any serious effects from a vapour bath. In rheumatism and kindred diseases vapour baths are extremely useful. The greatest care is required to see that the bed, bed clothes, towels, and night clothes are made as hot as possible. A heated blanket should be wrapped round the patient immediately he leaves the vapour bath, or a serious chill may result.

The simplest form of vapour bath is to seat the patient in a chair, cover all but the head with a large blanket, and place under the blanket a bucket full of boiling water. As the water cools hot bricks are dropped into it, and this keeps up the supply of steam. Hot-air baths are given by means of a spirit lamp under the chair, and no water is used, but great care must be taken to avoid the danger of fire.

TURKISH BATHS.

The Turkish bath is not only one of the most valuable, but also the useful to relieve excessive fatigue. In a medical sense they are very valuable in the cure of rheumatism, dropsical swellings, neuralgia, and for the reduction of flesh. They should, however, not be taken too frequently, once a week being quite sufficient, unless specially ordered otherwise by the medical attendants.

RHEUMATIC SORE THROAT.

This type of sore throat is very prevalent during the winter, and is due to the acid formations in the blood, which would have a tendency to irritate and weaken the mucous membrane, or lining of the throat. The symptoms are not serious, although they are very stubborn. Besides the pain in the throat, there is also a certain amount of pain in the muscles of the neck, and frequently there is more or less general weakness of the system. To cure the throat, use a gargle, composed of four drachms of borax dissolved in a pint of fairly hot water. This will ease the pain and reduce the inflammation. But as the sore throat is due to a condition obtaining in the blood, and is therefore only a local symptom, a teaspoonful of bicarbonate of potash should be dissolved in a little soda water and drunk between meals. Also drink lemon juice and water freely, but do not add sugar to the lemon juice.

SORE EYES.

These may be constitutional, or may be due to some weakness of the system, and no local treatment has any lasting effect upon the red eyelids which usually go by the name of "sore eyes." The first object should be to strengthen the whole system, before applying local treatment. The diet should be good, but wholesome, rich and indigestible dishes must be avoided. Syrup of hypophosphites, a teaspoonful taken in a little water three times a day, will often work overtime.

For local treatment bathe the eyes with a little warm water in which a pinch of boracic acid has been dissolved. This should be done the last thing at night, and then a little lanoline or sweet oil should be rubbed over the edges of the lids before going to bed. This prevents the acrid fluid from the eyes injuring and inflaming the edges of the eyelids. These are simple remedies, and will often cure the red rims. Nothing should ever be dropped into the eye without first consulting a medical man, as the eye is too delicate an organ to be trifled with.

CATARRHAL OPHTHALMIA.

This form of eye disease is fairly prevalent in the winter, and is really a form of the usual catarrh which affects the nose and throat, and may eventually, if not checked, develop into the purulent form of the disease. The eyelids are itchy, and are often stuck together in the morning, and if the disease continues for some time the eyelids fall out. The sensation in the eyes themselves feels as if there were some irritating pieces of grit under the lids, and this appears to cause the eyes to water profusely. Rest is necessary, and the following lotion will help with the cure. Dissolve eight grains of sulphate of zinc in six ounces of distilled water and add ten drops of chloroform. Use this by means of an eye-cup twice a day, and after bathing the eyes the first thing in the morning with a little boracic lotion. The eyes should be shaded from the light during the worst of the attack, as using them will only aggravate the symptoms and injure the sight.

WAKEFUL CHILDREN.

While some children sleep well and readily, others are always wakeful and troublesome at night. This is often due to careless training, but in other cases it may result from the child not being well. Some children do not need so much sleep as others. I have known one child of three who slept all night, and for an hour both in the morning and afternoon, while her sister at the same age would not sleep at night if allowed to sleep during the day. There is really no hard and fast rule about babies and young children sleeping. As the night sleeping is the most valuable, drop the day sleeping, especially the one taken in the afternoon.

The afternoon sleep should be as near the middle of the day as possible. It is as well to give the child its midday meal at twelve, and then let it sleep for an hour. This will give the necessary rest, while allowing a good interval before the child is put to bed at night.

Regularity is of the utmost value. The children should be put to bed at the same time every night, and not be allowed to stay up till they are sleepy. If accustomed to going to bed at the right time, they will not beg to stay up, and go to bed without crying. This is often a cause of children waking during the night. They should not have their last meal too close to bedtime, but a cupful of hot milk the last thing is useful, and will often soothe a wakeful child.

The bed must not face the light, as this is a bad thing for the eyes, and if the light from a street lamp shines into the room a child will lie waking [illegible] continually. A screen placed between the bed and the [illegible] make a child [illegible] soundly.

Strange to say, a child has an extraordinary fear of a wide space around it. This fear disappears as it grows older, and if it can reach out a hand and feel something that apparently encloses the bed, the child will be quite satisfied and drop to sleep again.

PARIS AND BERLIN.

Both Know What it is to See Foreign Armies Within Their Gates

Paris has had severe experience in the army of surrenders to invading armies. On March 31, 1814, the allied armies that had hemmed in Napoleon entered the French capital and occupied it with a force of 200,000 troops. After Napoleon's escape from Elba and his defeat at Waterloo the armies of the allies again entered Paris July 7, 1815. Thus the great city had to surrender to its enemies twice within sixteen months. Fifty-five years later—Jan. 28, 1871—the city surrendered again, this time to the victors in the Franco-German war, after a brisk bombardment.

Berlin has seen foreign troops enter its gates no fewer than three times in the last 200 years. The first time, curiously enough, the conquerors were Austrian troops, under General Haddick, who entered Berlin in 1757, when Frederick the Great was engaged in fighting the French on the Rhine. During their stay the Austrians imposed a fine of £30,000 on the city, as well as commandeering a huge quantity of provisions and equipment for their troops.

It was only just over three years later when both the Russian and Austrian troops, then allies of one another, entered Berlin. This time the City was fined £300,000.

The time that will be best remembered, however, was the entry of Napoleon into Berlin after the victory of Jena. Napoleon inflicted a very heavy fine on the Germans and forced them to feed his troops.—London Tit Bits.

THE SWISS SYSTEM.

Tests All Youths Must Pass Before They Become Soldiers.

The Swiss system is ultra militaristic and probably would never be acceptable to the United States. But it is interesting, nevertheless, as indicating how the problem of defense has been met and apparently solved by the earnest and patriotic people of a republic like our own.

The Swiss system is compulsory and begins with the early schooling of each boy. He does not drill or handle firearms, however, until he is twenty years old, when he reports to federal authorities for physical and literary examination. He must be able to read and write and figure, and answer questions in elemental Swiss history and geography.

The physical tests require that the applicants shall cover at least eight feet in a running jump, lift a weight of thirty-seven pounds in both hands at least four times, and run eighty yards in fourteen seconds.

Those who fail in these tests are given an extension of time for further training, not to exceed four years, and if physically disqualified at the end of that period they are obliged to pay a tax, or to take some assigned position which they can fill.—Kansas City Journal.

A Woman's Rights.

A woman's rights—to be loved as she should be,
Honored and trusted as you are or would be.
A woman's rights—to be part of you truly,
Your hopes and your aims and your successes duly,
Your outgo and income, your losing or winning,
All but your evil and anger and sinning—
And that she will know by the light of her light;
Which is surely a gift, if it isn't a right.

A woman's rights—to be talked to in tenderness,
Treated with candor and frankness and care;
A comrade companion, through all this dark wilderness,
Part of your passion as well as your prayer;
Part of your hoping and planning and dreaming,
Part of your sorrow and trouble and woe,
Part of your laughter and sunshine and gleaming,
Knowing you, all of you, all that's to know.

A woman's rights—to have means without asking for Every five cents that she needs in her life;
Her gladness the object of all you are tasking for,
Proud of the comrade you have in your wife;
Proud of her beauty, devotion—and giving her
More than a mere casual mention or less—
A thing to be found when you need something done
And pay for at times with a bonnet or dress.—Baltimore Sun.

Australia's Stony Desert.

The great stony desert of North Australia was discovered by Captain Sturt, an Australian explorer, in 1845-6. It is north of the river Darling, and is about 250 miles long and 100 broad, consisting of sandy dunes or ridges. Its want of trees, except along the creeks, gives the country a sterile appearance. These ridges were probably formed by the joint effect of winds and a gradually retiring sea.

STEPHAN BROS.

Letter From England.

The following letter is from Mrs. A. J. Thick who left Walkerton for England several weeks ago. The letter was written on board the Cymric and posted immediately on landing at Liverpool.

To the editor of
Walkerton Telescope.

Sir,

I am taking the advantage of the opportunity of writing a few lines to let the friends of Walkerton know how we fared on our voyage across from Walkerton to Liverpool. We reached New York at 7 a.m. Friday the 27th, and took boat at 12 prompt, had a very nice day on Saturday but Sunday was a very rough wet day which caused a lot of sickness at sea, nearly everyone on board was sick Sunday and Monday morning. I myself was very sick indeed, but glad to say on Tue. by the weather was perfect and everyone seemed filled with new life. Wednesday we had life belt practice to learn how to put on life belts properly. Thursday at 1.30 we all had to put on life belts and march into a long extended line up along the life boats which were hung out in readiness in case of emergency. Every passenger is shown the proper place to go to after life belt is on and everything is in readiness should it be needed, we expect to reach the war zone Sunday morning. We are going rather slow not more than an average of 12½ knots, but do not mind the slowness as we feel in good health and everything possible is done both for our safety and comfort, nurse, doctor, stewards and even Captain are all that could be desired. The Captain explained to us all on Thursday at drill just what he wanted us to do if necessary. To day, Friday is wet, raining a little but nearly everyone is up on deck, the sea is not rough, the air bracing. We all feel nervous at reaching the danger zone, all lights visible from the outside of the ship are to be put out, we are not to take our clothes off, but to be in perfect readiness for five blasts from the vessel which is our danger signal, let us hope we shall never hear it, as everyone seems to try and believe we shall get to land safely.

I felt struck yesterday at the calmness of some of these people, we have a piano in our dining room and every evening there is some kind of entertainment. On Sunday afternoon those who were able assisted with the stewards to hold a service of praise and the hymns sounded beautiful to those of us who lay in our cabins, so sick and low but it seemed, the good spirit of Sunday soon put fear far. The rest of the evenings were given over to [illegible] concerts, which seemed to me to be out of place at such a time as the present. I enjoy a song if it is fun, but it struck me, how can people make jokes out of being [illegible] and, but nothing, we know there is a God over us all and [illegible] of us who realize that are fully [illegible] Him to bring us safely in. I have never heard but one woman on board who says we shall have to trust [illegible] to be safe. People seem to cling to life belts, life boats and the sailors who man them, more than the One Who Holds us in the Hollow of His Hand.

I shall post this letter just as I land and my friends will know how thankful we are to be able to post it and to relieve the kindly sympathy that the friends of Walkerton have shown to us on this voyage thanking you Mr. Editor for valuable space, and again thanking all kind friends we made while with you.

I remain yours sincerely,
E. Thick.

P. S.

We are carrying the largest cargo ever carried across, we have motor wagons, aeroplanes, gunpowder and shells on board. The men tell us they have been loading her night and day for a week so I should think we will have an escort through the danger zone.

You will like the rich strength and full flavor.

Communication

To the editor of Walkerton Telescope.

Dear Sir,

In your paper of Sept. 2nd, under the heading "Flour drops, why not bread?", you gave your readers an article which is very unfair to the bakers of Walkerton.

Your article states, "When the price of flour was raised last winter, the local bakers almost in twenty-four hours raised the price of bread". This statement is not correct. When the price of flour went up last fall, it was weeks before the price of bread was raised, in fact only when we had to get in a new stock of flour was the increase in price of bread made. Those who have knowledge of the baking trade know well that at the price we sold bread last winter not a cent was made, indeed it was hard to keep even.

Surely in all fairness to the baking trade of your town, you should have secured some knowledge of the facts before you undertook to enlighten your readers. As soon as our present stock of flour, bought before the present crop was harvested (and we will not in the interest of our patrons or ourselves use too fresh flour), we will as is our custom, make a proper reduction in the price of bread.

We may add that at the time your article was written, not a baker in the County of Bruce was selling bread at any lower price than the Walkerton bakers. We are inclined to view that had the Walkerton bakers been advertising in your paper and paying a substantial sum for space, the article in all probability would never have appeared.

Yours respectfully,
John O'Malley,
Alf Helm.

In the course of a juvenile scrap on Saturday noon, "Buster" Truax was struck on the back of the head with a stone large enough to drop an elephant. The youngster dropped like a log, but was soon on his feet, bleeding profusely from a nasty gash, which required the doctor's attention.

Concert At Pinkerton.

The annual concert under the auspices of the Pinkerton Agricultural Society will be held in the Forester's Hall Pinkerton, on Friday evening. Those taking part in the program are:—Madame Coutts-Bain entertainer, Howard Russell, the celebrated baritone, Miss Wittig, pianist and the Kincardine Pipe Band. Admission 25 and 15c.

Huron Follows Example of Bruce

Huron County Council at a special meeting at Goderich on Monday unanimously decided to guarantee the expenses of bringing the 33rd Battalion, now at London to the county to stimulate recruiting and to further increase the county's grant of $1,000 per month to the Canadian Patriotic Fund to $6,000 a month from October to March 1916 and $3,000 per month from April 1st 1916, as long as the County Council deems necessary.

Business Improves

Business is better now than at any time since the dismal days of August 1914. People are coming out of the dumps, there is as much cheerfulness and optimism as consistent with the conditions incident to a great war. The business sky is clearing the producer is smiling and even the consumer, who usually gets everything right in the neck, sees hope in fairer charges for household necessities. Buy carefully, don't waste, be economical but not miserly, and everything will come out right. This is fairly good logic for family guidance even after the Germans have been sufficiently thrashed.

Early Settler Dies.

The following from the Saskatoon Phoenix refers to the death of Mr. T. B. Carlton; a former citizen of Walkerton who died in that city, a short time ago:—T. B. Carlton, one of the early settlers of the Blucher district, died Monday morning at St. Paul's Hospital. Mr. Carlton was a cripple for twenty years, but a cripple who did a man's full share of work; the activity of his brain, and a most cheerful, hopeful disposition, making up for his physical infirmities. There was not a more popular a citizen in the entire district that Mr. Carlton, since arriving there in 1903. He and his two sons homesteaded on section 24-25-29, west of 3rd, in what was then known as Mackenzie, about two miles from Blucher. He was the first to attempt the organization of the Rural Municipality of Blucher, and practically carried on the local part of the organization until incorporation. He has been secretary treasurer of the municipality since its incorporation, and before incorporation was secretary treasurer of Local Improvement District No. 10 A 3, which he had been instrumental in organizing, and also took a prominent part in the establishment of the Mackenzieville school district No. 1121. He was always interested in agricultural matters and for several years was a correspondent of the Provincial Department of Agriculture Statistics, and was a Justice of the Peace for some time. He was 50 years old, and leaves a widow, five sons and two daughters.

Letter From Pte. Kingsbury

The following letter from Private George Kingsbury, written on Sept. 4th, just prior to the second contingents' departure from England to France was received by Mr. R. E. Truax, M. P. this week:—

Sandling Camp,
Hythe, Kent,
Sept. 4th., 1915.

Dear Mr. Truax,

I am glad to say, that at last, we are soon to leave for France, it is some time this month, wish I could tell you the exact date, but that is impossible. Last Saturday, half of the Battalion were given their last leave, of four days, and the rest were going this coming Saturday, but word came from headquarters, to say, that all men on leave, must return at once. I was kind of lucky, for a few days before, I had just come back off six day's leave. On Thursday morning the whole of the 2nd. contingent, were inspected by King George and Lord Kitchener. The inspection took place, about two miles from camp, in a field, of nearly, 100 acres. We arrived there, at half past nine and by the time all the lines had got straightened up, His Majesty had arrived. During the march past, the sun shone brightly, and I can tell you it was a grand sight, to see the thousands of blades of steel, glistening in the sunshine. It was the first time, I had seen King George. I was as close to him, as I have been to you. I felt proud, to be one of the number marching in the ranks. Now that the time has come to go, am ready to lay down my life, for a good cause, but if Providence sees fit that I should be spared, will come back to Walkerton, and tell you all about it. Wherever I am, in the trenches, or back at the base having a rest, shall always be looking for a letter from you, and shall endeavour when finding time, to drop a line, if only a few words, to say I am safe. This will be the last letter I shall be writing to you in England, and if you put the same address to what you have been doing, it will reach me just the same.

I remain,
Yours truly
George Kingsbury.

On the Field of Honor

The publishers of the Family Herald and Weekly Star, Montreal are making a strong bid for that beautiful picture, full of pathos, entitled, "On the Field of Honor." It is assumed the publishers of the Family Herald having in mind using it as a presentation plate. If that is so there is a great treat in store for readers of the Family Herald and Weekly Star this autumn. In past years the Family Herald of Montreal has been noted not only for the wonderful excellence of that journal but for many beautiful pictures it has presented to its readers. The Family Herald has a name for succeeding in anything it undertakes, and we feel sure if it is humanly possible to secure, "On the Field of Honor" that the publishers will succeed in getting it. "On the Field of Honor" is attracting widespread attention in Europe.

A Pair of Die-Hards

A capital little story is told of two Lucknow devotees of the bowling green who attended the recent tournament at Walkerton. Their rink had lost and the pair had retired to the quiet of their room and had gone to bed. Owing to the crowded condition of the house they had to double up—both occupying the bed. The game was being played over again in imagination and conversation, in which ways it is so fatally easy to play well and win. Presently a dispute arose as to which of the two was the better player. In imagination each could see himself laying a shot right up against the cat' putting on just the right kind of a guard. In short playing all around his antagonist. Neither would yield an iota, they couldn't sleep and they couldn't wait. They bowled, but it wasn't as easy on the green as it had been on the pillow and one, of course had to acknowledge defeat. Then they walked back to the hotel, crawled into bed and slept the sleep of the satisfied. These men should be sent to war.—Lucknow Sentinel.

A Slam at Walkerton

The visit of London soldiers at Harriston last week brought in 100 recruits. At Walkerton only 17 were recruited. —Port Elgin Times. Editor Sayles is no doubt in this paragraph throwing a reflection at Walkerton, but he is somewhat astray in his figures, for Military Day in Harriston, brought only one lone recruit, and not one hundred as he states. Therefore an apology is due Walkerton from the editor of the Times and his slam should be thrown Harriston's way.

Hardware Business Sold

An important business change has been made during the past week, Mr H. A. Havill, who is one of Walkerton's pioneer businessmen, having sold his long established hardware and tinsmith shop to Patterson Bros. of Chesley. Messrs W. R. and H. V. Patterson the new proprietors are young men and are both experienced in this line, having been in business in Chesley for a number of years. They solicit a continuance of the patronage which has in the past been extended to Mr. Havill and will guarantee satisfaction to their customers. Mr. Havill will remain a citizen of Walkerton and will in the future live retired.

Women's Institute

The Women's Institute will meet at the home of Mrs. Walter Rowand on Thursday, October 7th.

Suffering from Pleurisy

Pte. Wilfred McKay who enlisted in the 71st. Battalion, has, since going to London, been a patient in the field hospital suffering from pleurisy. Pte. McKay has now almost recovered and is about able to take his place in the ranks. Pte. Tom Liddle has also been suffering from the same complaint for several weeks but is recovering.

Appointed Choirmaster

Mr. E. S. Hudson, son of Mr. M. Hudson of Walkerton, who purchased a Business College in Brantford a short time ago, has been appointed choirmaster of the Oxford street Methodist church in that city. Mr. Hudson was recently tendered a welcome by the congregation on assuming his duties.

Bowman Trophy Here

That coveted piece of silverware, the Bowman Trophy, has once more found a resting place in Walkerton, a local rink having captured it from Arthur on Thursday last. Walkerton rink composed of Messrs T. Pye, H. G. Hunter, W. H. McBurney and O. E. Klein, skip, managed to defeat the Arthur kitty-touchers by a big score. The Orangeville bowlers were expected to play for the trophy, on Monday, but failed to put in an appearance. If Orangeville defaults the game, Southampton will be called upon as that club has the next challenge.

High Prices for Produce

A great deal of complaint and criticism is at present being heard about the prevailing high prices of farm produce etc., but they can no way be compared to the excessive prices paid in the early days of the history of British Columbia. Mr. Jas. Warren, brought to this office on Monday, the first issue of the Cariboo Sentinel, published at Barkerville, B. C. on June 6th., 1865 There were the days of pack trains and stage coaches and also high priced produce, for the market report in the Sentinel gives the retail price of flour at $38 to $40 per one hundred pounds butter $1.50 per pound, bacon 75c., beans 50c, tea $1.50 coffee 75c. and sugar 75c. Fortunately for the poor man these are prices of the past and will probably never again prevail in any clime.

To Manufacture Shells

Representatives of the Dominion Government were here last week interviewing Mr S. Ellinghausen proprietor of the Walkerton Foundry, with regard to the possibility of manufacturing shells for the army in his plant. As the manufacture of shells would necessitate the installation of considerable new machinery, he has not yet decided whether he will accept a contract or not but if suitable arrangements can be made and a sufficiently large contract secured over an extended period of time, he will proceed at once to install the necessary machinery The Board of Trade should be ready to give the proprietor of the foundry any assistance necessary, for if an order for shells is secured, it would be the means of giving a considerable number of men steady employment at good wages.

Daughters of the Empire

The Walkerton Chapter of the I. O. D. E. wish, through the column of the local press, to express their deep appreciation of the help given by the citizens of the town, who though not members, assisted in making their picnic on Civic Holiday a success. They are especially indebted to those who contributed money or prizes, and Messrs White and McKinnon who watched the tent, and to Mr. Lettner and Messrs George Bros, who placed teams at their disposal. The British war office is arranging for a central depot for receiving and distributing field comforts, and in the meantime asks for mufflers, wristlets and socks. Anyone desiring to work for the soldiers can obtain yarn from the I. O. D. E. at the armories on Tuesday evening or Friday afternoon. The Walkerton Chapter has sent away 2000 field comforts, and 1000 bandages, 10,000 surgical dressings and 13,000 sponges.

CARD OF THANKS

The Military Day Committee desires to express its thanks to the many ladies who donated cakes, pies, and other provisions for the use of the 34th Batt. The soldiers frequently expressed their hearty appreciation of the good things so generously provided.

Donations of flour from Platsch Bros., J. W. South and Clarence Smith and butter from the Walkerton Egg & Dairy Co. Ltd. were gratefully accepted.

We have also to express grateful thanks to the Knechtel Furniture Company and other manufacturers in Hanover and to the members of the Hanover Band for their valuable services and the pleasure which their excellent service afforded.

Died in Sarnia

Mrs. Jno. McNally a former resident of Greenock township died at the home of her son in Sarnia on Sunday last, at the advanced age of eighty years. The deceased who was an aunt of Mr. W. J. McNally spent twenty year of her life in Glamis. The remains were brought to Pinkerton on Tuesday, the funeral being held from the station to Purdy's cemetery where interment was made.

Negress Collector Here

The negress collector, soliciting donations for the upkeep of the negro church in Guelph, paid her annual visit to Walkerton last week. The young lady met with very little success and her collections were about one-fourth of former years. Walkerton citizens are at last becoming educated to the fact that there is sufficient charitable work right in their own town and even after the war, should adhere to their present policy instead of contributing to every stranger or colored collector who sees fit to pass the hat.

Kerr—Obrecht

The Sacred Heart rectory was the scene of a very pretty wedding on Tuesday morning at 8 o'clock, when Miss Jean Obrecht, of W. H. McBurney's staff, one of Walkerton's most popular young ladies, was united in marriage to Mr. Wm. Kerr of London, formerly of Walkerton. Mr. and Mrs. Kerr left on the early G. T. R. train on a wedding trip and will in future make their home in London, Ont. The best wishes of their many friends go with the young couple in their new sphere of life.

A Pioneer Battalion

Orders have been received here by Capt. Klein to enlist men for a pioneer battalion which is being raised at London. Farmers, lumbermen, liners waterworks and sewage construction men, railway track-men, carpenters, and blacksmiths are specially adapted for the requirements of such a battalion. Men must be capable of doing the work themselves or directing others. The minimum height is 5 ft. 6 inches. The battalion should secure many recruits in this neighborhood and application for enlistment may be made to Capt. Klein.

County Court

At the sitting of the county court on Monday, there was but one case brought up for hearing. This was an action brought by Mr M. Geagh of Detroit for the readjustment of the deed of some Hanover property which he sold to Mr. Stade of Hanover. It appears that Stade purchased some land from McGeagh, claiming it was a lot and a half which he bought, while McGeagh asserts, that he disposed of but one lot. It is for the recovery of this half lot and readjustment of the deed which Mr. McGeagh brought suit. The hearing was adjourned until Friday when it will be argued before the judge.

A Dangerous Hill

Bilkie's Hill in the west ward is considered by motorists to be a very dangerous one at night owing to the three sharp turns. In making the descent local motorists cut down the speed, but strangers in coming into town, allow their cars to coast down grade, at a high speed, unimpeded by the brakes. As a consequence of this, of late, several serious accidents have been narrowly averted. The town fathers should have a sign placed at the top of the hill warning motorists not to exceed a speed of eight miles an hour. This should also be done at Shaws' Hill, but on this the deplorable condition of the roadway prevents motorists descending at a rapid clip.

A Painful Accident

Jimmie King, a youngster about nine years old, who lives with his grandmother, Mrs. Beechie near the G. T. R. station, was the victim of a very painful accident on Saturday last. It appears that the unfortunate youngster in company with several companions was playing horse with a wheelbarrow, when the strong cord which was tied to his middle finger, became tangled in the wheel of the barrow, winding it up with such force that the lad's finger was torn off at the second joint and the tendon was pulled through the skin and flesh from the top of the finger, almost to the elbow. The accident was the most peculiar and painful one which the local doctors have been called upon to attend.

CARD OF THANKS

Dr. H. H. Sinclair and Miss Sinclair wish to thank their many friends for the very great kindness and deep sympathy extended to them in their bereavement. Particularly do they wish to thank the Lady Superintendent of the Bruce Co. Hospital (Miss Thirsk, and her assistant (Miss Gallagher), and the whole staff of nurses-in-training, for all the kindness and consideration shown them in that institution.

Potatoes Rotting

Farmers and gardeners are now engaged in harvesting the potato crop. Some sections report the crop good, but in others the incessant rains have played havoc with the murphies and the great bulk of them are rotting. Owing to the blight, potatoes will probably command a good price during the coming winter.

Wingham Wins Championship

After winning their district and defeating Owen Sound in the final games, Walkerton's hopes for landing the championship of the Northern Baseball League were on Tuesday shattered by the Wingham nine.—It required three games to settle the matter, but there is now no one who will dispute the fact that the better team won. The first game in Wingham resulted in a win for the home team by a score of 11 to 1 and the second game played here on Saturday resulted in a tie 6-6, while in the final on Tuesday, Wingham again defeated the Walkerton team at the exhibition grounds the score being 4-1. In all three games Walkerton held their opponents scoreless and maintained the lead up until the sixth innings when something happened, a bad error or a couple of wild throws at critical moments and Wingham scored one, two and three runs. Saturday's game, for the first six innings was all Walkerton's, the score at that period being 6-0 in their favor but in the next three, Wingham tied the score. An extra innings was played, but no score was made and the game had to be called on account of darkness. As it was necessary to declare a winner at once it was arranged to replay the game, the day set being Tuesday of this week. The game commenced at 4.15 and the first time up Walkerton scored what was destined to be their only run. The locals held their lead until the sixth, when Wingham managed to fill the bases and with two safe hits following, and a wild throw by a Walkerton player, three runs were brought in. Although Walkerton tried hard in the next three innings to even up matters, the best they could do was to get a man to third, while Wingham added another to their lead and clinched the Free Press cup. Although the local nine have lost the championship they have every reason to be proud of their record in the first year of the history of the Northern League The lineup of the Walkerton team on Tuesday was, c McCartney, p Anderson, s s Runstadtler, 1st b LaFrance, 2nd b Joe Wallace, 3rd b D. Wallace, l f Mullin, c f Wilson, r f Russell.

The Establishment of the Hospital

The passing away of Dr Sinclair last week has started many older citizens recalling the history of the establishment of the Bruce County Hospital and a few words reviewing the events leading up to its establishment will be of interest.

Nearly a quarter of a century ago Dr. Lauchlin Sinclair conceived the idea of having a hospital established in Walkerton, for the benefit of the people of the town and surrounding country.

For many years he planned, when no one else apparently, could be made to see the necessity for such an institution.

The late Wm. Moore, whose splendid bequest made the establishment of a hospital possible had fully made up his mind to leave a large sum of money for the benefit of the sick children hospital at Toronto. Dr. Sinclair saw no harm in attempting to persuade him to leave it so that it could be utilized for the establishment of a hospital in the place where he had lived and had made his money

After many talks, the late Mr. Moore was brought to see the need, of the community here. The late Alexander Shaw, K. C. was called in to draw up a will in which a large sum of money was set aside to be used in the establishment of a county hospital to be placed at Walkerton, on condition that the money were used within a certain limit of time.

Then the real work began. A few far-sighted citizens were brought to see the necessity, and gradually became enthusiastic. They interviewed the county council in regard to obtaining a grant but were unsuccessful.

The time limit was almost reached when Dr. Sinclair turned his efforts in another direction he believed that if the women of the Institute, for whose brain-power and energy he had the greatest admiration, could be made to see the need as he saw it, they would accomplish what mere men could not. He asked his wife as a member of the Institute to put the matter before the women. She did so, Miss Rowand and her associates became enthusiastic, appointed a deputation to interview the county council and succeed where the men had utterly failed. To them is largely due the credit of establishing the hospital here.

Dr. Sinclair and his own family have felt the benefit of the hospital, as have many others, and as still others will feel it. We are more than fortunate to have such an institution at our very doors.

Jocelin's Penance

"Well, well, when the bowl is broke one may not readily pick up the spilled meal. Woman's curiosity will ever prove her undoing, as it did long ago for the seven wives of the blue-bearded one. Past is past. But hark ye now, puppet, an' heed my warning. Two nights ago I drew the magic circle; called Uriel, Gabriel, Raphael and Michael, to guard its quarters (for I'd writ thy name therein, an' wished thee well), that no evil influence should fall upon thee; but spite o' my charms, Uriel's blue flame paled, and the black shadow crept o'er the border. Outside my hut a ban-dog howled, and Paddock, my chitty toad, crept closer 'neath my gown. Then, by the pentagon, an' by the magic words, I summoned Asmodeus, my familiar; and that sweet fiend and I did converse heavily on thee till cock-crow. Heed, heed, Rohese, heed—

"Beware ye of a black, black robe,
Beware ye of a curled pate.
By all the power of dark Hecate,
Return ye home ere 'tis too late.

"Twice hath my black grimalkin mewed,
Twice wilt thou be assailed.
Death and shame shall hover o'er,
With tears thy cheek be paled.

Heed ye—now the witch's word,
Heed thee now this warning—
'Ware of the robe and tonsured head,
Beware this very morning."

Half chanting the doggerel the witch of Ely passed from the room, and vanished; as quickly and silently as a drop of dew in the sunshine. Rohese sprang from her bed, and rushed to Mary's door. The girl was soon roused and the two sat side by side on the little tirewoman's couch wrapped in its covers, and talking excitedly of the queer incident, their teeth chattering with the autumn chill. Mary was first to recover herself, and exercising loving tyranny, sent Rohese back to bed while she dressed, and after bustling about kindling a fire in the brazier, assisted her lady to robe.

As Rohese breakfasted, a message came from the Abbot—"Stay thou fast within the Gate chamber, keeping it close locked." Rohese pouted, for she wished much to speak with the Abbot regarding the warning of Dame Bernice. But, mindful of her late disobedience, and its consequences, through the day she and Mary busied themselves over their 'broidery frames or the maid listened while the lady read aloud from the "Lives of the Saints," bound in quaint wooden covers bossed with silver. Toward evening they had the excitement of watching the royal visitors depart, and, hidden behind the curtain, saw the Queen's horse-litter move off, followed by the Prince and his two friends on horseback, who nodded but a surly farewell to the Abbot, hospitably standing in the doorway to see his guests depart. The Advocates and their friends withdrew; the gates were shut and locked, the troop of soldiers, hitherto disguised as servitors, departed to their quarters. Just before vespers Rohese sent Mistress Mary with a message to Abbot Samson, desiring an audience, and when she had returned with his permission, Rohese arrayed herself for the interview, murmuring half to herself, as Mary combed her amber locks and bound them with fillets of gold: "At least one part of the witch's warning cannot come true; and she herself said, 'past is past'. No need to 'ware a black robe now." But the witch erred not; had Rohese gone in the morning to the Abbot's parlor she would not have had the meeting which proved the undoing of both herself and Jocelin.

CHAPTER XVI.

Vespers over and the tapers lit, Rohese descended to the Abbot's parlor, where she sat waiting his return from the chapel. She was a little pale, for the past excitement told upon her. Besides, the witch's "Ware the black robe" kept sounding in her ears. So her state of mind was very disturbing, and her most disquieting thoughts were of Jocelin. She was beginning to believe that the handsome monk felt more warmly toward her than was compatible with his vows; and while her girlish vanity was flattered, she was annoyed; for though she was interested in Jocelin (with a far different feeling from the tender regard in which she held the memory of Henry of Leicester), she was repelled at the thought that a monk loved her.

How does a woman know a man loves her? The day of realistic novels has forever banished from romances the fallacy that she, palpitating with surprised modesty, knows it for the first time when told. Nay, should the good old fashion of wooing change, and man, never uttering the dulcet speech of courtship, simply say, "Marry me," the eternal feminine would continue blushing consciously when the mate-to-be came near, and would go to the altar without one love-word, needing no passionate phrases to tell what she had long since found out by instinct.

As Rohese sat leaning her head against the purple of the Abbot's chair, the object of her cogitation passed the doorway, glancing neither to right or left. He looked so wan and despairing that all her woman's heart went out to him, and she murmured his name almost unconsciously. Surely he could not have heard it! Rohese shrank back into the chair, chiding herself for giving way to impulse, but if the eyes of Love are blind, his ear is never closed to the Beloved's voice; and Jocelin, already past the door, stopped, paused and turning, walked straight into the room and up to her. "I felt something draw me hither," he said simply.

"Nay, sir monk, thy fasting hath sent vapors into thy head," Rohese said, lightly, trying to gain time, and entrenching herself behind coquetry, as foolish little fish hide among the reeds of a pond; their gold and silver but showing the brighter against the dark background. Jocelin was in no mood for trifling.

"Lady Rohese," he demanded, "hast thought of me since coming hither?"

"There are many monks here, brother, and as one black gown is like another, is it not likely that sight of them would bring thee to mind?" "Yea" (petulantly), "in my dreams I have seen whole processions of thee, by Our Lady! clambering up a rock way; with wan faces and eyes that burn into my very soul.

"And so thou dost think of me? Ah, methinks thy dreaming is but an echo of the sweet fantasies which beset my sleep. Listen, Rohese, I, too, in dreams have trod with blood-stained feet a pathway thick strewn with briars and stones; but far, far up on the heights a tress of gold hair gleamed, and an angel face smiled down on me. 'Twas thou, Rohese, 'twas thou who stood there, with alabaster hands outstretched to welcome me. Thy voice's sweetest music breathed my all unworthy name, and straight I gained to where thou stood'st, and weary, bleeding laid me at thy feet. Then thou didst bend compassionately over me; and thy gleaming tresses shut us from the world. Ah, blood of saints, beloved! Then sounded a strain of music faintly, clear as trills the thrush in the dewy hush of the morning. It died away, slowly, slowly, whilst all the while thy golden hair wrapped us round; and I awoke with echoings lingering in my heart. Ah, what an ecstasy it brought! An ecstasy that was such exquisite pain that I knelt on my pallaise in the dark and cold to pray that melody would never again ravish me. Is't not true love which brings such dreams?"

Jocelin breathed fast as one who had run far, and Rohese trembled at the passion throbbing in his words. Something stirred within her, new and strange, which she had never known before. What warm rush and tingle of delight was this which swept over her, at sound of this man's compelling voice? What sweet, soft languor stealing through every vein, as he clasped her hand and bent his appealing face so near that the breath from his beautiful parted lips trembled on her cheek like a caress? What witchery lay there in that all conquering glance, which seemed drawing her very soul through her eyes to mingle with his?

"Rohese, Rohese," he cried, "lovest thou me?" But the maid still had will enough to try to draw away from him; averting her flushed face, with a frightened "No, no, no!" But Jocelin did not loose his hold on her struggling hands, but turned them upward and kissed each pink palm, once, twice, with long, soft kisses warm as sunshine. They thrilled her through and through, like a draught of some rare elixir.

"Thine eyes are filled with tears, Rohese, yet thou say'st 'No, no.' What lieth within thine eyes 'behind those tears? Thou darest not look me in the face! Say no again, sweet scarlet lips, for those glorious eyes declare thee darling traitors!" he murmured, rapturously, triumphantly. His warm breath stirred the ringlets on her brow; his hot lips lay upon its cool whiteness like a flame.

"Thy lips, thy lips, sweet witch!" he cried, hoarsely. "'Twere crime to force their virgin rose; yet by the twelve Evangels, they tempt me sorely! Thy lips, thou regent of my soul!" As a serpent holds a fluttering bird within its potent gaze, so held the frightened maid. His bright eyes wooing, wooing, seemed impelling her to yield. Just then a bell rang, clearly, softly, far within the palace; it seemed to break the spell. Rohese arose, pushing him from her with all her strength.

"Nay, nay," she cried, with a look of terror, "a monk, a monk! Bethink thee, Jocelin, what hath a monk to do with love?" Jocelin paled, though he did not answer her, but stretched his arms to her pleadingly, tenderly, and advanced as if to fold her in their embrace. While she paused undecided, half inclined to fly, yet, glancing at him with veiled eyes which shone like stars, the corridor outside resounded with a firm and heavy tread, and the deep tones of Abbot Samson sounded through the parlor:

"Let Jocelin await me in my bed-chamber, Brother Walter; I'll to my ward within here, and then to rest. The hour grows late, and there is much to be written, so apprise him straightway. Good-night, Our Lady's benison on thee."

Jocelin and Rohese started guiltily apart. She pointed to a side door, and he slowly withdrew with ardent, backward glances, and Rohese, her hands pressed upon her breast, went to the window and stood looking into the night with eyes which saw not, and bosom which rose and fell tumultuously. Yet when she turned to salute the Abbot, and he commented on her flushed cheeks, she answered composedly, "Thy parlor is o'erwarm, Father, and in sooth, my head aches drearily. But thou hast other matters, as I heard thee tell Brother Walter. I'll set my mouthings by till morning. It was but of a visit from Dame Bernice I came to speak."

"Thou art thoughtful like thy mother, girl, and I'll accept thy gentle little sacrifice, and hear thee on the morrow;" and with a blessing and a kiss upon her forehead, Samson dismissed her, and Rohese, guiltily thinking that he must feel the other kiss which so lately rested there, flew upward to the Gate chamber, where Mistress Mary sat demurely by a taper, sewing a long white seam, as though she, too, had not just raced thither from the corridor outside the parlor, where she had, with palpitating delight, spied upon the monk's love-making. But Rohese, in her own confusion, noticed nothing, and anxious to be alone, bade the girl haste to bring her nightrail and make her ready for bed. For a wonder, Mary made no comment on this early retiring, though she smiled knowingly to herself.

Rohese abed, the tirewoman withdrew and quiet and darkness reigned, save for the faint glow cast athwart the gate chamber by the coals glowing in their brazier.

CHAPTER XVII.

Entering the Abbot's chamber, Jocelin found that he had exchanged his richly jeweled dress for a white serge robe such as novices wear, and reclined on his couch, with eyes filled with unutterable weariness, fixed upon space, as if trying to fix the future. Beset by many other cares, this attempt of the prince to seize the dower and person of Rohese disquieted him much.

Though he had come into the high estate of Abbot inexperienced in governing, and little learned in the custom of courts had been set to preside over one, he had within him which, antagonistic to disorder and disobedience, overruled both. His early military training and studious anchoretic life had strengthened every mental fibre, and he was one who by obeying had learned to rule; who by self-restraint had learned to govern others. While within his stern true heart he had a "Courage to quell the proud-est; an honest pity to encourage the humblest." Within the Abbey, there had been debts and disorders to fight; without rebellious subjects and wily Advocates who must be ruled with an iron but velvet-gloved hand. The incoming of the one hundred and fifty monks from Normandy infusing new life into the Abbey had greatly helped in its upbuilding, and in less than two-years every bond had been paid. Bailiffs, sockmen and townsfolk raised their allotted portion of the Abbey's revenues; the repelliser came pouring in again in a small but steady stream; and woe betide the false, remiss or unjust subject, for the new Abbot, though generally slow to anger, was terrible in rage, and many a discomfited vassal murmured, "He rages like a wolf"; until Samson, with grim humor, adopted the saying and adding the motto "Saevit ut lupus" to his arms, had it inscribed in letters of gold upon his standards.

The Abbot had gained another concession from the sulky Prince; and when Jocelin began writing at his dictation, his first task was a letter to Ranulf de Glanville, Justiciary in Chief, enclosing a mandate signed by John's unwilling hands, banishing the Jews from St. Edmundsbury, and pronouncing sentence of excommunication on all who should harbor them. The next letter was to my Lord of Clare, denying an unjust claim of fees for bearing the banner of St. Edmund in war; which Bigot had set forth while attending on the Abbot.

"Write, son Jocelin, 'Earl Roger Bigot asserts himself duly seized, and by such seizing holds this office from the time we fought the Flemmings ('Ebue, 'tis a weary while since then); also Thomas de Midham sayeth the right is his; so my Lord, when thou hast made out one with the other that the right is truly thine, come then and claim the fee, which shall be paid thee from the time of King Edmund's charter.'" So on and on the Abbot dictated, and the secretary wrote, far into the night. Letters to Pope's Legates and King's Viscounts, ending with a lengthy epistle to the Archbishop of Canterbury on certain weighty matters of Church and State. These duly sealed and laid in a sandal-wood cabinet, the Abbot closed his eyes and pressed his hand to his brow, as if the print of the latter was there, sighing wearily, as at his "Satis," Jocelin arose to set away the writing materials.

"Thou sighest, Dominie," said the secretary.

"Yea, is it a wonder? My son, thou and thy brethren share our plenty and prosperity; but little thinking of the giant task it was to bring things so; or the cares concerning the management of our house and family, and all the other business which harrows my tired mind. Those three sleek leopards just gone are plotting usurpation, if I mistake not, and I travail sore for the safety of my ward, whose fair person hath awakend in them the lust of the body, whilst her dower hath kindled that more dangerous lust, the lust of gold. If it were so I could be present at court, I could hold them somewhat in check, but God wot what they'll now be hatching once my back is turned. Alas, my child, man never knows when he is blest, or realizes his happiness ere it is flown. Were I a monk again, with but five marcs in my pouch, I'd to the schools, or as keeper of the books, live at peace far happier than I am as Abbot and Lord."

"Who can believe such thing, my Lord!" exclaimed Jocelin, but the Abbot smiled sadly, turning on his pillow, like one weary of the world, and as Jocelin extinguished the tapers and withdrew, he blessed him and gently bade him "Good-night."

"A good night!" Jocelin repeated to himself, as he went out into the dark. "Ah, Mary mother, will there ever be good nights for me again? By my troth, I hope there is naught writ amiss in those letters, for I had but one word singing in mine ears the while I wrote—'Rohese, Rohese,' and the feel of a soft, warm hand resting in mine own; until I cracked my Lord's gold pen-staff by my tight holding. God's love! 'Twas Paradise! A man might easily risk all earth and heaven to rest his lips upon the dewy scarlet of her mouth! Christe Eleison! 'Tis a bitter thing to be such as I; shackled to the stake of unaccursed vows, and barred from love. Dames, danger threatens my heart's anointed love, and I perforce, a coward, shaveling monk, must stand aside ignorant, unskilled and weak of arm; unable to lift even one sword, one single sword in her defence. It is not right! Am I not a man, with all a man's hopes, desires and capabilities? God is unjust, that men should live maimed, incapacitated things! Mary, intercede for me! I blaspheme! Impious monk! Wouldst thou, like Job, curse God and die. Yet God made not monks—'twas some devil's work. Christ and the Evangels walked free into the world, and Peter, when 'twas needed, drew a sword. I will not thus be buried like some mummied Pharaoh in his tomb. On the morrow I'll to the Abbot and sue for release from this monkly servitude. Then I'll get me to my uncle in Normandy (my father used to call it when he sighed—'Sweet, sweet Normandy'). There I'll prove myself a man, and with my sword and monkly lore, carve a fortune out of fate and then—and then I'll return for my Rohese!"

Wandering through the maze of corridors leading from the Abbot's room, Jocelin all unwittingly turned into the narrow hallway which led to the Gate chamber. Pondering on his fortunes, building castles in the air, all tenanted solely by Rohese and himself, Jocelin opened the door which Mary had forgotten to bar, and was astonished to find himself within the Gate chamber. His first impulse was to leave at once, but an irresistible charm hovered around the place where Rohese spent her waking hours. It held him to the spot. The tapestry, stirred by some furtive draught, rustled softly on the moonlit wall, until it seemed imbued with life, and the white-clad figure of Helen of Troy broidered on the fabric seemed leaning toward the Paris at her feet, as if she would embrace him. "I must be gone," the monk murmured, yet stayed. Ah, "Sometimes we are devils to ourselves, when we tempt the frailty of our powers, presuming on their changeful potency."

A subtle perfume hung about Rohese's carved oak chair. Jocelin knelt by its side, and buried his face in its cushions. "Rohese, Rohese," the very murmur of the dear name as it fell from his lips, filled him with an exquisite pleasure that was half pain. As he knelt there, he thought of her lying on her bed; all her glittering hair spread out—Ah, sweet, like a golden net to catch men's souls in, whilst thou slumberest. Dear tyrant, have mercy; for thou hast my soul already fast. Oh, blossom of my heart!" the young monk cried brokenly, tears of love and longing stealing down his cheek, as he arose to tear himself from such a sweetly dangerous place.

The Hollow in a Boiled Egg.

There is an air space in every egg, but we notice it particularly in a boiled one because the contents have been made solid by cooking and made the hollow space more apparent. This space is a provision of nature so that the chick which grows within the shell may have air to breathe from the time it comes to life until it becomes strong enough to break through the shell to the outside world.

To generate life in the egg it is necessary that it be subjected to a certain degree of heat for a period of twenty-one days. When this is not done the egg remains indefinitely in its raw state.

When it is boiled the pocket of air within the shell, which would have been used up by the chick if the egg had been set to hatch, begins to fight for its space and pushes the boiled contents of the egg back, leaving the hollow space.—Rocky Mountain News.

Cornmeal for the Feet.

Men as well as women are finding cornmeal very beneficial to aching and sore feet. Simply soak the feet in warm water into which a handful of meal has been thrown, and the meal when rubbed over the feet opens up the pores in such a manner as to stop the very disagreeable annoyance of painful feet. It is far superior to salt baths for the feet.—Philadelphia North American.

CURIOUS FERRYBOATS.

Crossing the River at Simla is a Comical Performance.

Perhaps the most curious ferryboat to be found in the world is at Simla. The river that flows to the northeast of Suni, the chief town of the Simla hill states, has few bridges, so, necessity being the mother of invention a novel method has been adopted.

The skin of a buffalo is inflated with air and is placed, with the four feet upward, to float in the water. The owner then throws himself over it and the one or two passengers sit or lean on the top of him. By means of a small paddle in his right hand and the movement to and fro of his legs in the water the owner takes his passengers across.

The journey takes from three to five minutes, and the modest sum of a pice (one-half cent) is charged. It is only by repeated crossings in a day that a man can earn much, but so many natives use this means of going to and from their villages that the trade is not unremunerative.

Few things are more comical than these mussucks, whether moving in midstream or being carried back to the village at night on the owner's back. They are, of course, very light and are about two and a half yards long.

They seem to be safe, except in monsoon weather, when heavy rain has caused a rapid current, but at such a time two mussucks are often linked together, so that, being heavier, they can avoid the rocks.—London Strand Magazine.

A NOBLE EXAMPLE

The excellent patriotic work of the File Indians at Balcarres, Sask., continues, and the Canadian Pacific, through Mr. W. E. Baker, the Secretary of the Company, has received another encouraging report. It was in October last year that thirty-three of these redskins subscribed $402.10 to the Patriotic Fund, each farmer giving a certain number of bushels of grain, which when sold amounted to the above sum. During the winter that followed, the now famous File Indian Brass Band gave concerts thereby raising another [illegible], which went to the Belgian Relief Fund, and since March 11 the Red Cross Branch of this colony has raised [illegible] and endowed a bed in Clivedon Hospital. The young Indian women have done a great deal of knitting and sewing. The branch has a membership of 26, while there are only one hundred and sixty souls—fifty-eight men, twenty-six women and ninety-six children—in the colony. The patriotism of these Indians does not stop there. Two young men went to the front with the second contingent and six more are going with the next. The File Indians lay claim to having the oldest Red Cross Society member in the British Empire in the person of Pointed Cap. This celebrated character says that he is the fine old age of 107, and on November 12th next will attain his 108th year. He is now an "associate member" of the Red Cross, and proudly wears on his heart the little red cross, the emblem of the society. It is quite possible that in addition to the six latest recruits for the front, older members of the colony will go, as one man who is the father of nine children has expressed his intention of so doing, and his wife says "I will not stop him." Despite the fact that a hailstorm last month destroyed all the crops in the colony, the File Indians are not downhearted, and have made arrangements to continue their good work during the coming winter months to aid the boys across the sea, thus showing a patriotism worthy of a king.

It doesn't do a hungry man much good to swallow his pride.

DOPPLER'S LAW OF LIGHT.

It Proves That Our Solar System is Whirling Northward.

The fact that our solar system is traveling northward at a rate of twelve miles per second has been determined by means of one of the most remarkable laws in the entire history of science, Doppler's law of light. Stand by a railway track and listen to a rapid train approaching. As it approaches the bell or whistle will increase the pitch of its sound and instantly lower the pitch of tone after it passes and recedes. When coming more waves enter the ear and less when it is departing.

Light consists of the action of waves on the retina of the eye. Our earth and sun, all bodies in the solar system, are moving to a point in the celestial vault not far from the star Vega, in the constellation Lyra, and, of course, receding from the opposite point of the sky. Waves entering the slit of the spectroscope from the northern stars are compressed—namely, more enter per second and are dispersed toward the violet end of the spectrum, less enter from the southern stars and are dispersed toward the red.

Now, exalted mathematics, based on the laws of light, determine the extent of dispersion of waves toward the red or violet for each decrease or increase of motion of light emitting bodies, and the amount actually found by experiment confirmed the mathematical formulas—a proof that modern mind is expressing at a very exalted rate.—Edgar Lucien Larkin, in New York American.

No Late Visitors.

A successful business man was showing a friend round his new house.

"It's a fine place," was the comment, "but what on earth made you settle down so far from the city?"

"The last train leaves our station here at half-past ten," replied the host emphatically.

"I believe that; but what has it to do with you?"

"My dear fellow, just wait till you see my two pretty daughters."

Clews to His Writing.

Sometimes the worst of handwriting becomes intelligible when one grasps the rules, for a man's script—particularly an author's—is frequently made difficult, chiefly by his deliberate or unconscious inversion of the accepted rules of caligraphy. Henry Ward Beecher had a daughter who acted as typist, and she read him with ease simply by remembering three principles—that in her father's manuscript no dotted letter was meant for an "i," no crossed letter stood for "t" and that no capital letter ever began a sentence.

Signatures and Signs.

Walter Crane's signature—a crane impaled on a W—reminds us that other English artists have adopted queer "beasties" to form their signature. There was Richard Doyle, for instance, who among his friends and in his signature pretended only to be "Dicky," for you will find in the corner of many of his Punch drawings a "D" with a very perky-looking bird standing thereon. But Whistler's was the most famous, though somewhat incongruous. His sign manual often took the shape of a butterfly, though a wasp would have expressed him better, for he was not only an artist, but the author of "The Gentle Art of Making Enemies." And there are many whimsical envelopes from Prof. Blackie with the Greek motto meaning "Tell the truth in love."—London Spectator.

EDITORIAL

THURSDAY SEPT. 30, 1915.

FOR PARTY FIRST.

Although Sir Robert Borden has had nothing to say publicly for months about an election, his newspaper mouthpiece, the Toronto News, has for months back been daily declaring that there must either be an election or an extension of life of Parliament for some time after the war is over—presumably two or three years, and it throws the responsibility on the Liberals. It might be time enough to do that when Sir Robert makes the proposition. But now word comes from Ottawa that an election will likely be sprung on the country within the next three or four months. The Hon. Robert Rogers and his gang are afraid that the longer the Government remains in power the less chance it will have of re-election. The Manitoba scandal and defeat have been followed by what is practically a defeat in Prince Edward Island, and there is every reason to believe that Sir Richard McBride's Government in British Columbia will have to walk the plank at the next election. Canada is rapidly getting rid of its Tory Provincial Governments, and Rogers would rather take a gambler's chance now than wait longer with sure defeat staring him in the face.

The interests of the country, of course, do not figure in their calculations. Tories do not care how these may suffer, or how the efforts of the Dominion to prosecute the war may be hindered, they would rather fight for party advantage than for the allies. It looks as if Borden has succumbed to Rogers, and that the Government will demand either a new election or an extension of its power for some years after the war is over. It can have the extension until the war is over. But we have no idea that the Liberal party will give it a much longer extension.

Lord Reading, the head of the delegation which has come over from Europe for the purpose of raising a loan in the United States, is perhaps better known to the world as Rufus Isaacs. He is the first Jew who has attained to the dignity of Lord Chief Justice of England, and he possesses most of the genius of his race. As a boy he ran away to sea, on board the Blair Athol. Finding the realities of life before the mast less engaging than his fancy had painted them, he deserted at Rio Janeiro. He was, however, captured, and compelled to complete the voyage to Calcutta. After a sojourn in Germany he ate his dinners in the Temple, and in due time became a law officer of the Crown, and member of Parliament for the great biscuit city on the Thames, from whose name his title is taken. The Jew has no disabilities in Britain.

March was [illegible] degrees above the average, and April 6.0 degrees above, making it the warmest month relatively on record, while May was 2.0 degrees below, June 2.7 degrees, and July 1.1 degrees below their normals. The bulletin does not cover any of the present month, but it may be taken for granted that it is the warmest September that has been for many years. When the cotton factory was being built on Sherman avenue many years ago the heat was so intense in one September month that the bricklayers had to lay off one day, and they are a class of workmen who seldom stop work for the heat.

Many Troubles Arise From Wrong Action Of The Liver.

Unless the liver is working properly you may look forward to a great many troubles arising such as biliousness, constipation, heartburn, the rising and souring of food which leaves a nasty taste in the mouth, sick headache, jaundice, etc.

Wooed By a Pauper

"No, mamma," said the girl, stung into irony. "He neither whispers nor shouts in particular, but talks as a sensible young man should; and, in fact, he shows as plainly as a young man can do that Stella Newton is no more to him than the daughter of the man in the moon."

She threw the unfortunate pug with a suddenness highly detrimental to his health to the wolfskin hearth rug and arose to her full height.

Very beautiful she looked as she stood, half-fronting her match-making mamma, a faint flush on her clear olive cheek, a sparkle of defiance and satire in her full eyes.

"Then, my dear, it behooves you to be extremely careful. If Lord Marmion is not already in love with you, it's time he was."

"Why?" asked the girl, turning to confront her mother. "I am not in love with him."

"My dear Stella," exclaimed Mrs. Newton, much shocked. "Not in love with Lord Marmion? You should not speak so loud. Lord Marmion has thirty thousand a year, and his peerage dates back with the [illegible]."

"Is that any reason why I should love him or become the future Countess of Marmion?" asked the girl, straight and resolute as a dart. "Mamma, you trouble me more than I can say by the constant reference to the subject. Lord Marmion has never said one word more than ordinary friendship would warrant. If Lord Marmion's title dated back as far as Adam's tenancy of Eden, and possessed the Golconda mines, I would not marry him! No, though he is young, handsome and honorable, I would rather than sell myself to the highest bidder marry the first passer-by—ay, even that man on the other side of the road."

In her energy she raised her long, slender hand, and, to emphasize her declaration, pointed to an individual who was passing at that moment, as she said, on the other side of the way.

As it was no doubt decreed, the individual so plainly indicated happened to raise his eyes, and in doing so caught the sense of the outstretched finger, pulled up in his long striding walk, and stared at the exquisite picture which the girl made, painted, as it were, on the satin-curtained window.

She saw him stop, and she looked more intently. Their eyes met, and on the heart of each was impressed the memory of a face which death alone could efface.

What the man saw was a girl in the exquisite freshness of her wondrous beauty, standing in the attitude which the righteous indignation had inspired, and which a painter might have gloried in. What she saw was the stalwart figure of a man also in the bloom of youth, but with something of its freshness gone. She saw a face satirical yet delicate, two soft, dark, yet searching eyes, a brow chiseled faintly with the lines of thought or intellect, and a mouth as delicately and softly moulded as an Italian's.

She took all this in at a glance—even more, noticed that the figure was carelessly dressed in a loose, well-worn, black velvet jacket, and that it was crowned by a soft, foreign-looking hat.

There was no time for more; the minute had passed, the stranger had discovered that the pointed forefinger was not intended as a signal for him, and, with a droop of the handsome head, has gone on his way.

Infinitely wonderful is the human heart. At that moment flashed through the soul of the beautiful girl one distinct, softly fleeting regret: she might never see that face again!

She knew the fire had died out of her eyes, her body was lithe and languid, and she listened to a wordy remonstrance of her mother's in almost abstracted silence. At last Stella arose, wearied, disgusted with the subject.

"Must I not dress now?" she asked. "Have we not a dinner party to-night?"

"Of course. Have you forgotten it?" said Mrs. Newton. "How forgetful you are, my dear Stella. Lord Marmion dines with us to-night, and brings that clever Sir Richard Wildfang with him."

"Does he?" said the girl, indifferently, as with a slow, graceful step she left the room.

The dining-room of Mrs. Newton's house in Hyde Park Corner was filled with the soft light of a hundred wax candles; the fire streamed a rosy tint upon the glittering mirrors, the tapestried walls, the varied ornaments of bronze, marble and gold. All was luxury, wealth and splendor.

It was a quarter to eight. The guests were due.

In the drawing-room, as magnificent an apartment as the dining-room, was seated the mistress.

Pride of the wrong sort was on her face, proclaimed itself in the carriage of her thin, acute face. She glanced at the clock with a frown of annoyance.

Stella had not made her appearance yet. Lord Marmion and his friend might arrive at any moment, and the beautiful daughter would not be there to receive them.

The rattle of a carriage, muffled by the snow, a knock; the guests had arrived.

"My dear Mrs. Newton, how do you do? May I introduce Sir Richard Wildfang?"

The match-making mother courtesied low and with empressement to the richest and most influential man in London.

Talking as they went they took up their position by the fire.

Lord Marmion's tongue rattled on.

He glanced at the worldly mother, and, so to speak, smiled in his sleeve.

The game was really too easy, the prey too feeble. He saw his road to success plain and facile before him: he saw—

The door opened, and some one glided in.

It was Stella.

[illegible] Richard turned and met her [illegible] shrink with an expression [illegible] fear? [illegible] themselves for an abode.

One of them [illegible] in a street near Soho Square, and [illegible] throws a garish glare into the window of a first-floor room, which overlooked—not the pleasant freshness of the earth—but a row of other rooms in houses dingy and ugly as its own.

Let us ascend the narrow, ill-lighted stairs, and enter that room.

A strange room to one entering as a stranger, an astonishing one.

The four walls are painted [illegible], and devoid of ornament.

The floor is bare, and, in place of carpet, is covered here and there with the thick powder of marble and of stone.

A few articles of furniture, all plain and well worn, are crowded to one corner to make room for some other articles which evidently to the owner of the apartment are of greater importance.

These are finished statues, busts and wood-carvings in all stages of progress from rough-hewn to exquisite finish.

One, a beautiful nymph, rising from a crested wave, stands on a pedestal in the centre of the room, and so arranged that the light falls full upon that portion of the marble where the face will be when its creator calls it to it.

Before the unfinished statue stands a youth whose form might have rivaled in grace [illegible] around it.

The face is turned from the light, the hands, long, thin, and exquisitely white ones, are hard at work; the sculptor is lost in his dreamland.

Suddenly the chisel faltered in the practiced hand, the mallet was poised with indecision and doubt.

The next instant the tools dropped from the master's hands and he turned, revealing the same face which had turned inquiringly to the eyes of beautiful Stella Newton.

He pushed his soft, silky hair from his forehead, and looked up at his unfinished work.

"No use, I can do no more to-night, fair nymph; your face must wait, must wait until my disordered and troubled fancy can return to thee. What has happened to me to-day? I, Louis Felton, am usually as calm and imperturbable as my own cold marbles. In fact I am not well fed enough to have hot blood and a feverish pulse, but to-night I can feel the life blood tearing through my veins at tremendous speed, making my hand unsteady and my fancy a fickle jade that jigs to the pipe of my imagination. And wherefore? Oh, to stop me as an arrant idiot! All for a passing glance of a girl's beautiful face. Tell me, ye gods of my own creation, have I not seen many? Do I not live in the atmosphere of grace and beauty?"

And he turned with more [illegible] to his statues.

"Ah, but what beauty it was! Not like yours, Imperial Juno, though methinks there was a touch of your pride's fire in her eyes; not yours, either, wood nymph, Psyche, though the freshness of forest violet hovered on her cheek; nor yours, oh, Galatea, sea maiden, though the [illegible] brine of nature's freedom [illegible] the tresses of her hair and [illegible] the glory of her [illegible], soft brow!

"Oh, Louis! shame on thee for an idiot to rave in the presence of thy dead ideals of one living girl, beautiful though she be. What is she to thee? A vision only, in a fashionable window of a fashionable house, a note of angelic harmony resounding amid the clink of gold; a gem set in its fitting of precious silver; a rich young lady, doubtless the daughter of rich parents, who would shudder to their shoes if they knew that their blooming charms were being extolled, even to dead, deaf marble, by the house, so hungry, out-at-elbows sculptor Louis Felton!"

"Penniless! Scarcely that, I have an estate! Ha! ha!" And he laughed a mocking, ironical laugh. "An estate of phantom acres, with an old house that would tumble about my ears, so they tell me, if I called my name aloud in it. The sole remnant of a great house and an old name. By Heaven! I am not penniless, I am Louis Felton, Lord of Heavithorne, squire of half a county which knows nothing of him and cares less. Yes, I am a great man—if I but knew it—though I earn my living by carving from pitiless marble some poor mockeries of my daydreams that but yield me enough to find food and water to sustain this thin and unsubstantial body on."

He struck himself on the chest as he spoke and laughed again, and though it was a trifle sad it was a pleasant laugh to hear.

"That being so," he continued, "what right had you, poor Louis Felton, to glow into ecstasy over the good gifts of a wealthy heiress—we'll say she's an heiress, just for argument's sake, and to make matters [illegible]? Why, every right, the right that pointed forefinger gave me, for she was pointing at me, I'll be sworn. What was she saying? 'Look at that poor man, how tired, how seedy and how disreputable he looks, and that pitifully!'

"No; when I saw her face there were fire, righteous indignation, passionate dignity in it—no pity! Why, did she point? Bah! Let me to work. Now, nymph, fancy has returned, and I am ready to carve thee a face, a mouth and a pair of eyes, but of what sort?

"My Heaven!" he exclaimed, flushing a bright red and snatching up the mallet, "thou shalt have the face of my beautiful lady. Thou shalt have her eyes, her small lips, her proud brow, and when thou art done, I, Louis Felton, master of tumbledown Heavithorne, miserable sculptor, half starving solitaire, will point at thee [illegible] as the original [illegible]! Come, oh powerful mallet, now for her hair!"

CHAPTER IV.

As Christmas draws nearer, the joyousness of [illegible] before it, and the [illegible] still honors London by its presence and yet intends keeping [illegible] down at its country mansions [illegible] preliminary [illegible] for balls and [illegible]

On this night [illegible] Christmas [illegible] Countess of [illegible] Marmion's mother, [illegible] was crowding the [illegible]

The countess herself was a grand specimen of the haute noblesse, tall, [illegible] but wonderfully graciously [illegible] with clear-cut features and [illegible] blue eyes.

[illegible] Marmion, the darling of [illegible] resembled her. He had the same blue eyes, with an extra touch of frankness in them, the same clearly cut nose, but not quite so resolute a chin.

He was standing beside his mother, helping her in her duties.

Most of the guests had arrived—one not initiated in the mysteries of ball room space would say that there was room for no more—but, crowded as the salon was, all the guests had not yet fulfilled their promises, and the countess, as a waltz was started, said to her son:

"Ernest, I do not see your favorite, Miss Newton."

"Nor I. I do not know what makes them so late," he returned. "Mrs. Newton is generally punctual. Wildfang is not here either, and he, being a business man ought to be punctual. Ah! here is some one," he added, as the servants were seen clearing away from the door, and the next instant the proud face of Mrs. Newton appeared above the heads of the crowd, and in another the beautiful one of sweet Stella.

The countess went forward to meet them, and welcomed them most cordially.

She did not like Mrs. Newton; she read her character too clearly—but her son, her darling son, had taken one of his wild fancies, and she must humour it.

If she did not like the mother, she was attracted by the daughter—and no wonder, for Stella was looking more beautiful than ever that night, and, as she raised her eyes, which had a lingering, wistful light in their great depths, the countess pressed her hand more than cordially.

"I am so glad you have come. My son told me that you would be here an hour ago."

"And we should have been," said Mrs. Newton, "but my daughter had a troublesome headache."

"I am sorry," said the countess. "Is it better?"

"Oh, yes," said Stella, hurriedly, and with a faint laugh. "It has quite gone. It was nothing to speak of."

"I'm glad of that," said Lord Marmion, and as Stella raised her eyes and looked at him with a frank and friendly smile, the countess felt relieved.

She need not fear for her son. There was nothing but friendship between him and the beautiful girl, and her ladyship knew that there never would be anything more, for love for such women as Stella Newton comes at first sight or never.

"Have you saved me a dance?" said Lord Marmion, examining Miss Newton's tablets with eagerness, as he passed her half an hour later, and during the pause.

"Yes; there is one more," she replied [illegible].

"Then grant me the happiness of having them with his lordship," said a low, soft voice behind her. She started, turned almost pale, and as she looked around edged slightly away.

She knew the voice.

It was that of Sir Richard Wildfang.

"Oh, Sir Richard, here at last," said Lord Marmion. "Have you seen my mother? She was at the end of the room a moment ago."

"Yes," said Sir Richard, "and I came from her with a message for you. You are to dance with Lady Pauline Margelles."

Lord Marmion went off like an obedient son, and Sir Richard offered his arm to Miss Newton.

Stella had not spoken yet, for she had given him her hand to shake in silence.

In the presence [illegible] generally greeted Sir Richard, for Stella, usually so self-possessed with every one, was always strangely moved when the great Sir Richard approached her.

She hoped he did not notice it, and [illegible]

"You are late, Sir Richard, are you not?" she said, without looking at him.

"Yes," he said, glancing down at her and then around the room with an air of proprietorship which she was conscious of and yet could not resent. "Pleasure must wait on business for me, Miss Newton.

"But I am glad I came when I did, or that other dance, the last on your list, would have gone, and the pleasantest part of the evening would have been lost to me."

"I thought business men never paid compliments," she retorted, trying to treat her ease with him.

"Only very seldom; when they do, be assured the compliment is something greater than is usual. But what is the dance?" he said, taking the tablets from her unresisting hand. "A quadrille and a waltz. I may have the waltz?"

She looked up with a faint flush of [illegible] then looked down quickly, [illegible] for she was about to tell a falsehood.

"I promised the waltz to Lord Marmion."

He raised his eyebrows regretfully.

"Then I must be satisfied with the quadrille. Shall we walk to a less crowded part of the room?"

She inclined her head, and they join the [illegible] of promenaders.

"This is, I suppose, the countess' last ball before Christmas?"

"Yes," replied Stella. "The last, I believe. They are going to Dare Hall to spend Christmas."

"And which is the country is the place for holiday festivities. Do you leave London?"

"Yes," she said, and she could not suppress a sigh of relief. "Mamma has made up her mind to spend Christmas at the Vale."

"Indeed!" said Sir Richard, with a smile of pleasure and satisfaction, as if he had heard of it for the first time. "That is fortunate for me."

"Why?" she asked, with a dim foreboding.

"Miss Newton," said a voice at her elbow, "I have been looking everywhere for you. This dance is mine, I think," and her partner for the Lancers carried her off, and with a bow to Sir Richard before he could reply.

Sir Richard was not a dancing man, [illegible] he had made up his mind to dance only, and then with Miss Newton. He had seated himself comfortably [illegible] and watched.

The Lancers came to an end [illegible] the crowd divided into different directions, and a buzz of conversation and laughter took the [illegible]

[illegible] Newton entered it and smiled, [illegible] the laughter shot out from [illegible] her face. Her [illegible]

"Is it the quadrille?" she exclaimed, glancing at her programme. "How long a list it is! I am so hot, too. Will you excuse me this?"

SUNDAY SCHOOL LESSON

Lesson I. October 3, 1915.

Elijah in Naboth's Vineyard.—1 Kings, 21: 1-29.

Commentary.—I. The plot against Naboth (vs. 1-10). 1-4. Ahab's capital was at Samaria, but he had a beautiful palace at Jezreel, in which he delighted. He lacked ground for a garden, and he greatly desired to possess a vineyard close by belonging to Naboth. There was no wrong in Ahab's wish to secure the desirable piece of property, which lay close to his palace at Jezreel, provided he had no purpose of resorting to unjust means to obtain it. Naboth was justified in withholding the vineyard from Ahab, because "the permanent sale of the paternal inheritance was forbidden by law (Lev. 25: 23-28; Num. 36: 7-9), and it would seem like a denial of his allegiance to the true religion to sell it when the jubilee restoration was neglected in these idolatrous times." It is an unfavorable view that we get of Ahab as we see him sulking in his bed-chamber because his wish is not granted. His conduct reminds us of that of a peevish, pampered child.

5-10. In telling his trouble to Jezebel he handed his case over to a resourceful, conscienceless, cruel woman, who would hesitate at no iniquity if only she might accomplish her end. Jezebel appeared to hurl contempt at Ahab's weakness. In her view it was unreasonable for him, a king to hesitate to appropriate Naboth vineyard if he wanted it. She might have said, Is Naboth King or are you? Cheer up, take to appropriate Naboth's vineyard for you." To the reproach of Israel, it must be said that Jezebel was the real head of the Government. She assumed royal authority, issued the murderous decree, affixed the king's seal, and Naboth was a doomed man. Ahab was no less guilty than she, for he was knowing to the transaction and was responsible for the use of his seal upon the document that meant Naboth's death. Jezebel may be appropriately classed with Herodias who caused the death of John the Baptist.

II. Naboth murdered (vs. 11-16). 11. His city—Jezreel, about twenty miles north of Samaria. The king and queen were at the latter city. elders ... nobles—Those in authority in the city. "The elders were the representatives of the Tribes dwelling in Jezreel. The nobles were leading men, socially in the city. as Jezebel had sent unto them—The letter came to the elders and nobles bearing the royal authority since the king's seal was affixed. "In giving validity to documents, names were not in those days, nor are they now in the East, signed by the hand in writing, but impressed by a seal on which the name is engraved. Hence the importance which is attached to the signet throughout the sacred books."—Kitto. 12. proclaimed a fast—The elders and nobles were carrying out Jezebel's directions. The proclamation of a fast indicated that there was cause for humiliation, either because of some calamity that had fallen upon the city or was about to fall. Jezebel did not scruple to attempt to cover her cruel perfidy with a cloak of religion. set Naboth on high—They made the case as public as possible, so that when the witnesses testified against him, indignation would be strong. 13. two men—Under the Mosaic law the testimony of two witnesses was necessary to condemn one to death. children of Belial—"Base fellows."—R.V. Belial is not a proper name. It means "worthlessness," "recklessness." The sons of Belial were ready to become just such witnesses as Jezebel's conspiracy demanded. Naboth did blaspheme God and the king—There was not the slightest proof that Naboth was guilty of blasphemy against God. As to his blaspheming the king, it was unjust to construe his refusal to the king of the vineyard, which was his ancestral possession, as either treason or blasphemy. carried him forth—According to Jewish law executions must take place "without the camp," or city (Lev. 24: 13-16). stoned him with stones—The prescribed manner of inflicting the death penalty. The two witnesses were to cast the first stones at the condemned man.

14. They sent to Jezebel—The elders and nobles had lent themselves to [illegible] wicked Jezebel to become [illegible] an immoral [illegible] their official report [illegible] other sins involved in [illegible] and murder. "The wild license of Jezebel's life, the magical fascination of her [illegible] character, became [illegible] the nation (2 Kings [illegible]) [illegible] her name lived as [illegible] all that was [illegible] to the Apocalypse it is given [illegible] [illegible] Naboth [illegible] the vineyard [illegible] to take possession [illegible] to bitterness.

III. Elijah's message to Ahab (vs. 17-29). 17. Word of the Lord came to Elijah—Although the prophet seemed to have disappeared from Jezebel's [illegible] 18. To meet Ahab—Elijah had met Ahab [illegible] at the beginning of the drought, and again at its close. [illegible] Samaria. [illegible] 19. [illegible] Ahab's repentance and humiliation [illegible] 29, this prophecy was [illegible] literally fulfilled in his son, on whom [illegible] take the throne (2 Kings [illegible]) [illegible] enemy. [illegible] regarded Elijah as one who troubled Israel (1 Kings 17 [illegible]) [illegible] messenger of God [illegible] Ahab [illegible] as he might gratify his selfish [illegible]

21-29. The prophet foretold the utter destruction of Ahab's family, and the fate of Jezebel. [illegible] was guilty of abominable idolatry, [illegible] the words of God by Elijah he came to himself sufficiently to humble himself before the Lord, and the threatened destruction was delayed for a time, but it was only delayed. The penalty must be executed. As we study the history of men and nations we are amazed at the great forbearance of God, yet we know that his judgments must fall at last.

Questions.—What request did Ahab make of Naboth? Why would it have been improper for Naboth to grant it? Where was Naboth's home? What were Ahab's feelings when his request was refused? Describe the course that Jezebel took. Of what sins was Jezebel guilty in this matter? Of what sins was Ahab guilty? How did Ahab and Elijah come to meet in Naboth's vineyard? Why did Ahab call Elijah his enemy? What penalty was pronounced upon Ahab? Upon Jezebel?

PRACTICAL SURVEY.

Topic.—A Climax Reached.

I. When Jezebel mocked Israel's God.

II. When Ahab connived at crime.

III. When Elijah appeared in Samaria.

I. When Jezebel mocked Israel's God. A more pitiful picture of national depravity could scarcely be drawn than is unfolded in this lesson. We see perjured unscrupulous magistracy, a demoralized people, a cruel and treacherous despotism, almost unparalleled in history. The tragedy here presented was opened with a fast, proclaimed ostensibly to avert from the nation the judgments of God, supposed to have been provoked by the alleged blasphemy and idolatry of Naboth. It was cruel murder in the name of law and religion, under the guise of zeal for the offended majesty of God. Jezebel was the real instigator and executor of that crime, notwithstanding she observed all legal proprieties. Treachery and murder came naturally to her. She was a woman of the most consummate subtlety, duplicity and cruelty. Naboth's death was a true martyrdom. He would not transgress the religious and statute law of Israel. Jezebel made use of the very religion she despised to bring to death the man who most faithfully exemplified it. It was mockery to God.

II. When Ahab connived at crime. The executor and guardian of law connived at the murder of a law-abiding subject. Ahab was wrong in wanting Naboth's vineyard, wrong in tempting Naboth to transgress the commandment of the Lord. His proposal showed a thorough lack of principle, a wicked contempt for God's law. It was the curse of his undisciplined desire that never had enough. The value which Naboth placed upon his inheritance which had been handed down to him, could not be estimated by any purchase price which Ahab could make or any exchange he might offer. Ahab's rebellion against God had been long and obstinate. An alien marriage, an idolatrous life, the persecution of God's prophets, disobedience in war were stepping-stones which led to the robbery and murder of Naboth, a just man who suffered shameful wrongs with righteous dignity and patience.

III. When Elijah appeared in Samaria Ahab lost no time in reaping the fruit of Jezebel's wickedness. With the sons of Belial there was no difficulty in swearing away the life of a good citizen. But for their compliance Jezebel might have been baffled. The Syrian princess whom Ahab had married was the enemy whose voice had tempted him into sin and lulled him into self-complacency, while Elijah was his truest, though sternest friend. The public manifestation of the righteous judgment of God was set forth in the appearance of Elijah, the great restorer of the law, who stood forth to avenge the death of Naboth. He performed his true function in pronouncing swift judgment on the cruel wrong. Since the day upon Carmel he had been hidden from view. His sudden appearance upon the scene filled Ahab with alarm. To him Elijah's presence was as the shadow of death. In all his former experiences he had found that the word of the Lord in the mouth of His prophet was truth. Ahab's question, "Hast thou found me?" was a self-revelation. He was undeceived in a moment by the direct words of Elijah. Ahab was brought face to face with righteousness, honor and judgment. A threefold crime was charged against him. He had provoked God to anger. He had led Israel into sin. He had sold himself to work wickedness in the sight of the Lord. The awful curse brought him to his senses and his knees. In the moment of his humiliation his remorse was sincere, his conscience aroused, his fears excited, his sense of God's justice real and his desire for pardon unfeigned. No change of heart or life followed. He did not forsake his idols nor surrender Naboth's vineyard nor abandon his self-confidence. God observed Ahab's humiliation, called Elijah's attention to it and extended His mercy in delayed judgment to encourage him to persevere until he had reached a full and sincere repentance. Exemption from personally witnessing the storms which were threatening His house was an instance of God's great condescension and mercy. The worthlessness of partial reformation was marked in the fact that judgment was suspended, but not removed.—T. R. A.

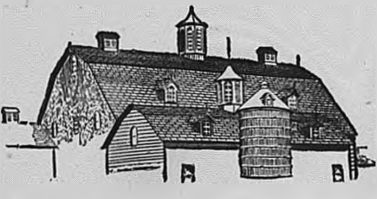
FARMERS!

Why Metallic Roofing and Shingles are not as durable as "Brantford Slates"



Brantford Asphalt Slates

For Houses and Barns

We are making colored and plain Asphalt Slates suitable for roofing any class of building, particularly farmers' buildings.

SPECIAL OFFER We are making a special offer to roof the first house or barn in your locality at about cost price and guarantee it's lifetime for ten years against leakage.

Electricians will tell you that Asphalt, from which Brantford Asphalt Shingles are made, is an excellent insulating material, and does not deteriorate when exposed to the elements, being proof against acid, salt, alkali, rust and corrosion.

Galvanized iron is subject to all these agents of destruction, as well as other enemies, viz., rust and moisture from the inside of the barn, produced by the heating of grain, moisture from cattle, etc. It is also open to attacks from the elements without, and both processes are working toward its ruin at the same time. In other words, condensation is causing the destruction of Metal Roofing and Shingles, while Asphalt Slates retain their wearing qualities indefinitely.

Therefore, Asphalt Slates are, in the end, the cheapest roofing material you can buy, and, as they are now made, the most attractive in appearance, as well as being waterproof and practically fireproof.

LOW PRICES We have succeeded in producing them at about the same price as wood shingles. Let us figure with you at once.

There is no reason why the farmers of our country should put up with leaky roofs when we have acres of material we can supply quickly, at moderate prices.

ROOF-LEAK PAINTS (In Red, Green and Black) This splendid material is especially adapted for old Shingles and Metal and Felt Roofing of all kinds. In fact, any material that will take paint, can be made to last years longer by an application. Put up in large open-mouth cans of 1, 2, 3 and 5 gallons.

EDITORIAL

In the first ten month's operations at the Dardanelles, the Australian's casualties reached fourteen thousand. Of these three thousand were killed and only three taken prisoner.

It evidently takes the German mind a long time to understand certain things. Thus it is only just beginning to recognize that Germany has under-estimated Great Britain's determination to bring the war to a successful conclusion ! The opinion is spreading that "We must be ready for further trials and difficulties." This is one thing in which the Germans are now ready.

People generally will be pleased to learn that Prof. Reithdorf, formerly German Professor in the Woodstock Baptist College, whose right to the Patriotic platform was challenged while in Huntsville and Muskoka, on the ground of his German origin, has been fully restored to public confidence. There is not the least doubt but the Professor has given valuable service, particularly in German committees.

MUCH DISCUSSED STANZA

The second stanza of the National anthem, now known as the hate stanza, over which there was so much discussion at the Anglican Synod in Toronto recently, is as follows;

"O Lord, our God, arise,
Scatter our enemies
And make them fall,
Confound their politics,
Frustrate their knavish tricks
On thee our hopes we fix,
God save us all."

ELECTION POSSIBILITIES

The British North American Act provides clearly that Parliament shall last for five years from the return of the previous election writs, unless Parliament is previously dissolved. The last writs for the general election of 1911, when voting took place on September 21st, were officially returned on October 7th, 1911. The present Parliament therefore, would come to an end by law on October 7th, 1916, but there is a provision in the law allowing two full months for the holding of an election. It is therefore quite clear that an election need not necessarily take place before December 7th, 1916

AND THIS IS WAR

Lieut. Forneret, who has returned to Hamilton from the front in relating his experience, mentions the following;

"I remember one particularly sad thing that happened after the second battle of Ypres, Major McLaren, the senior major had been wounded. He was placed in an open Ford car and taken back from the firing line. One shell evidently a small one, blew off the major's head, carried it clear of the car and the shell exploded alongside the road. The chauffeur did not know what had happened, and drove on to the hospital. He got out and opened the car door. He saw the major sitting bolt upright, but his head had been blown clean from his shoulders. The chauffeur went stark mad at the sight."

THE SEVENTY-FIRST FOR THE WINTER.

The troops for overseas service that are to remain in Canada for the winter are not to be kept in a few large centres, but are to be distributed among the smaller cities, Major-General Sir Sam Hughes, Minister of Militia, having expressed a preference for that method. The exact plan of distribution has not yet been decided on or whether the men shall be billeted or quartered together. In either case Stratford can take care of a regiment, and naturally the 71st should be the one that would come here, as Stratford has furnished the largest quota from any one place to that regiment. The city council has authorized the finance committee to send a deputation to Ottawa to endeavor to secure the location of the 71st here. This should and probably will meet the approval of every citizen, and it is to be hoped that this and other representations which may be made to the Militia Department will result in that regiment being among us during the winter.—Stratford Beacon.

FOR THE BOYS IN KHAKI

By Lt. A. E. Belcher, Hon President of His Majesty's Imperial Army & Navy Veterans

Tune; "Onward Christian Soldiers."

Onward; Valiant Soldiers,
Fighting for the right.
Hoist the flag of Britain,
Keep it well in sight,
It is clothed with glory
And will still prevail;
Representing truth and love,
It's enemies assail.
Shout the cause of Freedom
And good-will to men,
God will aid and bless you,
And bring you peace again.
Soldiers fought before you
And gained great renown,
In their fight for liberty
To preserve the Crown.
He who wears it's worthy
May his rights maintain,
Till his subjects everywhere
Are blessed with lasting gain.
Forward—be your watchword;
A victory to gain:
You will reap the great reward,
Through peril, toil and pain,
Empires now must perish.
But results will be,
For the allies and ourselves,
Decisive Victory.
Then with all rejoicing,
With thankful hearts we'll sing,
Praises through the ages
To our Heavenly King.
We are not downhearted
Marching on to war,
For we trust Our Leaders,
Who have gone before.
We do not dream of shrinking
Till the task is done,
We see the signs of triumph.
The battles' almost won.
Courage! fellow soldiers,
The strife will not last long,
Jehovah: He will conquer,
And then the Victor's Song.
Glory to the Father,
Loudest anthems raise,
Cheer! and swell your voices
In Everlasting Praise.—Amen.

Remains coming to Palmerston

A cable was received on Wednesday by Mr. Neil Wilford of Palmerston, stating that the remains of Pte Hugh Wilford of the Canadian Cyclist corps are being shipped home per Allan line steamship Scandinavian on Sept 17th.

Died Suddenly at Harriston

While paying one of his periodical visits to Harriston Wm. Chambers passed away on Monday morning at the Collison House, after an illness of two days. The deceased, who had reached his 83rd. year, was born in Scotland. In early life he was a sailor, and engaged in the Greenland whale fishing. Later he sailed the Great Lakes. Forty years ago he took up land in Minto, township, near Cotswold, which he farmed successfully until ten year ago, when he retired, and had since been living with his daughter near Goldstone. He is survived by two sons, John, in California, and Thomas, in Alberta; and one daughter, Margaret, Mrs. E. McRobb, Goldstone.—Mt. Forest Confederate.

Death of Pte. Thos. Archer

On Thursday last a message came to the Archer family from the commander at Niagara training camp that Pte. Thos. Archer was very ill, and asking that his friends take him home His brothers, Wm. A. and Albert left for Niagara on Friday, reaching there at 3 p m. only to find that the camp officials had sent him to Toronto by a boat which left there only half an hour before their arrival. His illness and subsequent death was due apparently to mental depression as he had been in a very depressed condition, for some days at camp, refusing to eat any food. After being taken to the hospital he lapsed into an unconscious condition from which he did not rally, and death occurred on Sunday night. The deceased was a son of Mrs. Archer, 12th Bruce and was 40 years of age.

The Killing Season

Alas! the season now is past to rock the frail canoe, so the man who wants to take a life must know what else to do. He need not go to Belgium, nor yet to fight the Huns, nor to the distant Dardanells to make the Turkeys run. He hardly needs to form a four, nor yet to slope his arms nor live with soldiers and hear their fierce and curdling yarns. He only needs to get a gun and go into the woods, and take a tent with a supply of dried and tin can goods. And take along a friend or two, or maybe half a score, the more you have makes it a cinch to puncture one or more. Be sure to have your fat friends there, it may help out quite a bit, for when they wander in the woods they're easy for to hit. And never think, to take a look whene'er you hear a noise, but bring your trusty shooting stick right up to firing pose. Oh never pause to have a squint; to see a human figure—but get your man along the barrell and your finger on the trigger. Then let her bang, both barrels are best, for fear the first don't kill, then leap across the underbrush, and feel the hunters thrill. If you have hit your dearest friend, and ended his career, don't let your knees start crackin' nor your soul be full of fear. They'll [illegible]bly take and lay him down in some secluded spot, and the jury will rise up [illegible] "Just accident'lly shot."

Anyone is liable to punishment who gives, sells or furnishes to a youth of eighteen, or under, any cigarette, cigarette paper or tobacco (Under Ontario Act.

Messrs Peter Robinson and Abbie Fenton have enlisted for service, and will leave for London next Saturday morning. A patriotic meeting is being held in the town hall Friday night, and likely arrangements will be made then for some presentation to these boys. Some half-a-dozen other young men of town have signified their intention of enlisting and will probably go a week from Saturday.—Southampton Beacon.

Lost Her Right Eye

Mrs. Wm. Byers, of the County line had her right-eye removed on Tuesday. About two weeks ago while running a cream Separator she knocked her eye against the machine and ruptured the eye ball. The wound was very painful and as there was no hope of saving the sight, Dr. Armstrong and Dr. Burt of Owen Sound, decided to remove the eye and the operation was successfully performed on Tuesday.—Paisley Advocate.

The Soldiers' Ballots

The ballots for soldiers at the front are in London, England, but final arrangements, so far as can be learned, have not yet been made to get a supply to every point where Canadians are in uniform. It would also be necessary for the Government to appoint six commissioners to oversee the soldiers' voting, as provided in the special legislation governing this procedure.

A New Spirit

A new spirit seems to be moving in the Church of England in Canada. The German Synod now in session is reported to be excluding the nobility from the supplication of the litany, and putting in their place all who serve mankind by learning, labor and industry. The acknowledgment that there is no nobility but in the service of mankind will probably be interpreted as an acceptance of the ideals of democracy on this continent by which the Church of England in Canada can hardly fail to increase her usefulness and power.

Stefansson Alive and Well

Glad news was received last week when word came through from the frozen fastness of the Aptic that V. Stefansson, Canada's intrepid young explorer, was alive and well and proceeding on his work. Repeated news of accidents to the party, including the sinking of the Karlek, and a deep silence regarding Stefansson's whereabouts had led to a fear that he had given up his life for the cause of exploration, but happily this is not the case. He has discovered new land lying to the north of Canada, and added it to the "red" of the worlds map.

To go to London

The London Times is quoted in a dispatch to the Toronto Globe as saying that Rev. John MacNeill, of Walmer Road Baptist Church, Toronto, would be asked to become preacher in the City Temple, London Eng., one of Britain's famous Non-Conformist churches. Rev. R. J. Campbell, the present occupant of the Temple pulpit, is now going on active service in the war, and as Rev. John MacNeill supplied for Rev. Mr. Campbell for three successive summers in recent years, it is quite probable that the call will be extended to this brilliant Bruce County man who is widely known as "one of the most prominent of the younger men of the Baptist church."

Alberta's Wheat Crop

Albertas wheat crop, which is now practically all cut, is, according to a statement of the Deputy Minister of Agriculture, the largest and best in the history of the Province, and is worth to-day nearly $70,000,000. This compares with a value of slightly more than $16,000,000 last year, the approximate 21 per cent increase being in spite of much lower prices. While Alberta is a mixed farming Province, and in a large measure owes its prosperity to this fact, more wheat has been grown this year than ever before. In some districts, even in the northern part of the Province and in the Edmonton district, farmers have devoted almost all their acreage to wheat.

Owing to the heavy rains in this vicinity it made the woodchuck habitations untenated, consequently they became an easy prey. Some of our citizens were quick to grasp the idea of using them as a staple food and reduce the high cost of living. Ever since the dawn of civilization the chuck has been esteemed in all parts of the world as one of the most appetizing and nutritious foods. Its use, however, has been somewhat restricted, owing to certain results which invariably follow its consumption It is known however that there flesh can be eaten in small quantities without any evil effects whatever., But too liberal a supply will sometimes cause a complaint known to a good many around here called teezy-weezy or goosefameness. It effects different parts of man. In some cases it causes lameness, sore back, loss of eyesight especially in one peeper. These maladies it is feared has developed among us already to a certain extent. The time of the Spanish American War, there was a regular epidemic of this complaint. It is found that to successfully combat its ravages is to use swallow oil. It is hoped that the dry weather will continue, so that the chucks will be able to bur[illegible] deep enough into the b[illegible] earth, so that our y[illegible] may not be so[illegible]

Bruce Boy Wounded

Mr. L. H. Monck received a cablegram Tuesday morning informing him that his son William, who was at the front, and wounded on June 15 is dangerously ill. Immediately after he was wounded he was taken to England and has been in the hospitals ever since. Letters received from him as late as September 8th. stated that he was doing well, and he was hoping to get well enough to go to the base and do light duty, but it would appear that his wound which was below the knee, has proved more dangerous than was supposed. An operation was performed a short time ago and some dead bones removed.—Wiarton Echo.

Bowling Club Organized

A meeting was held in the Forester's Hall last Friday evening to organize a bowling club in that village. Mr. H. Eckenswiller of Clifford was present and explained how to construct a bowling green and estimated that a splendid green could be put up here for about $150. The club was organized with the following officers,—President—Dr. Zinn: Vice Pres,—H. G. Wright, Sec-Treas,—Geo. Helwig. The committee has secured the lot next to the skating rink, and will have the same drained and fitted up for a green this fall.—Mildmay Gazette.

An Interesting Jury Case

An interesting jury case was tried at Division Court here on Tuesday with Judge Greig presiding when Dr. Campbell of Hepworth sued Charles King of Allenford for $50.00, being the amount of a note King gave for medical attendance, a part of which was the reducing of a fracture in his ankle. The leg is now crooked and King claims that the break was not properly set. Campbell said he had done the work properly and that King interfered with the bandages while lying in bed which had caused the bend in the leg. Dr. Middlebro of Owen Sound, upheld Dr. Campbell in that the loosing of the bandages would cause the leg to be in its present shape. Campbell had witnesses to prove that the bandages had been loosened. The jury gave judgement in favour of the plaintiff for the full amount and costs—Tara Leader.

The barn on lot 3, con. 11. Elderslie the property of Mr. Chris. Ernest, Jr., was struck by lightning during the fierce electrical storm on Thursday evening, but fortunately was not fired the bolt struck the gable and its course to the ground left numerous marks of its effects.—Paisley Advocate.

When W. H. Huck was driving up Elora street yesterday on his way home, he accidently ran into Miss Hilbrun of Deemerton, who was crossing the street opposite the Royal hotel. The young lady evidently became confused, and was unable to get out of the way of the approaching car. She was not seriously injured, her face suffering most with a number of cuts and scratches. Those who witnessed the accident say that no blame attaches to the driver.—Mildmay Gazette.

Quarrelling Lovers Enlist.

An amusing phase of the recruiting, says a Canadian sergeant, is the number of young men who come to the office hot from a lovers' quarrel. You can tell them the minute they come in by their white, determined faces, and the faraway expression with which they go through the examination. These recruiting stations ought to play the very dickens with sweethearts. A girl daren't enjoy a little quarrel. It is too risky.

Two Mildmay Recruits

Two young men from this village have responded to their country's call this week. They are Chester Gowdy and Raymond Keelan. Both enlisted at Harriston on Monday and will go into training at London today. A military training is a fine thing for any young man, and although we hope the war will be over before the boys will be ready to go to the front, if they are called to active service, we know they will give a good account of themselves. Quite a number of others are talking of enlisting.—Mildmay Gazette.

A Warning

A Kansas paper is responsible for the following:—A man who was too economical to take this paper; sent his little boy to borrow the copy taken by his neighbor. In his haste the boy ran over a $4 stand of bees, and in ten minutes looked like a warty summer squash. His cries reached his father, who ran to his assistance, and failing to notice a barbed wire fence, ran into that, breaking it down, cutting a handfull of flesh from his anatomy, and ruining a $4 pair of pants. The old cow took advantage of the gap in the fence, and got into the cornfield, and killed herself eating green corn. Hearing the racket, the wife ran, upset a four gallon churn full of rich cream into a basket of kittens, drowning the whole flock. In her hurry she dropped a $7 set of false teeth. The baby left alone, crawled through the spilled cream into the parlor, ruining a brand new $20 carpet. During the excitement, the eldest daughter ran away with the hired man, the dog broke up 11 setting hens, and the calves got out and chewed the tails off four fine shirts.

Kinloss Lady Killed

Mrs. Joseph Hanna, of Kinloss tp. aged 43 jumped to her death during a runaway on Sunday afternoon at Kincardine after having thrown her 6 year-old son to safety. Mrs. Hanna, the little boy and Mr. Hanna, who live on a farm in Kinloss, were driving into Kincardine to see a daughter, Edna who is attending high school. While coming down a hill on the Durham road the bridle bit broke and the horse dashed ahead. The frightened lady threw her six year-old boy to the side of the road, then she jumped from the rig. The child landed unharmed. Mrs. Hanna landed upon her head and her skull was fractured. Mr. Hanna remained in the buggy, and the horse after running over a bridge and up a hill on the other side of the bridge, stopped of its own accord. Mrs. Hanna was promptly removed to the hospital in Kincardine but died soon after being admitted into the institution. She leaves a family of four children. Sunday was her birthday and she had intended to celebrate by visiting her student daughter in Kincardine.

Application For New Trial.

Judge Gregg has been asked to grant a new trial in the case of H. Russell, of Invermay, who formerly of Elsinore, vs. Robt. Henderson, of Elsinore. At the last Division Court held at Port Elgin, Henderson, who is a store keeper at Elsinore and Owen Sound, sued Harry Russell for $12.00 being the amount of a store dept and was given judgment for the full amount and costs, amounting in all to $20.44. Russel enlisted for war last January and has since been in training at London. His wife received the summons but failed to notify her husband and consequently no defence was offered at the trial. The circumstances of the case were brought to the notice of Judge Greig at Tara on Tuesday. Russell claims that he offered to settle the account before he enlisted for service, but there was a dispute over the amount of the account. Russell is a man in poor circumstances and has a wife and family to support and has enlisted to fight for his King and Country and no doubt will be given every consideration. Mr. C. E. Start is looking after Mr. Russell's interest.—Tara Leader.

What Changes Have Done

Evidently the St. Thomas Journal has been doing a little musing on the good old days, and sighs thusly: "When mother was a girl all she needed for school was a plain little gown and a mere little hair ribbon. But a school girl of to-day wants a tailored suit, several blouses to wear with it, a silk gown, one of crepe de chine, a one piece serge suit, a short walking skirt to wear with a middy, different neck fixings, at least one evening frock, a warm coat, a sweater and some other unimportant things. It's funny what a difference just a few years make."

Be an Optimist

All the best work of the world is done by the optimists. The real achievements are always to the credit of the men who move under the impulse of courage and enthusiasm. They persist in seeing possibilities where others see only dangers: they see stars in the darkness where others are frightened by bogies and ghostly shadows. Despondency and faint heartedness and too great discretion are precursors of defeat and disaster. There is no wisdom in them. Thousands of men in the early centuries looked across the great ocean and saw nothing but a howling waste of waters, but Columbus looked and saw a Continent—and went till he found it. He was the great optimist of his day.

Recruiting Good

The officers of the 31st regiment and the members of the Grey County Recruiting League have no strictures to offer on the way in which recruits have been offering themselves. True it has been found necessary in many cases to put it up to the young men, to place the situation squarely before them, but when this has been done very many of the prospective soldiers have signed their names to the enlistment roll. Another feature which is worthy of note is that some of the men who are enlisting are leaving positions which pay good money. It is not the out-of-works by any means who alone are coming. The call is being heard and answered in a manner which gives one reason to be proud of being a Canadian. One fact which is worthy of the greatest emphasis is that eighty to ninety per cent of those enlisting now are leaving jobs to do o.—Owen Sound Times.

Chicago packers stand to lose $15 000,000 meat cargoes confiscated by the British prize Court as they were not paid previous to the shipments.

A high record for grain loading in one day on the C. P. R. was established in Winnipeg on Thursday last. The grain shipped totalled 1,828,530 bushels included in the shipment were 1,581 cars of wheat.

Too many Prescriptions

A local medical man was hailed into police court on Tuesday charged with filling too many prescriptions for men wanting six ounces of whiskey. That was what the charge meant though it was not couched in that language. The magistrate suspended sentence on the accused paying the costs of the court. The magistrate also read the medico a little lecture and advised him that he should not bring reflection on a noble profession by making it a means to provide whiskey to habitual soaks.—Owen Sound Times.

Seeing Things Wrong

If Henry Ford advertised less than he has, would his business have its present magnitude? You get the point: advertising DOES increase sales. What is seen clearly in regard to the affairs of others is often not quite so obvious when it is related to one's own business. Thousands of non-advertisers will tell you that advertising is the finest thing in the world—for the other man. Some day when they are dead, and a new Pharaoh governs their business, advertising will be found the finest thing in the world for enlarging its service and swelling its profits.

Not Suitable for Winter Camps.

Valcartier is not yet suitable for a winter camp and will probably be closed up in a month or so. The troops there will then be quartered in the various armories throughout Eastern Canada. The utilization of the armories is now engaging the attention of the militia authorities here and no doubt the disposition of the troops in training amongst the various armories of the country will soon be announced. At Valcartier 350 interned Germans and Austrians have been at work on permanent improvements to the camp area, building roads, etc. At Petewawa 800 Germans and Austrians have been similarly employed. They will continue throughout all winter there, as there is ample work for them to do. Altogether about 1,000 aliens of enemy nationality, who have been interned, are engaged upon military work of this nature. Those who are at Valcartier now will perform some work for the Government during the winter.

Temperance Wave Moving Ontario

There are growing signs that public opinion in Ontario is beginning to crystallize in its antagonism to the liquor traffic. In addition to a lot of minor agitations for certain specific reforms, there is also apparent an even stronger feeling that now is the time to wipe out the liquor traffic altogether and not be satisfied with any quarter-way measures thoroughness of the west where the talk is not about reducing the licenses by 10.20 or 30 per cent, but where the action either taken or contemplated, is the complete wiping out of the traffic) is spreading to Ontario. A few people seem to be proud if the present 1300 or 1400 licenses in Ontario may be reduced soon to about 1000 but general public opinion particularly during the war, is not likely to be satisfied with the presence of 1000 licenses One of the definite steps for prohibition was a conference held in Toronto with representatives of twelve different organizations at which it was decided to launch a campaign for the prohibition of the liquor traffic or at any rate for a referendum on the question. In addition to representatives of churches and temperance organizations, this movement has the co-operation of a number of leading business men and it is thought will develop to great importance. In Manitoba they are discussing whether the women will vote on the coming referendum or not. The Norris government is going to introduce women's suffrage but the question in this particular case is whether the prohibition referendum is to be delayed until women's suffrage comes into effect and the new women's voters'list are prepared or whether the referendum is to be taken at the earliest possible moment. It seems to be felt that the referendum will carry by a very large majority even without the women and that perhaps a temperance victory and men only voting, as in Alberta, would be even more striking than one in which the women participated. The deputation appointed by the recent temperance convention held in Vancouver has awaited upon Sir Richard McBride and his government in Victoria asking for a referendum on the question of prohibition in British Columbia. Sir Richard said that the matter would be carefully considered. A little while ago Sir Richard issued a statement saying that some plebiscite or referendum on the question would be submitted. This promise, although rather indefinite is a sign that something will be done. The provincial Liberal executive at its meeting this week decided in favor of a referendum.

From Javelin to Cordite

When the first man in the old stone age, thousands of year ago threw his first javelin against a hairy mammoth he put his foot over the threshold of the problem of explosive. For it seemed to him—and our feeling to-day are with him—that it would be more pleasurable if one could hurt and kill one's enemy without the gratuitous thrill of having to sit on the massive tusk on the verge of a cavernous mouth or of having to approach within a few paces of the huge legs which might the next moment descend upon him. It would be more convenient to stand at the cave entrance on a dizzy ledge of rock and hurl a weapon at the distant enemy.

So man was driven to invent the catapult, and a gun is merely a chemical catapult. The trigger is pulled back like the leather of the catapult, and the sudden and extraordinary expansion of the explosive corresponds to the elasticity of the rubber or spring, the essential feature of both instruments being the employment of some source of more than human power which can be made to yield up its energy at a given moment in the required way.

Explosives are, therefore, tabloid energy or power, and it is a just reminder of the fact that some substances are explosive generally, whereas quite a number of common things may be made explosive by some particular kind of treatment. When water boils on the fire there is no explosion as it is changed into steam, but if the spout were sealed and the whole of the water could be changed into steam in a second there would be an explosion. And the instance is good because it is really a kitchen model of a volcano. Moreover, steam guns were used in America in the sixties.

The essential idea of an explosive is then the violent release of some pent-up thing: just the opposite, from this standpoint, of the catapult, which works by allowing a distended thing—the elastic—to contract suddenly, whereas all explosives release a compressed thing. The release gives rise to an air wave, and this, of course, is experienced as a sound. It is the sound which is popularly called an explosion.

Now, it has been said that an explosion is a tabloid force, power, energy. How is it made available. It is easy to follow the mechanism of an explosive further. Explosives, as commonly used are solid substances, which by burning produced almost instantaneously an extraordinary large volume of gases. The heat and pressure of a blow caused the burning to start, and the burning also produces heat, which, acting upon the gases, increases the volume still further. It may be suggested that there is no obvious reason why even a sudden and enormous expansion should cause the damage of an explosion. And the suggestion is quite just.

It is only when they are confined that the explosives are really dangerous. Gunpowder burned in the open merely causes a noise like "pouf" and burns quickly. Guncotton may be burned on the hand—it is not to be recommended as a fashionable hobby—without any serious inconvenience. Indeed, gunpowder was first used as an incendiary composition. But a firework or a gun charged with gunpowder will explode with a loud report and may cause fatal wounds.

Gunpowder is the best known explosive mixture. It is made from the commonest ingredients—carbon, sulphur and saltpeter. There are several modifications of gunpowder, other nitrates being substituted for the saltpeter—potassium nitrates. The nitrates give the oxygen to the mixture, without which it would not burn at all, other explosive mixtures containing chlorates which have the same amount of oxygen as saltpeter and the nitrates. The different powders are used in different circumstances where a more violent or slower or a safe explosive is required, for it is not always the same effect which one asks from an explosive. Velocity may at times be sacrificed, say, in favor of a higher weight of common shell. Gunpowder is a "low" explosive. Its explosion is slow, and its effect is less violently disruptive.

Dynamite is probably the best known high explosive, and the name does not stand for one particular substance, but for a large class, which are, in effect, diluted nitroglycerin, and which are generally used for blasting.

Guncotton may be described as a nitrate of cotton wool (which the chemist would call cellulose). Both nitroglycerin and guncotton are less useful as explosives themselves than their derivatives, although Russia and the United States use compressed wet guncotton in their high explosive shells. One of the most famous derivatives is the smokeless propellant called cordite.—Philadelphia Ledger.

DOGS AND DOGS.

National Feelings Toward Them Vary the World Over.

Fisher Ames not the revolutionary hero, but one of his descendants, once remarked to me that a dog is a better friend than a human being. "For," said he, "the dog will lie at your feet, ready at any moment to respond to your mood, while a human being will go off in a huff if you do not respond to his mood."

The Esquimaux have put Ames' remark into a proverb based on a long experience in the arctic wilds. They say that "a man's best friend is his dog, even better than his wife." Men seem to be the same in all climates, and we have the authority of the Spanish for saying that dogs are the same also, for their proverb makers have concluded that "dogs have teeth in all countries."

As one traces the proverbial comments on dogs through the concentrated wisdom of the nations, their similarity is most impressive. For example the Latins told one another to "Beware of a silent dog and still waters," concluded that "Dumb dogs and still waters are dangerous," and characterized an insidious traducer as "A dog that bites silently." The Russians, who were slightly influenced by the Latin races, say that "Dogs bark and the wind carries it away," but the French, Spanish, German and English, who have inherited more than they wish to acknowledge from ancient Rome, all agree that "Barkin' dogs don't bite," and we have also in English the warning to "Have a care for a silent dog and still water," which is clearly a free translation of the Latin original.

There is a world of friendliness for animals in the English saying that "You cannot teach an old dog new tricks." It calls up the picture of a youth making a companion of his dog and treating him as he would a younger brother whom he was instructing in archery or showing how to use a sling. The early English pup must have learned how to beg for his dinner and must have delighted his master by retrieving a stick thrown in the brook before he learned to hunt with the intelligence of a thorough training. The Italians put the same idea in the saying that "And old dog does not grow used to the collar," while the English have another version of it in "An old dog cannot alter his way of barking."

The French tell us that "There are good dogs of all sizes," but this has not prevented them from discovering that there are dog haters who will stop at no villainy to satisfy their grudge. Thus, "A man who wants to drown his dog says it is mad." France is so near England that this saying crossed the channel and became acclimated in spite of the fondness of a nation of animal lovers for one of their best friends. But the say did not originate in France. It goes back to the Romans, who said that "Whoso is desirous of beating a dog will readily find a stick." The Italians inherited it from the Romans. When it got to Denmark it took this form: "He that wants to hang a dog is sure to find a rope," or to say that the dog eats the sheep. And the Germans tell us that "When a man will throw at a dog he soon finds a stone."

And the Germans also, with what the allies would say is characteristic assurance, have observed that "A bashful dog never fattens." And the allies would also say that the Germans have done their utmost to discourage bashfulness in themselves and in their dachshunds.

As you get into Asia you find conflicting views about dogs. The Tamils of Southern India, whose shins are an easy mark for sharp teeth, say that "on finding a stone we see no dog and on seeing a dog we find no stone," as though a dog exists only to be stoned. A little farther east, in China, we discover that the "dogs have more good in them than men think they have," a saying that could not have become embedded in the proverbial wisdom of any but a kindly race with a friendly feeling for all creatured things. And the democracy of the dog is recognized by the Chinese when they say that he "has no aversion to a poor family," and his faithful intelligence is admitted in the saying that "the dog understands his master's nod."

The Orientals of Palestine, however, have always looked with contempt on dogs or we should not have had the famous question: "Is thy servant a dog that he should do this great thing?"—Philadelphia Ledger.

For street wear the gabardine and satin trotter frock is very smart and practical, and the simpler the better. A particularly smart frock is featured in navy gabardine and satin. The satin predominates, being featured in the upper part of the full skirt which has a clever trick of a scalloped border. The long sleeved bodice combines to a greater extent the gabardine and satin features, a "jacket back" terminates in a double belt effect in front.

THE MONKEY HAS THE CALL.

Go to the monkey, thou voter; consider his ways and be wise. Do the monkeys pay ground rent to the descendants of the first old ape who discovered the valleys where the monkeys live?

Do they hire the trees from the chimpanzee who first found the forest?

Do they buy the cocoanuts from the great-great-grandchildren of the gorilla who invented a way to crack them?

Do they allow two or three monkeys to form a corporation and obtain control of all the paths that lead through the woods?

Do they permit some smart monkey, with superior business ability, to claim all the springs of water in the forest as his own, because of some alleged bargain made by their ancestors 500 years ago?

Do they allow a smart gang of monkey lawyers to so tangle up their conceptions of ownership that a few will obtain possession of everything?

Do they appoint a few monkeys to govern them and then allow those appointed monkeys to rob the tribe and mismanage all its affairs?

Do they build up a monkey city and then hand over the land, and the paths and the trees, and the springs and the fruits to a few monkeys who sat on a log and chattered while the work was going on?—San Francisco Star.

The cretonne hat continues to be popular not only in sport and the rough and ready style of hat, but also the semidressy chapeau. Here is a wide brimmed sailor with a soft blue facing is covered with cretonne in floriet shades and figures. The graceful rise and fall of the brim affords a glimpse of the cretonne and blue straw, at most every angle. A wide black band encircles the crown and gay colored parrot with a sparkling eye lends a novel effect. This type of hat is considered generally correct with afternoon frock or lingerie dress.

A Fortune Telling System

(By F. A. Mitchell.)

A table was between them. They had been playing euchre. She suggested a game of hearts.

"No, thanks," he said. "I am not so stupid as to play a game of hearts with a coquette. Your victims are already sufficiently numerous without adding so unworthy a person as myself."

"You know very well what I mean. You simply wish to say something smart."

She was shuffling the cards, but her mind was not on them. What her mind was on, or, rather, what was on her mind, did not interest him. She was right in inferring that his remark was intended for something smart.

While she was listlessly shuffling the cards she leaned forward so that the perfume of a flower she wore in her corsage was perilously near his nose. Her red lips were still nearer his. She was looking down at the cards, but presently raised her eyes. They met his resting upon her admiringly, but she dropped them at once.

"Shall I tell your fortune?" she asked.

"Do."

She began to distribute the cards on the table in four piles. Whenever she put a card on the fourth pile she paused and studied it. He asked her what process she was using and she told him it was one she had learned from a fortune teller. A spider laying for a fly is not expected to speak the truth.

She put down four cards, then another four cards, the second fourth card being the knave of spades.

"That's you," she said.

"I'm no knave."

"But you're awfully smart. You scintillate with bright sayings."

He swallowed this little bit of preliminary bait, and it made him hungry for more.

Presently the ten of diamonds fell on the second pile of cards.

"That's a wealthy girl who is angling for you," said the fortune teller.

"What's her name?"

"I know her name, but I'm not going to tell you."

The two of spades fell in the first pile.

"A black deuce indicates that she is crafty. Better look out for her. She will make you a lot of trouble."

The ten of hearts fell on the first pile.

"That's the girl who really loves you. She is true hearted, and if you return her love she will make you very happy."

"I don't quite understand this scheme under which you are working all this out," he said, with a puzzled expression. "I don't see why the ten spots are a couple of girls or why you infer those things, no matter what pile they fall on."

"Of course you don't. What kind of fortune would it be if you did?"

By this time she had dealt all the cards and, putting them together again, shuffled the hand began anew, this time laying them in six rows, placing one card beneath another so that all were exposed. The third card in the first column was the ten of diamonds, and the fourth card in the sixth column was the jack of club.

"Too bad!" exclaimed the fortune teller. "The expected has happened. The rich girl has thrown you over for a man who is brutal."

"That's the queerest fortune telling system to understand I ever came across," he said.

She continued to deal the cards very slowly. They were both watching them intently as they fell gradually bending lower and lower over them. At last a rebellious strand of her hair grazed his forehead. A fine wire is sufficient to carry an electric current and a few hairs may carry a love current. The ten of hearts fell at the bottom of the fifth column. She laid her hand on it, and putting his hand on it at the same time, he touched hers. She did not withdraw hers and he maintained his position.

"Don't go any further till you have explained to me why this card falling at the bottom of the fifth column means that the girl who loves me is—is what?"

"What you're going to say about her."

"What am I going to say about her?"

The dialogue, spoken slowly and softly, is not especially brilliant, but it was quite sufficient to serve the purpose of these two that is keeping their hands in touch. She raised her lashes and looked into his eyes with something that might have been reproachful; it might have been inviting; it might have been anything he chose to infer it to be. Meanwhile the fragrance of the flower mingled with her breath, curled about his nose and permeated it up into his brain.

It would be sacrilegious to follow further the blending of these two young hearts. Besides, it would be a repetition of what has occurred since Cupid first began his pranks. And yet the little rascal has an infinite variety of way of practicing his profession, and nothing is achieved by him in so many different ways as in drawing together of a pair so [illegible].

"I say, mummy," he said when their daughter was receiving attention from a desirable party, "you'd better teach her that fortune telling game you taught me."

"It is not necessary," replied the dignified mother, with dignity.

"Humph! That's about as intelligible as your fortune system."

TAKE CARE OF HAIR.

Be Careful Not to Tear Scalp or Split Hair, Stimulate by Massage

Few women take proper care of their hair. They believe that if they give it a brushing at night and wash it every two or three weeks they are doing all that is needed.

Under normal conditions the proper care of the hair is very simple. The objects to be kept in mind are to preserve its natural luster and texture by means of absolute cleanliness and to massage the scalp sufficiently to remove any dandruff that may adhere to it and thereby promote the active circulation of the blood. All this must be done without injury to the scalp or the hair by pulling, scratching or tearing. Cutting the hair frequently has a tendency, especially in youth, to thicken the individual hairs and promote their growth. Neither this nor any other known process, however, tends to increase the actual number of hairs. All claims to the contrary are the pretensions of charlatans.

Professional hairdressers do not advocate shampooing the hair oftener than once a month. A thorough brushing once or twice a week is regarded by them as sufficient for cleanliness and as much more beneficial to the hair and scalp.

Much contradictory advice has been given on the subject of brushing the hair, some persons saying that stiff brushes should be used and the scalp and hair brushed by means of them with a good deal of vigor, others recommending soft brushes and a very moderate amount of friction. These different views of the objects to be attained by brushing. One object is to stimulate the health of the scalp and hence to give strength and vigor to the hair, stiff bristles may be used with considerable vigor provided the skin is not injured. The other object is to remove the dirt and trash from dust. For this purpose brushes may be soft and used with a very moderate pressure.

Care should be taken on the one hand not to irritate the scalp, tear the roots of the hair or cause it to split and on the other not to neglect the stimulating effects of massaging the scalp and removing dandruff.

HAMMERS IN STEAM.

Billions of Flying Molecules Give the Gas Its Power.

There is an old Scotch proverb that "Many a mickle makes a muckle," which means that many little things put together make much. The power of steam is a case of this. It can drive great boats through the water and it can tear up the greatest rocks. Yet all its power is due to the coming together of little units of power.

When we speak of steam we mean water vapor—water in the form of gas. This gas is formed under pressure and has power to expand. It is this expansive power that does the work. Afterward the gas becomes cool and condensed, so that we can see it, and that is what we call steam.

The power of the gas is due to the tiny molecules of water of which it is made. These are flying about in all directions, trying to get loose and so striking against the sides of whatever pens them in. The force in one of these molecules is very thin, for the amount of stuff in the molecules is so small. If you had a hammer smaller than [illegible] you could not drive a nail with it. But as there are billions of these little hammers flying about in the gas they are able to do all the work that steam does.—From The Child's Book of Knowledge.

(By Le Raconteuse.)

The latest prank in motor wear is the bordered veil in Georgette crepe. This border effect may be in a figured or striped design as is shown, and is obtainable in most any shade. Here the color is a fascinating shade of blue with stripe and dot effect. From a practical standpoint these veils are most desirable, for aside from being exceedingly smart they serve as a protection to the hair, hat and skin. There is ample material to drape over and around the face, still allowing for a graceful arrangement of ends over the shoulder. When the chapeau happens, as in this case, to be a pale pink felt sport hat, this veil serves beautifully to protect it from the dust.

Drill-Sowing.

The first agricultural investigator to make use of drill-sowing was Jethro Tull, an English scientist, who died, June 3rd, 1740. His invention of drill-sowing of seeds and his insistence upon the need of frequent hoeing were among the greatest improvements in farming methods up to that time, and may be said to have revolutionized agriculture. Tull was educated for the law, but ill health compelled him to retire to a farm, where he spent his life in agricultural experiments. His farm at Shalborne, in Berkshire, may be said to have been the birthplace of modern agriculture. Despite the jeers of "practical farmers," he carried his methods so far that he succeeded by improved cultivation in gathering good crops from land that had always been considered worthless for farming purposes. His great invention of drill-sowing enabled farmers to save at least one-third of their seed. While the destroyers of the race have been honored with mighty monuments, Jethro Tull, the benefactor of humanity, lies in an unmarked grave. "His deeds, his triumphs, were of the peaceful kind of which the world in general is little enamored; but the results were momentous to humanity."

Chats With the Doctor

BY A PHYSICIAN

RINGWORM AND PARASITIC FUNGI

That very prevalent complaint, ringworm, most often seen in children at school, but by no means limited to them, has nothing to do with any worm. It is caused by a parasite fungus which attacks the skin, and especially the hair roots therein. It is only one of a large group of diseases due to a similar source, the particular fungus being different in each. Under the microscope sections from the affected skin show in all appearances resembling uncommonly the spores and mycelium (thread-network) of the mushroom or of any familiar toadstool.

You recognize ordinary ringworm by its circular patches, varying in size from that a large pin's head to that of a half-dollar. On the body, as on the scalp, there is almost total absence of hair from the centre of the patch, with a few short and broken-off hair stumps towards the circumference. There is slight inflammation. The place feels hot and itchy. The little patches grow gradually into bigger ones, exactly as in the "fairy-rings" of our fields, the spores of another kind of fungus, tend to develop year by year beyond the circumference of the first.

The treatment of ringworm is of the simplest, though more difficulty in eradicating the fungus is naturally found when the head is attacked than when the skin elsewhere is the seat of disease. You paint the patch well with tincture of iodine for about a week, when the patches are on the body; for double that time when the scalp is affected—sometimes even a little longer still. The iodine kills the spores of the fungus, and has great penetrative power, thus reaching the deposits in the hair follicles.

It is always essential to paint a little beyond the actual circumference of the patch, as there is growth in that direction, with deposits invisible to the naked eye. Also on the head the hair must be cut off very short—not all over—but for half an inch around the patch.

It need hardly be said that the disorder primarily results from dirt, and dirty habits of life, though the contagion readily extends to the cleanest. The contact of children at school is the most fruitful source, and it is important that they be instructed never to use each other's brushes or towels so far as that may be avoided. There should be frequent inspection by the proper authorities; with instant segregation of any detected sufferer. Also at church or chapel, or in other places where the human herd is apt to congregate, there should be every precaution to maintain cleanliness, with as few cushions, curtains or miscellaneous draperies as possible. Beware also of a mangy cat or dog. Mange is identical with ringworm.

CHLOASMA

Another very prevalent fungous disorder is chloasma or liver-stain; the brownish or gray patches which appear on the skin of people who don't thoroughly wash themselves once a week—as all good Christians should; or who don't change their underlinen every week.

There may be slight itching; but as a rule this is hardly noticeable, and you only find the patch most often gray, and having a slight curl on it—by accident. The fungus, which bears the high-sounding name of microsporon furfur, specially attacks the furrows and folds where there is an accumulation of perspiration, as, for instance, the groin.

The free application of glycerine of carbolic acid for some two or three nights is sufficient to kill the fungus and cure the disease. Reappearance must be prevented by weekly soap and water, with a change of linen.

FAVUS OR SCALD-HEAD.

This is fortunately rare now; although once upon a time before people learnt the value of cleanly living, was probably more prevalent. The head is covered by a bright yellow crust of small cups, exhaling a cheesy odor. The hair falls off. The condition is unsightly and loathsome.

Glycerine of carbolic acid should be well rubbed in for three nights successively; and again, after a few days' interval, Carbolic acid can be safely relied on to kill all fungus or insect life; only as it will kill human beings too it should never be left about.

BALDNESS IN PATCHES, ALOPECIA AREATA.

This malady is due to a fungus, termed the microsporonaudouinii. It doesn't hurt, but if you are not careful you may thus readily lose all your hair, and become entirely bald. I once knew a young chemist, who cured himself of the disease in patchform, then went on using the same hairbrush, and in consequence lost the whole hair, which then refused to grow and was forced ultimately to wear a wig.

Directly any patch appears, it must be sedulously painted with tincture of iodine, after the hair all round has been cut off. This should be done for ten days, and the part carefully watched, in order that the dose may be repeated at any sign of reappearance.

Burn whatever brushes or combs you have been using; change your pillow-cover frequently, and eschew any soiled towel, or infected sponge. The malady is more troublesome and obstinate than ordinary ringworm; and you cannot be too clean, or too careful in your efforts to get rid of it.

THRUSH.

The baby's thrush—white spot on the mucous membrane of the mouth—is another example of disease caused by a fungus. It results from the fermentation of too highly sugared foods within the mouth; and generally means that too much sugar has been given in the milk or other food.

A little honey and borax usually soon removes the trouble; but if obstinate, 3 grain doses of chlorate of potash in a dessertspoonful of water should be given every three hours.

ACTINO-MYCOSIS, THE RAY FUNGUS.

This is a serious disease of cattle, which occasionally attacks human beings, who are said to contract it through eating the raw grains of barley. In cattle it was long regarded as a form of cancer.

A tumor grows on the lower jaw usually—though sometimes other parts and organs are affected. It is painful and has a very cancerous appearance. Eventually sinuses form, from which little bright yellow granules exude. There is no cure but excision of the jaw, when that is the site.

Her Baby Had Dysentery.

Had Two Doctors. No Result.

WAS CURED BY THE USE OF

DR. FOWLER'S

Extract of Wild Strawberry.

In dysentery the discharges from the bowels follow each other with great rapidity, and sometimes become mixed with blood.

Never neglect what at first appears to be a slight attack of diarrhoea or dysentery will surely set in. Cure the first symptoms by the use of Dr. Fowler's Extract of Wild Strawberry.

Mrs. Martin Farraher, Dogherty Corner, N.B., writes: "I can very strongly recommend Dr. Fowler's Extract of Wild Strawberry for dysentery and summer complaints. My little girl, at the age of two years, had the dysentery very bad. We had two doctors, but with no result. My mother brought me a bottle of "Dr. Fowler's," and when half the bottle was used the little girl was running around playing with her dolls with great delight and joy to the family, for we did not think she would ever get better."

There are a number of preparations on the market to-day, claiming to be the same as "Dr. Fowler's Extract of Wild Strawberry," and also called similar names, so as to fool the public into thinking they are getting the genuine.

"Dr. Fowler's" is manufactured only by The T. Milburn Co., Limited, Toronto, Ont. See that their name is on the wrapper.

HARDWOOD FLOORS.

Hints On Their Care During the Summer Time.

Keeping hardwood floors in the summer time when it is desirable that a minimum number of rugs should be used is one of the problems that are now facing housekeepers. If a few facts are borne in mind and the attention given to such floors becomes an everyday habit instead of an occasional thought it is an easy and simple matter to have these floors always beautifully polished and unsoiled.

In the first place every hardwood floor should be gone over at least once each day with a stiff broom over which a heavy cloth is securely wrapped. This of course is for removing dust, and where there is more than the normal quantity of dust the process must be repeated as often as is made necessary by the accumulation.

When black discolorations show themselves on your hardwood floor there is nothing to worry about. It is only the gallic acid contained in the wood acted on by the solution of iron contained in the drip water from a wet walking stick or umbrella. An umbrella stand might have prevented it, though it is by no means hard to remove. Place a cloth wet with a dilute solution of oxalic acid over the spot for three or four hours and it will disappear. When thoroughly dry rub the spot with wax. The floor will be clean and unscarred as ever.

Where the hardwood floor is of oak these spots should be guarded against, as oak is more easily affected by iron solution than other woods. Even the tiniest bit of such a solution will leave a black discoloration.

When you wish to give a wax finished floor a thorough cleansing first rub all the dull spots with an eraser to remove the scars, then touch up the spots with fresh wax. Either liquid or solid wax may be used. After all these dull spots have been brightened go over the floor with a "deck mop" and remove all loose dirt. Then to make the floors shine as they should go over it with a woollen cloth beneath a heavily weighted brush. And don't limit the operations of this flannel covered brush to the centre of the floor. Search out the corners and the dark lines of shadow next the wall.

Although there are several kinds of hardwood finish for floors the most popular and economical method is the French [illegible] using shellac. When this method is employed the floor will retain its color and lustre practically forever, granting of course it receives reasonable care. A thorough waxing of shellac finished floors is required once, under a waxed floor may sometimes be restored by going over it with turpentine on a woollen cloth. Where the scar penetrates the wood the wax must be scraped off with a sharp tool, the scar sandpapered out [illegible] and a fresh coat of color and wax applied.

Waxing floors that have already been stained or finished is very simple. The materials needed are a quantity of cotton waste, turpentine for cleaning the floor, a heavy weighted brush for polishing and this should be used on the floor before the wax is applied as well as afterward, a can of wax in either solid or liquid form. The liquid wax is a bit easier to apply and both give the same lustre. The greatest difference is that the floor on which the solid wax is used is much less slippery than that on which the liquid is spread. A daily dusting of such floors with a stiff broom covered with a woollen cloth will keep them bright and clean under ordinary conditions.

PAPA'S NEMESIS.

(Short Stories)

Evelyn is very cowardly and her father decided to have a serious talk with his little daughter.

"Father," she said at the close of his lecture, "when you see a cow, ain't you 'fraid?"

"No," with a sigh.

"Ain't you 'fraid when it thunders?"

"No," with laughter. "Oh, you silly, silly child!"

"When you see a bumblebee, ain't you 'fraid?"

"No, certainly not, Evelyn."

"Papa," said Evelyn solemnly, "ain't you 'fraid of nothing in the world but mamma?"

FARM AND GARDEN

SOW AT FARROWING TIME.

The signs of farrowing are known to most pig-keepers, and so it is assumed that everyone knows. The beginner often cannot find what he wants in books for this very reason. We were all beginners once, and may exercise a little patience with those who are to succeed us sooner or later—sooner perhaps than we wish. The belly during the greater period of pregnancy enlarges in a more or less symmetrical manner, so much so that even the experienced may be mistaken in regard to an empty sow, but when about three parts gone there comes a measure of flatness in the space between the point of the hip, the spine, and the last rib—the part generally alluded to as the flank. In any species of animal I am asked to pronounce upon I depend more upon this sign than any other, but the animal at the time must not be blown up with wind. If the udder has begun to spring, and the bearing shows signs of elongation, and there is quite a drop in the belly nearer to the ground, it will not be very long before the sow exhibits symptoms of what is sometimes called nesting. It is true that some will put off the time almost too late, and then make a bed hurriedly, but most sows are deliberate about it, and some will pause like the cat that has made a bad choice as if considering it after all the best has been chosen.

The place is selected for her as a rule, and the bedding too, and here the beginner often makes a mistake, for he thinks that a good thick bed of long clean straw is what she ought to like. The sow knows better. She bites up the long straw into short and comparatively soft pieces, mostly broken lengthwise too, and push it to the sides, leaving a bare place for the actual business to be done, where the youngsters will not get twisted up in long straw and unable to reach the teat.

One of the commonest hindrances to farrowing is a dry or insufficiently laxative diet. Drastic purgatives, given late, are dangerous, but a soft condition throughout the canal can be assured by a few linseed and castor oil if the case seems at all urgent. Repeated small doses of laxative food, such as broad bran and linseed, made very sloppy, answer best of all, but several days may be needed to bring about this state of things. Many pig men fear to let a heavy brood sow take exercise, but it is generally good on anything but steep and slippery hill sides, and a little natural aperient is thus obtained. Roots are often given with the same object, but with sows heavy in pig the danger of any very bulky food, and especially of large quantities of roots, is that of giving off gas and flatulent colic resulting. The latter is apt to bring on premature labor, or serious illness, and death of the pigs in utero. Many people give salts before pigging, but in the writer's opinion this is one of the few occasions when it is an unsuitable remedy. Oil is the remedy par excellence for most animals requiring a laxative near parturition. Sulphur either as flowers or precipitated (milk) of sulphur, mixed with a quantity of lard, and then with a mash of bran, will generally be taken by the sow, but force should give place to guile, and heavy sows should not be drenched.

FEEDING AN ORPHAN FOAL.

Occasionally one has the misfortune to lose a mare that has a young foal and has to bring the foal up by hand on cow's milk. It should be remembered in a case of this kind that mare's milk is normally sweeter than cow's milk, but he has only about half the amount of fat and other solids that is found in the average cow's milk, consequently it is usual to add sugar to diluted cow's milk for feeding orphan foals.

A method of feeding is sugested by J. H. S. Johnson, of "Breeder's Gazette, which is about as follows: Use an old teapot for feeding with the thumb of an old kid glove, having a few holes punched in it, fastened over the spout. For a very young foal, feed not more than a cupful of milk five times a day. A dessert spoon of sugar to a pint of milk is about the right proportion. Three tablespoonfuls of lime water added to this ration will correct acidity in the stomach. The milk should be perfectly sweet, the utensils should be kept clean, and the milk should be fed at normal body temperature. It should be obtained from a somewhat fresh cow that does not test too high in butter fat. The milk should be diluted with warm or skim milk.

After it is two months old, the foal will do very well on skim milk alone to which may be added a tablespoonful of linseed meal. The foal should have comfortable quarters, pasture and fresh water. As soon as it is willing to eat, it should have a grain mixture put in front of it, a little at a time, consisting of possibly one part of wheat bran to one part crushed oats, corn chop or crushed barley. A little alfalfa hay will also be of benefit, especially if the colt does not have much pasture.—Charles I. Bray, Colorado Agricultural College, Fort Collins, Colorado.

THE SILO'S GOOD POINTS.

Here are ten reasons why every farmer who keeps live stock should have a silo. They are formulated by Professor J. H. Skinner, of Purdue University:

1. The silo preserves the palatability and succulence of the green corn plant for winter feeding.
2. It helps to make use of the entire corn plant.
3. The silo increases the live stock capacity of the farm.
4. Silage is a good summer feed when pastures are short.
5. Because of the small amount of ground space required by the silo it is an economical means of storing forage.
6. The silo prevents waste of cornstalks, leaves and husks, which contain about two-fifths of the feeding value of the corn plant.
7. The silo located near the feed manger is an assurance of having feed near at hand in stormy as well as fair weather.
8. The [illegible] cost of grains in fattening cattle and sheep.
9. Silage greatly [illegible] and decreases the cost of [illegible].
10. There are no stalks to bother in the manure when corn is put into silo.

All should [illegible] that silage is not a complete and balanced ration. It is a succulent food and should be supplemented with some balancing dry feed.

NOTES.

As a rule a horse in thin or medium flesh never exhibits the amount of force or vim that is generally seen in horses in high condition.

The lighter, better ventilated and more comfortable the stable for all kinds of farm stock, the less it will require to keep them in good condition.

Sheep are going to be more and more in demand, both for wool and for mutton. Since beef and pork are both high in price, the American people are turning their attention to lamb and mutton, and an enlarged demand has been created among people who have heretofore not considered this most nutritious animal food.

By recent experiment the U. S. Department of Agriculture seems to show that scours are not due to sour milk but to uncleanly conditions. If the milk is not allowed to stand for any great length of time and not allowed to become unclean, it is as nourishing to the young calf as sweet skim-milk, and as rapid gains were made in one case, as in the other. It was further shown that sudden change and from sour to sweet, made no apparent change in the calf, although the calf was only a few days old. It was found by experiment, however, that sour milk does not prove so favorable in winter as in summer.

Intestinal worms are a common cause of epilepsy in young pigs. The spasms may also be due to an injury of spinal cord. Too close interbreeding. Divide the pigs into small groups, withhold feed for twelve hours and then give turpentine in milk at the rate of a teaspoonful per 80 pounds live weight. Repeat for three consecutive days. An attempt should be made to prevent intestinal worms by providing dry, well-drained lots, free from mud holes and filth.

ST. LAWRENCE SUGAR

HAS LONG SINCE PASSED THE EXPERIMENTAL STAGE

DIAMOND

St. Lawrence is not a new or untried sugar, in an experimental stage, but a sugar which has a reputation behind it—a sugar which under the severest and most critical tests, shows a sugar purity of 99.99 per cent., as per Government analysis. For successful jams and preserves you can always absolutely depend upon St. Lawrence Sugar as its quality never varies. Remember, the slightest foreign matter or impurity in sugar will prevent your jellies from setting and cause your preserves to become sour or ferment.

CROP ESTIMATE

Northern Hemisphere Production of Cereals, Etc.

The August number of the Bulletin of Agricultural and Commercial Statistics, published by the International Institute of Agriculture contains the latest information on production of cereals and other important agricultural products in the northern hemisphere.

Wheat.—New data received by the institute after the publication of the July Bulletin deal with the crops in Spain [illegible] quintals, or 123 per cent of the 1914 crop), Great Britain and Ireland [illegible] quintals, or 122.6 per cent.), Russia in Europe (208,180,211 quintals or 134.4 per cent), Canada (winter wheat 9,212,000 quintals of 164 per cent.), and Tunis (3 million quintals against 600,000 last year). The wheat crop figure for Italy has been modified since the last Bulletin and is now 47,500,000 quintals or 104.7 per cent. of last year's crop.

For the group of countries which have sent reports (Spain, Great Britain and Ireland, Italy, Russia in Europe, Switzerland, Canada (winter wheat), United States, India, Japan and Tunis) the 1915 crop is estimated at [illegible] quintals in 1914, or 117.9 per cent of the latter amount.

Rye.—The production in Spain is estimated at 7,251,002 quintals or 119.7 per cent. of that in 1914, in Russia in Europe at 211,652,556 quintals, or 129.7 per cent., and in the United States at 11,176,440 quintals or 102.9 per cent. The following countries, taken together, the 1915 crop is estimated at [illegible] quintals against 229,323,673 in 1914, or 115.7 per cent: Spain, Italy, Russia in Europe, Switzerland, United States.

Barley.—The production in Spain is estimated at [illegible] quintals (116.5 per cent. of the 1914 production), in Great Britain and Ireland at [illegible] (97.4 per cent), in Russia in Europe at 107,102,819 quintals (120.9 per cent.), and in Tunis at 2,500,000 quintals, against 700,000 in 1914. For the following group of countries: Spain, Great Britain and Ireland, Italy, Russia in Europe, Switzerland, United States, Japan and Tunis, the 1915 crop is estimated at 210,629,264 quintals against 176,841,682 in 1914, or 119 per cent.

Oats.—The crop in Spain is estimated at [illegible] quintals (102.1 per cent.), in Great Britain and Ireland at [illegible] quintals (101 per cent.), in Russia in Europe at 159,202,747 quintals (122.7 per cent.), and in Tunis at [illegible] against [illegible] in 1914. For all the countries which have sent reports (Spain, Great Britain and Ireland, Italy, Russia in Europe, Switzerland, United States and Tunis), the 1915 crop is estimated at 352,622,315 quintals or 124.1 per cent.

THE POULTRY WORLD

FEED FOR WINTER LAYERS.

With fresh eggs going higher each week and A1 poultry at a fair figure, the city man with a plot of ground longs for a few hens that will supply him with fresh hen fruit and best quality of meat. Cold-storage eggs at fresh-egg prices do not appeal to lovers of fresh eggs. The one drawback to many who would like to own a few hens is the feeding problem. When reading reports of the experiment station or some experienced large keeper of poultry the beginner thinks to obtain eggs that he must be an expert mixer of feeds, and that, while in a majority of cases the feeds can be mixed by the beginner, to the one with a few hens it is expensive and some labor.

It is proper that the big poultry-keeper with several hundred fowls should have a knowledge of mixing feeds to suit the requirements of his flock, and in this case, where feeds are purchased in large quantities, saving is made. Especially is this true of the dry mash to be fed in hoppers, which the fowls can go to at all times. But the busy city man with only an hour in the morning and a few hours at night cannot afford to give this attention to the feeding question, as far as results were concerned, was far from satisfactory. But with the success of the older poultry-keepers, aided by the experiment stations, satisfactory feed formulas were attained.

This knowledge was not kept a secret, and soon there appeared on the market a number of mixed feeds made up by poultry experts, and based on good results that these mixtures had made with fowls. So to-day the beginner can, with his few hens, rest assured that the high-grade feeds, already mixed, will produce good results and will give one a steady egg yield from any flock that is old enough to lay and is properly housed. Too many do not feed the fowls in the best way. Especially is this true now in the price of feeds, which is above normal. To feed but one or two grains and omit a good, dry mash, which is one of the essentials toward a good egg-production, is false economy. The growing pullets and older stock must be well fed to produce. This does not mean over-feeding, which is wasteful, yet with overfeeding one will obtain better results than under-feeding. A half-starved flock can do nothing toward producing eggs. The little they obtain goes only to keep body together and leaves nothing for the production of the egg, and to produce eggs in paying quantities the fowls must be well fed, and with feeds that contain every element that goes to not only maintain the hen's body, but to make the egg. In the high-grade mixed grains and mashes this can be found. The beginner, if using the dry mash, fed in hoppers that the fowls can at all times eat when hungry, can rest assured that the fowls are getting enough and the right kind of feed. In addition to this, a morning and night feed of mixed grains is the proper feeding system. Some poultry-keepers use self-feeders, which are regulated to feed a certain quantity of grain to a given number of fowls with some success.

Winter eggs are not so hard to obtain if the proper methods are followed. They consist of a good, well-ventilated poultry house, giving four square feet of floor space to each fowl, fresh water, grit, oyster shell and charcoal and a well-balanced mixture of poultry feeds. With this any well-matured pullet will lay, and any hen that has fully recovered from the moult; but the beginner should guard against the purchase of cheap stock that are not matured and which no feed will make produce eggs until they have reached maturity.

EGGS ARE "FANCY."

When fresh, clear and full bodied.

When shells are sound, clean, bright and of uniform color.

When they weigh 24 ounces or more to the dozen.

It pays to produce and market fancy eggs.

NOTES.

A dust bath of ashes, plus a handful of sulphur, will help banish parasites.

If fattening chickens are kept too long they go back and nothing will make them as good again.

Kill the fattened chickens at home—a journey reduces the weight of live ones.

A man who has been in the farm poultry business for five or six years, tells me that he no longer looks on it as a woman's job. "The one that makes a success of poultry, whether it be a man or woman, must make up his mind that it is one of the biggest jobs ever tackled." That is just what I have said all along. It costs a good many folks a lot of money to find it out, though.

Every hen shows certain physical signs which tend to prove whether she is a paying investment or not. If we had a cow that looked and acted as some hens do, wouldn't she start for the [illegible] before to-morrow morning? But because it is "only a hen" we let her go, never thinking that she is running us behind just as surely as the poor cow. It would be worth many dollars to most of us every year if we kept out the unprofitable hens. Let's do it.

ODD DISCOVERIES.

Origin of Starch From Corn, Silver Plating, and Brilliant Dye.

How to make starch from corn (maize) was discovered accidentally by Thomas Kingsford, a mechanic. One day he threw a mess of cornmeal mush into a garbage pail. His wife emptied some lye into the same pail, and in the morning when he emptied the pail he was astonished to find a small quantity of starch at the bottom.

Thomas Bolsover, a Sheffield mechanic, was mending the handle of a knife made of copper and silver. He saw these metals fuse together, and the idea of silver plating was born in his mind. He laid a thin plate of silver on a heavier one of copper and heated them, till the edge of the silver began to melt. He took them from the fire, let them cool slightly, then rolled and hammered them to the desired thickness. This was the origin of "Sheffield plate," all of which was made in this way, until electroplating was invented.

Cornelius Drebbel left a bottle of aqua regia (a mixture of nitric and muriatic acids) on a shelf. It fell over, the acid ran down over a window and dropped into a bottle containing an extract of cochineal. This turned to a vivid scarlet. Drebbel found that the acid had dissolved some of the tin of the window casing and the combination had produced the new color. A few experiments added the most brilliant color to the list of dyes.

The accident by which Roentgen discovered the X-rays is too recent to need repeating now.—New York World.

AN OPEN LETTER

From a Well Known Methodist Clergyman of Interest to All Who Are Sick

One of the best known ministers in the Hamilton conference is the Rev. Chas. E. Stafford, of Elora, Ont., who freely admits that he owes his present good health to Dr. Williams' Pink Pills. Mr. Stafford writes as follows: "Some years ago I was severely afflicted for a period of nearly four months. The leading physician in the town in which I was then stationed diagnosed my case as one of complete nervous prostration, brought on by overwork and which superinduced intercostal neuralgia and muscular rheumatism, from which I suffered the most excruciating pain night and day for weeks. So weak and helpless did I become that my attendants had to handle me like an infant, raising me up and laying me down with the greatest care, so intense were my sufferings. Acting on the advice of my doctor, and taking his medicine, I did not seem to improve. One afternoon, while suffering great pain, the editor of the paper published in the town, and who was a member of the church of which I was then pastor, urged me to try Dr. Williams' Pink Pills. I was sceptical as to the medicinal qualities of all proprietary medicines, but on the strong recommendation of the editor, who had great faith in the medicine, I decided to try them. To my great surprise and supreme delight, I soon found that the Pills were giving me relief, and after I had taken seven boxes I was fully restored to health. Dr. Williams' Pink Pills, under God, having made me a new man. Ever since I have been better and stronger physically than I had been for a number of years.

Three years ago, after an active ministry of forty-six years, I asked the Hamilton conference of the Methodist Church to grant me superannuation relation, which it did, but for more than two years I have been supplying a charge which necessitates a drive of twenty miles every Sabbath. To-day I am strong and hearty, without an ache or pain, and for my present physical condition I am indebted to Dr. Williams' Pink Pills, and can most heartily recommend them to the afflicted."

PACKING HINTS.

How to Take Care of Household Goods Before Moving.

For those who do their own packing a large pile of old newspapers will be found to be an indispensable requisite. In two or three folds the papers should be twisted and tied about the legs of chairs, tables and similar pieces of furniture. They should be mounted and fastened on all wooden framework. They may be made to serve as complete covering for almost any article of furniture.

Pictures of a size should be made into separate bundles in this way: Two or three layers of paper should be placed between pictures, the entire surface of the picture and frame being covered. Only the frame, not the glass, of the top picture should be covered, so that evidence of the breakable nature of the package may stare warningly at the moving men.

Then three or four sheets of paper should be folded lengthwise into long straps about five or six inches wide to form a dependable buffer. One of these straps should be brought under the bottom of the pile of pictures centrewise of the width and another centrewise of the length, with the band long enough to stretch well over the frame of the top picture. Straps may be lengthened by lapping one over the other for a few inches. Heavy twine should be used to fasten the straps and make the bundle firm.

The glass of all mirrors should be left uncovered to temper the zeal of those handling them.

Strong wooden boxes of the soap box model are best for holding books. With sectional bookcases each unit may be moved separately without disturbing the contents, care being taken to place a heavy covering of paper on top and secure the whole with twine or rope.

Barrels are the usual receptacles for glassware, chinaware and not too fragile bric-a-brac. But the precautionary measure of providing a cushion at the bottom of the barrel must never be neglected, so that any settling in transportation shall not be disastrous to the contents. An old quilt is ideal for this purpose; lacking this a sufficient padding of rags may be substituted.

The resistance offered by newspaper rather than rag wrappings for the separate pieces insures a comforting promise of safety. Attention to close packing with heavy items at the bottom and light ones on top will well repay such discrimination.

Carpets and rugs should be thoroughly cleaned and sprayed lightly with turpentine for moth protection before being encased in prepared tar paper or newspaper.

So far as possible all effects should be placed in boxes, barrels or other large receptacles.

Master—Bill, your garage is as hot as an oven!

Chauffeur—Well, sir, that's where I make my bread!

Coal as a Charm.

In bygone England coal played a prominent part in popular superstition, but it was a very special kind of coal. It was found (or at any rate firmly believed to be found) under the root of the plantain on one day of the year—midsummer eve. And to its finder it brought not only immunity from "plague, carbuncle and burning," but also in the case of a maiden dreams of her future husband. A versatile charm and, with plantains so prolific, not rare. These "coal" were probably really old, discolored roots, but none of the faithful believers in them would have admitted that.—London Globe.

TOMMY ATKINS ON CANADIAN HOSPITAL

British Soldier Grows Enthusiastic Over the Work Done at Hospital in France.

DOCTOR AND HELP

Nurses, Too, Are Most Efficient and Care and Food Are the Best.

A British soldier, wounded and taken to No. 2 Canadian General Hospital, the pleasure should be his. In tal, in charge of Dr. Bethune, of this city, writes as follows about the institution:

Canadians will, as usual, speak for themselves, and what they will have to say that No. 2 Canadian General Hospital will doubtless reach the ears of those concerned. But as a British Tommy Atkins, to whom the hospitality of that super excellent institution has been freely and bountifully extended, I wish to weigh in with a few remarks.

Before this war I knew nothing about hospitals, except that, externally, they looked like jails. This refers, of course, to my own dear old moss-grown country.

One is not long in France, however (now that the shooting season has commenced) before accumulating quite a lot of second hand knowledge of hospitals. One of the most frequent troubles our boys spoke of as happening in hospitals out here was that they never could get enough to eat. Anyhow, I heard quite sufficient about hospitals to enable me to make up my mind that if it was a toss-up between me and some blue-grey German going to hospital, the pleasure should be his. In my case it turned out otherwise, as the said German had made other plans.

The nature and cause of my injuries are a matter of no general interest, so it will suffice to say that they were serious (to me) and called for expert attention and sympathetic nursing. By some strange stroke of luck I was sent to No. 2 Canadian General Hospital, and every day since I have thanked my stars for it. I was a surgical case, and so I was placed in X Ward, under the beneficial care of Captain Bethune and his charming and cheery band of attendant sisters.

I had never previously met you Canadians in bulk, and I knew, and cared very little about you. We Britishers are a bit that way, although we mean nothing particular by it, so don't get riled. Well, as soon as I was able to sit up and take notice, my first and strongest impression of you, as typified by the staff here, was your undeniable air of efficacy and self reliance. Of course, anybody can put on airs, but my impression was proved correct right up to the hilt! It was the real thing. Although I was in for what I believe is called a "major" operation, and my nerves were pretty well shattered. I went to the operating table with every confidence that Captain Bethune would see me through. I had no misgivings, no doubts.

As in my case, so all the others. Patients here are enthusiastic about X ward, No. 2 Canadian General Hospital, and leave it, as I shall, with regret. But none will ever forget the unremitting care and unflagging attention they have received here and will look back with pleasure to the many happy hours (yes, happy hours) they have had, and which they owe entirely to M. O. and the sisters.

I don't know how or where you recruit the sisters for this hospital, but they are the healthiest, happiest, kindest and best-looking girls I have ever seen within a hundred yards of any hospital.

Our ward (X) is canvas, and consists of a series of small marquees connected together. Each marquee holds five beds and can be closed off so as to be entirely self-contained. In the daytime the sides of the marquees are raised, and we have fresh air and sunshine to our heart's content. Electric light also. I have not seen this type of tent before. I notice it is patented and made by a firm in Ottawa. My compliments to them.

Now let's speak of food. Better interfere with a man's liberty than his food. But here we have both, plenty of liberty and plenty of food. Good food, nice food, well cooked. They say that God sends food and the devil sends work. We found this to be exactly the case in the trenches, so the change now is all the more appreciable. As to liberty, there are no irksome restrictions or red-tape regulations. Any ordinary decent man cannot do wrong here. All this helps to improve the general condition of the patient, as it is the little worries that annoy one and retard.

Much more could, and would, be said, but in the endeavor of a grateful patient to do full justice to an institution to which he owes so much; I wish to avoid even the appearance of overstatement, but, anyhow, we Britishers are not prone to gush.

To No. 2 Canadian General Hospital and X ward in particular the thoughts of innumerable British Tommies will ever gratefully turn, and on behalf of all my comrades who have known the earnest care and kindly attention of Capt. Bethune, the thrice-blessed sisters, orderlies and staff, generally, I am only too delighted to have an opportunity of making public avowal of this.—Keith Lawder, 5th Seaforth Highlanders, 124 Elizabeth street, Blackpool, Lancashire, England.

Kipling's Nightingale.

Rudyard Kipling was once telling a guest about a nightingale that frequented his gardens. He said: "I know all the popular illusions about the nightingale, but the truth is, he's a blackguard with a gift of music in his throat that he can't control—a noisy, swashbuckling blackguard of the garden. He comes here at night, and he proceeds to abuse all his enemies for all he's worth. It's feathered profanity in a disguise of harmony, and he gets so worked up over it that he finally ends in an inarticulate gurgle."

Mons is 38 miles south-south west of Brussels and is the capital of Hainault, with 25,000 inhabitants. It is situated on a hill above the Trouille and originated in a fortress built there by Julius Caesar. It was held by Prince Louis of Orange against the Spaniards for nearly four months in 1572, captured by Louis XIV. in 1691. It was restored to Spain in 1697 and again occupied by the French in 1701. After the battle of Malplaquet in 1709 it was captured by Prince Eugene. Mons is the centre of the chief coal mining district of Belgium, known as Le Borinage, the inhabitants being called "Borains". There is a school of mines and a late Gothic cathedral.

Shetland Islands—The most northerly British possession in Europe, lies to the northeast of the Orkneys and number over 100, with a combined area of 551 square miles. The surface of the islands is irregular, often rising into hills of considerable elevation, and their scenery is for the most part bleak and drear. The coast is much indented and very precipitous, and it is said that no spot in Shetland is more than three miles from the sea, so that the report of the discovery in the islands of a German submarine base is not unlikely to be true. Only twenty-seven of the islands of the group are inhabited, and in some cases only then by lighthouse attendants and shepherds. The total population amounted, in 1901, to 28,166 persons, of whom 15,751 were women. Agriculture is primitive and the soil poor, but barley, oats, potatoes and turnips are grown. The chief manufacture of the Shetland Islands is that of knitted goods, much fine work being turned out by the women, who also do the farm work, the men being occupied in fishing, which is the mainstay of the inhabitants.

TORONTO FAT STOCK SHOW

The premium lists of the Toronto Fat Stock Show, to be held at the Union Stock Yards, Toronto, in December are just out, and carry many new classes, among which are special prizes by the T. Eaton Co., Armour & Co., Wm. Davies Co., Walker House and Queen's Hotel. The secretary, Mr. C. F. Topping, of the Union Stock Yards, Toronto, would be glad to give premium list or any information on application.

Arabs and Girl Babies.

It is a sad day in an Arab home when a girl is born. The musicians who have come to the house with their drums, their shepherd's pipes and all their strange musical instruments burst into wild wailing if the door is seen to open slowly and a head shake silently and sadly and then withdraw behind the closed door. All the rare food which has been prepared in the hopes that the new arrival is a boy is put away and the waiting guests depart from the house. For why, they say, should one feast and have music when another superfluous woman has been brought into the world? Though human nature is what it is, the little girl is not wholly unloved. She is given some pretty name, such as, translated, would be "star," or "dawn," or "pretty," or "pleasant." When a boy is born the rejoicing, on the contrary, is hilarious in the extreme. Welcomes are chanted by stringed instruments, the praises of the family are sung, and a forecast of the great deeds to be done by the son are recited.—Exchange.

A Startling Hat.

A lady's hat which would no doubt create as great a sensation to-day as it did at the time of its first appearance in 1382 was that worn by Blanche de Bourbon, queen of Castile, wife of Peter the Cruel. It cost £35 and was made in Paris. The hat itself was composed of [illegible] and covered with [illegible] garnets and [illegible] in the [illegible] picking acorns of pearls from the oak and scattering them to the swine below. Birds were singing in the trees and at the foot were bees sucking honey from the flowering springing up from the verdure.—London Mail.

AFTER MOVING INTO OUR NEW THEATRE, our first thought was to have things arranged so as to insure the comfort of patrons.

This accomplished, our next effort has been to provide them with "Photo Plays" of a far higher type than the ones shown heretofore. This took time as that class of pictures are rather difficult to book, owing to the great demand for them in the cities.

However we have succeeded and on Monday and Tuesday Oct. 4 and 5

We will show the first episode of the Masterful Production

Ye Mothers of Bruce.

Like the lioness keeps hold the cubs that were born;
Like the tigress stands guard o'er her young ones when free,
So the mothers of Bruce stand to barricade the nest as you.
If you would [illegible] to sign up your dears.
O ye mothers of Bruce, you are true loving mothers,
And the love of a mother commands our respect,
But your sons should be fighting the tyrants with others,
Which they cannot do now while you hold them so close!
You mothers of Bruce, you are wronging your dear ones,
You will rob them of chances to prove they are men.
You wrong them in keeping them penned up so near you,
And your wrong will be shown e'er the big war shall end.
To ye mothers of Bruce, dear old Canada's calling,
And saying [illegible] up for your duty [illegible],
Send forward your noblest nor fear of their falling,
They will fall for the mother to each one so dear."
Between love for your sons and your duty to country,
Ye mothers of Bruce you are standing today
And proud and exalted the heart of the mother,
Who will in her greatness not make her son stay.
Ye mothers of Bruce, we are all sympathetic,
We know it is hard for we know they are dear
But the call is for all and the call is emphatic:
Ye mothers of Bruce your stern duty is clear.

RIVERSDALE

We are sorry to have to report the illness of Mr. Gilbert Chatteau.

Mr. Lawrence Ballinger is now in his remodelled house which presents a very imposing appearance. It is certainly a credit to Riversdale.

Owing to the recent rains, the farmers in this locality are beginning to fear for the welfare of their potato crops.

We are very pleased to say that Ronnie Brown is making very satisfactory progress towards recovery and will soon be around again.

On Friday night of last week the young people of this community gathered at the home of Miss Pearl Thompson to bestow on her many beautiful handkerchiefs. Miss Thompson purposes leaving for Victoria Hospital Training School, London, and her friends wish her every success.

FORMOSA

Mrs. Jos Barrow, (nee Miss Liddie Hergott) of Detroit who has been visiting her relatives here for some time returned home last week.

Mr. J. A. Johnston of Mildmay was a business visitor here last Thursday.

Mr. E. G. Briggs of Walkerton was here on business last week.

G Weiler & Son erected a building for the manufacture of apple barrels to replace the building which burned down in the big fire early in the summer.

The Mildmay football team failed to put in an appearance last Saturday. Guess the "Pure Sports" showed themselves to be still troubled with the yellow streak.

The death of Mrs. Frederick Kroetch occurred last Saturday. Age 88 years and 6 months. The remains were interred here on Monday.

The winter's supply of coal for the church was delivered this week.

John Parvis motored to town on business on Monday.

Miss Lille Schetter and brother Harold spent Monday in Mildmay.

The delay in the shipping of the mantles for the street lights has postponed the installing of the same. The Company are in hopes of having them in operation soon.

Style Information about Ladies and Children's Coats.

Practical Simple fashions dominate. This fact is apparant in all lines thus bringing into prominence the advantages that good tailoring can give Military Effects and Russian styles are strongly featured.

Coats are long with generous flare and have high buttoning, close-fitting collars, belts and pocket are much used and all pile fabrics are very strongly favored. Also quiet checks and tweed mixtures.

Darker colors lead blues being foremost with African Brown, green and black as principle selling shades. The tendency towards simple conservative lines enhances more than ever the value of Northway perfection of tailoring fit and shape keeping qualities.

Plain cloth and tweed coats at $10.00, $11.00, $12.00, $14.00, $16.00 and $18.00.

Curl cloth corduroy and plush in newest styles at $12.00 $14.00, $16.00, $18.00, $20.00 and $25.00.

We strongly recommend early purchasing this fall, as every line is advancing in price and we now have the best selection, at the lowest prices we will have this season. Come and see.

When the new publisher of the Telescope came to town from St. Marys last week he found only one representative of his native town, living in Walkerton, "Charlie" Brown. Two days later Mr. Brown called at the Telescope to say that he and his family were leaving for Stratford where he has secured a good position. He assured us there was nothing personal in his leaving town so soon after we had arrived. Charlie makes good friends wherever he goes. We are sorry he is leaving. His father, Mr. Wm. Brown, one of the pioneers of St. Marys, who has been residing with his son lately, is accompanying him to Stratford.

"Should We as Christians Rejoice in a Victory by the Allies?" was the subject of a powerful sermon at the Methodist church, Sunday night, by Rev. D. A. Walker. His answer to the question was that we not only should, but could not do otherwise. The present war was a war of principles as opposite as the poles, as widely opposed as Napoleon and Christ. Christians, most of all should rejoice in an allied victory. With the loyal support of every subject of the British Empire of which we are assured, victory will come to the cause of the Allies. At the morning service a very pleasing solo was sung by Mr. George Wilson, leader of the choir.

Soldier's Jam Shower.

The Daughters of the Empire will hold a Jam Shower on Friday afternoon and all day Saturday, Oct. 15th and 16th at the Market Place. Ladies will be there to receive donations of Jam Jelly or Marmalade in either pint or quart jars with glass tops. We hope all the women of the community will help in sending a treat to the boys.

Contribute One Day's Pay

While in convention here last week the teachers of East Bruce did a very creditable thing in the way of making a contribution to the Patriotic and Red Cross funds. It was unanimously agreed that each teacher should give one day's pay to this great cause. As there are 117 teachers in this institution this contribution will amount to nearly $400.

Takes Agency for Car.

Mr. Geo. Lettner was in Toronto last week and while there contracted for agency of the famous Chevrolet car. This motor car is being constructed to complete with the Ford and is equipped with all the latest devices self-starter, electric lights etc. As it retails at a very low figure, there should be a great demand for this car in the coming season.

Marriage in Brant

The marriage takes place today. (Thursday), October 7th, at the home of Mr. and Mrs. Frank Rennie, in Brant, of their youngest daughter, Annie Irene, to Mr. Frank G. Eidt of the Telescope. After a wedding trip to Hamilton, Niagara Falls and New York. Mr. and Mrs. Eidt will take up their residence in Mr. T. E. Attwood's cottage, opposite the Lutheran church.

Southampton takes Trophy

The famous Brock McAuley came to Walkerton with a rink of Southampton bowlers on Thursday last and succeeded in carrying off the Bowman Trophy, defeating Capt. O. E. Klein's rink by a score of 22-13. Brock took the coveted dish back to the lake with him and as the season is almost over, the much-played-for trophy will probably find a resting place in the Southampton bowler's club house for the winter.

Deaths at House of Refuge.

Two deaths have occurred at the Bruce County House of Refuge during the past week. Michael Heeney, a native of Ireland who resided in Chepstow for many years, and has been an inmate of the institution for but a short time, passed away on Thursday last at the age of 79 years and 10 months. The remains were taken to Chepstow for burial. On Monday, John Sherry of English birth who has been in the Refuge for many years died at the age of 81 years. The remains were interred in the House of Refuge burying ground on Tuesday.

Pte. Turner Wounded.

In the casualty lists of Wednesday, there appeared the name of another Walkerton boy in the person of Private Robt. M. Turner. Bob's name was published in the list of wounded, but no further details as to the nature of his injury, or his chances of recovery have been received by his relatives here. Pte. Turner was formerly on the wireless guard at Tobermory, and shortly after enlisting in the 34th Battalion was placed in a special detail company which proceeded to France to reinforce the 1st Batt. Pte. Turner was a clean upright young man and his many friends here hope for his speedy recovery.

Excellent Patriotic Address.

The East Bruce teacher's convention met on Sept 30th, and Oct 1st. Under their auspices a public meeting was held in the town hall on Thursday evening for the benifit of the Red Cross Society. Mr. M.G. Cameron K. C. of Goderich of the Patriotic Speakers League gave an eloquent address on "The War and Canadian Patriotism". The speech was a ringing summons to the young men of Canada to rally to the call the cause of freedom and enlist to service for King and Country. while many Canadians of native birth were fighting side by side with the soldiers of the Empire. Many more will have to enlist before we could claim to be doing our fair share in proportion to our population. Mr. Cameron's address was enriched by many literary and poetic allusions and was pronounced a masterpiece by those who heard it. The Rev. Mr. Elliot of Goderich spoke briefly a few well chosen words. The Walkerton orchestra, a massed choir under the leadership of Mr. E. H. Leeson Miss Beck pleasing soloist and the inimitable elocutionist Mr Clark added by their voluntary service to the enjoyment of the evening.

OUR ANNUAL HOLIDAY

According to our usual custom, the Telescope will take its annual holiday. The Telescope will not be issued next Thursday, October 14th, but the office will be open all week for business and to handle job printing.

Men Wanted for Training Corps

The Rev. R. Perdue has been appointed representative for the Inns of Court Officers Training Corps London, England. The commanding officer feels that young men qualified to be trained as officers are joining the army as privates. Suitable young men are invited to make application which will be immediately forwarded to headquarters. Further information will be gladly given to enquirers.

Death of David Huether.

David Huether, proprietor of the Pacific Hotel, Wiarton, died on Sunday evening, aged 52 years, death was due to Brights Disease. The late Mr. Huether has been a residence of Wiarton for 25 years, and was one of the best-known men in this district. He was prominent in Masonic circles and an enthusiastic bowler and curler, and a public-spirited citizen. For a number of years he was President of the Board of Trade. The deceased is survived by a widow and one son. Mr. A. D. Huether, of the City Engineer's Department, Toronto. Interment took place at Neustadt on Wednesday afternoon.

Little Girl Deranged.

A little girl, twelve years old was brought here from Lucknow to be placed in charge of the Children's Aid Society on Saturday. Word was sent that the child was a 'little frail' which was understood to refer to her physical condition. Shortly after her arrival here the child showed herself to be seriously deranged and very difficult to manage. The authorities here feel very strongly that the child should not have been sent here at all but to an institution where she could secure the proper attention and treatment. On Tuesday afternoon, after having been examined by two doctors, the child was brought before Magistrate Tolton and declared insane. The magistrate placed her in charge of Rev. D. McLennan, Children's Aid Society officer, until the arrival of an attendant to take her to the asylum.

Reutz-O'Connor.

A very pretty wedding was solemnized in the R. C. church, Walkerton on Tuesday morning of this week when Miss Mary O'Connor, daughter of Mr. and Mrs. Jas. O'Connor became the bride of Mr. Jos. Reutz, one of Brant township's prosperous young farmers. The ceremony was performed by Rev Fr. Haller in the presents of a large number of friends of the bride and groom. Miss Bessie O'Connor of Toronto, sister of the bride, attended as bridesmaid, while Mr. P. J. Maloney, principal of the Walkerton Business College acted as groomsman. After the marriage the wedding party repaired to the home of the bride in the east ward, where a sumptuous wedding dinner was served, and when in the evening a large number of guests gathered to celebrate the event and extend congratulation to the young couple. The bride was the recepient of many useful and costly presents. Mr. and Mrs. Reutz left on the early G. T. R. train Wednesday on a trip to Detroit, and Chicago and other cities, on their return from which they will take up their residence on the groom's farm just west of town.

Bruce Press Association Meets

The annual meeting of the Bruce County Press Association was held in Port Elgin on Friday, Oct 1. There was a good attendance of the county publishers present. Many questions of deep interest were discussed. It was decided to boost recruiting in the county and try to put up to our available young men their duty in this crisis in the history of the Empire. A matter of deep consideration was the increased cost of printing material all along the line; These have entered into the production of papers to such extent that publishers find they are producing papers at a loss. After mature deliberation it was decided to raise the weekly newspaper to $1.50 per annum. It was also decided that this raise would be based upon a gradual raise. All papers that are paid in advance by Jan. 31. 1916, will be accepted at the old rate of $1.00 per annum. After that date $1.50 will be exacted. After May 1, 1916. all weekly papers will be $1.50 per annum.

The following officers were elected:—Honorary President, Wm. Wesley, Walkerton, the oldest publisher in the county. President, J. J. Hunter, Kincardine; Vice President, H. H. Vandusen, Tara; Secretary-Treasurer, D. A. McKenzie, Paisley; Executive Committee, the officers and E. E. Short, Southampton; H. E. Steincamp, Tiverton; A. Wesley, Walkerton.

The association welcomed Mr. Lorne A. Eedy, into their ranks; he having purchased the Walkerton Telescope,

Thanksgiving Dance

A Thanksgiving dance will be held Monday evening Oct. 11th. in the town hall. Star-light Orchestra will furnish the music. All welcome. Admission 75c per couple.

Soldier Boys Here

The following Walkerton boys who are training in the 34th and 71st Battalions at London, spent Sunday at their homes here:—Frank Zettel, Ernie Cartwright, Clarence and William Krueger, Dave Seiling, Harry Wettlaufer, William Wolfe, Walter Bryce, Dave Netske, Lou Anderson, Arthur Dean and Frank Schefter. This is the last visit home of the boys of the 34th, as it is expected that they will leave for England in the near future.

A Worthy Cause.

Mrs. Havill, president of the Walkerton Humane Society has received a very urgent appeal for support of a fund for a motor horse ambulance to be used by the Ontario Brigade in removing wounded horses from the battle line to the Veterinary hospital. Col. Ross of No 1 Field Ambulance Corps at the front states that this is the most crying need at the present time. The difficulty and suffering entailed upon both horses and men in an effort to remove the suffering creatures to where they can be cared for is incalculable. The War Office has approved the movement, stipulating that the ambulance be of "War Office" design and to cost approximately $5500. On Monday evening the directors of the Walkerton Humane Society met at Mrs. Havill's and decided to make a grant of $25 They hope to augment this amount to at least $50, by giving a number of teas, possibly one in connection with each church. The public will have an opportunity of helping along this very worthy work by patronizing the teas.

Will Present Walkerton's Claims

In case the Militia Department follows out its policy as at present outlined, to quarter soldiers for the coming winter in a number of towns and cities of the province, a determined effort will be made to secure a share of the troops for Walkerton. This matter was discussed by the Military Day Committee when they met last Friday evening to wind up business, and a committee was named to wait on the Board of Trade to see what building would be available for troops in case the Militia Department decides to quarter soldiers in the various towns. This committee consists of:—Mayor Lippert, Reeve, E. A. McNab, John Rowland, George McKay, Otto E. Klein, A. P. Johnston. Sir Adam Beck is understood to be making strong representations to the Department to allow the 70th and 71st regiments to remain in London. Whether he succeeds or not will be known when the Militia Department announces its policy in the course of a few days. It is pointed out that there would be accommodation here for any number of troops that the Department would be likely to send. The vacant Public School building and Armories will easily accommodate 300. The exhibition grounds and the armoury grounds make excellent parade grounds. Bruce County has sent already between three and four hundred of her men for Overseas service; besides setting an example to other counties in the matter of contribution to the various Patriotic Funds, so it is felt that in case the soldiers are distributed among the different centres, it is only fair that Bruce should have a share.

East Bruce Teachers Association.

The East Bruce Teachers held their convention in Walkerton on Thursday and Friday, Sept. 30th and Oct. 1st, 1915. Fine weather and a good program combined to make the meeting a most successful one. The principal speaker was Mr. Radcliffe, principal of London Normal School. He spoke on Composition, and taught a lesson in Literature to a Fourth Book class which was both interesting and of great practical value to the teachers Addresses were also given by the President, Miss Gowan. Rev. Mr. Perdue, Mr. Kid and Mr. Wendt. Mr. Sanderson, principal of Chesley public school, explained very clearly the proposed Bill for the Superannuation of teachers which is at present before the Legislature of Ontario. The matter was thoroughly discussed and the following resolution was carried unanimously "That we approve of the Superannuation Scheme but respectfully request the Legislature to consider a guaranteed minimum return of contributions in case of withdrawal or death. On Thursday evening there was a Patriotic Concert in Town Hall under the auspices of the Association. The teachers had the pleasure of hearing a stirring address on the war by Mr. M. G. Cameron of Goderich. The proceeds were donated to the Red Cross fund. Before adjourning on Friday afternoon the teachers resolved to each give a day's pay to the fund which the Daughters of the Empire are raising for the purpose of buying a motor ambulance for the 71st Batt. The officers for next year are: Pres. J. T. Kidd, of Mildmay, Vice-Pres. W. Wendt, of Mildmay, Sec.y M. G. Wallace Chesley.

Jocelin's Penance

Then he paused. "What if I only looked into her chamber to see if all is well? What harm can rise from just one look? Surely sin is in intention!" Jocelin gave neither conscience nor reason time to argue the point—softly, he crossed to the low doorway leading to Rohese's room—and entered. A faint light from the brazier flooded the little chamber. A toilet table stood in the centre of the room, the firelight glinting on the brass and silver furnishings. By its side on a stool held in a silken heap, Rohese's clothing. Jocelin touched it. It seemed as if the dainty garments were still warm from the contact with her sweet body. Quicker he moved now, more softly, his slender, black-robed figure flitting through the shadowy room like some dark phantom of the night. It hovered for a moment round the curtained couch, and then it paused, and with trembling hand Jocelin drew the curtain. Rohese lay with her head turned toward him, her head half tilted backward, and her lips parted softly, and the red firelight played caressingly over her white neck and bosom; her glistening hair streaming all about her on the rich satin pillows, just as he had fancied it a moment since. One rounded limb was half disclosed, and lay white as marble against its rich, dark background; the taper foot tinted to rose beneath; the oval nails like burnished ivory. Jocelin's heart stood still, and then gave a great bound, as if it would leap from his bosom. The hot blood rushed to his head; his breath came fast as he stood gazing; forgetful of everything save that one throbbing, panting, wild desire to have and hold that warm, white beauty; to crush it close to him; to drink its sweetness, and never let it go! With a low, inarticulate cry he leaned forward and clasped Rohese in his arms, fastening his burning lips upon hers, and feasting on their dewy sweetness.

In the dark opening of the Gate chamber a figure paused a moment, and the leering face and ferret eyes of Brother Walter peered in as some dire fiend would gaze upon a scene in Paradise. Then it disappeared quickly as it had come, like a dream flitting through a sleeper's brain. Jocelin, passion mad, bent his head to take further toll of the sweet prisoner's lips, as she awoke with a cry of terror which brought him to his senses. Then with one wild look of despair, and a faltered plea for pardon, Jocelin released her and fled from the room; on, on through corridor, down the stairway and outside Bradfield, through colonnades, up terraces, in the cold moonlight through dark vaulted halls, until he reached his cell, where he fell upon his pallaisse, face downward, moaning in an agony of shame, and clutching at the straw.

The nocturnal bell sounded, but he did not heed its call. Later he rose and slipped his robe from him, as the morning sunshine touched with pitying fingers of light his livid face, contorted in an agony of prayer, and his blood-streaked back and sides, as he knelt before his crucifix, crying, "Peccavimi! Peccavimi!", wielding with unfaltering hand the blood-stained scourge.

CHAPTER XVIII.

Alas for Jocelin! When that morrow dawned on which he had proposed to make such a valiant stroke for liberty, it found him exhausted by his vigil, and the cruel flagellation to which he had subjected himself, too languid to do aught save lie upon his straw, and follow the same round his mind had been traversing all the long, long night. What was his intent? What were his desires? What were Rohese's thoughts of so gross an insult? How would it all end? was what this poor, self-accusing creature asked himself over and over. As to the latter question, he little recked how near was its answering; for Jocelin thought, as do all young and untried souls in Sorrow's shadow, when Anguish brings all her furies to scourge dying Hope and Joy, that this present woe could have no bitterer aftermath. But naught in this world is superlative, save death, and even that can hardly be called so, as there lies something beyond it. So while this wretched man asked himself, "What will be the result?" Brother Walter, early closeted with the Abbot, was bringing about a speedy ending.

Walter the Medicus was not wicked, yet his was one of those distorted natures in which curiosity, distrust and envy lurked like toads beneath a stone, only waiting the hand of opportunity to uncover them. Thus it was with the firm consciousness of good faith he told the Abbot all he had suspected, and what he had seen in Rohese's chamber, though the fact that Jocelin was handsome, popular, skilled in the arts, and favored by the Abbot may have colored the recital.

Samson heard him in silence; his firm jaw set like a trap of steel; but though his piercing eyes searched the informer's face, as if he would penetrate the shriveled soul of him, he could detect no deceit therein, and was forced to think what it tore his heart-strings to believe.

"It shall be sifted," said he at length, "thoroughly, and at once. Go bid the Prior assemble all the brethren in the Chapter house, and straightway I'll come hither. Mind ye, I say all," he repeated impressively, as Walter departed, his voice slightly trembling, for he could not bear to mention Jocelin's name, for him, Abbot Samson loved best of all his household, and often thought, "Had it been permitted that I should have a son, he would have been like this boy."

Left alone, the Abbot paced the parlor, tugging at his grizzled beard, frowning and muttering as he paced, and after a few moments passed into the offertory, where on his knees before the shrine he prayed for guidance to do firmly and justly what was to be done; especially pleading for power to restrain the anger and indignation surging in his heart against this untoward offender. Yet, however much the ermined of soul love those of meaner mould, they can never quite do them justice, for, living above the temptations with which they are beset, they are unable to sympathize with weakness.

Brother Walter was too wise to tell the Prior why the chapter was to be assembled, [illegible] Norman drew his own conclusions from the [illegible] shook his head dubiously as the monks filed into the chapter room, two hundred [illegible] benches on either side. Here they strong, and filled the long oaken walled, chattering like schoolboys on the probable cause of the summons, but when the Abbot entered with Rohese, white and tremulous, and Mistress Mary (fresh from a stern interrogation), in floods of tears, expressive glances were exchanged, as if each would say to his fellow, "This smacks of some excitement, brother!"

Seats were placed for the two maids near the Abbot's chair. The clerk of the chapter called the roll, each monk replying, "Ad sum," until all had answered to their names. Nay, not all—where is my Lord Abbot's own chaplain? And why looks my lord so grim when Jocelin of Brakelond answers not unto his name?

"Bring him hither," said the Abbot. His tone made them start; 'twas like the menace of distant thunder, and a hush fell over the assembly like that which presages a storm. Presently the messenger returned, followed by the delinquent. The moment he entered, Jocelin knew the worst had come; and with the last desperate courage of one who fights for his life against many foes, he drew his spare form erect and, steadying his twitching features, came forward with calm, slow tread; not to his accustomed seat, but straight to the Abbot's chair, where, with a respectful obeisance, he folded his arms and stood, waiting for the accusation. Rohese crimsoned at sight of him, and clutched her tirewoman by the hand; for Mary, aroused by her cry, had reached her side on yesternight in time to see the intruder flee across the Gate chamber.

Darker and darker grew the Abbot's face, until it seemed to the frightened monks that the room was filled with gloom, while in the suppressed tones of a man who fears to trust himself, he addressed them: "My children, it is in shame and anger that I reveal to you that deadly sin hath entered these hallowed walls, and a stain fallen on the honor of our house. Woe's me, I—and I have been the indirect cause, in that I nursed a viper in my bosom," thrusting a shaking finger at Jocelin.

"Before God and the saints, and this chapter here assembled, I, Samson, Abbot and Lord of St. Edmundsbury, by testimony of Walter de Medicus, and Mary, tirewoman to Rohese de Cokefield, do accuse Jocelin of Brakelond, monk of the Benedictine order, affirming that he is false to the letter of his vows, hath failed in obedience and chastity; hath at night entered the chamber of our ward, Rohese de Cokefield; that he was driven hence by her screams, and the arrival of her tirewoman."

The silence was unbroken; save, far back in the hall, an aged Norman whispered in his neighbor's ear, "Body of the saints, the penalty is death by living sepulcherture."

"What say'st thou, lecherous monk?" thundered the Abbot. "Betrayer of thy Lord's trust, renegade, would-be ravisher; wilt not thy master, Satan, put answer in thy mouth? Speak, I command thee!"

Jocelin cast a hunted look around, such as a drowning man would cast on the vanishing earth and sky. He dared not glance at Rohese, but he met the Abbot's contemptuous look with one of mournful entreaty.

"My Lord," he answered, "I do confess that I went thither, but by the wounds of Christ, I swear I meditated no evil. I love the lady, my Lord, and passion overwhelmed reason. Indeed, I meant no harm."

At this weak defence, a low hiss went up from the chapter. The Abbot stilled it with a look.

"Is it good, wretched wight, to seize upon a helpless maid alone, half-naked in her bed? S'death, thou addest foolery to thy crime? Doth think to trick us with such a pouch-mouthed whine? 'Indeed, I meant no evil!' We all were men, sirrah, before we ever were monks. God wot! And prone to sin as sparks fly up. O spawn of evil, seek not thus to trick us with a puny tale no school brat would believe! Come, midnight prowler, hast thou no other safe defence than this?"

"I can say no more," answered the despairing monk, flinging up his arms wildly to heaven, as if for justice there.

"Then, another can and shall. Walter de Medicus, stand forth!" So Walter stood forth and told his story, ending, by way of justification, "Indeed, methought them in the very lists of love, else would I never have told the dread tale!" But he went no further, for Samson, with eyes aflame, struck him full in the mouth with clenched fist. "Remove him, shackled, to the tower!" and those nearest him right gladly obeyed.

"Foul bird which fouls its own fair nest," the Abbot thundered; "who dares insult a pure and virtuous maid—deep wronged and shamed by this audacious break? Let me but sense such a thought in any man's mind, and by the saints, I'll flay him for to pluck it out. Thus doth sin breed sin, my sons. We'll fast till Ember day, and each do double penance to purge us from such vile contamination."

"Brethren of St. Edmund's holy shrine, I command ye each to rise as his name is called, and with prayerful consideration, answer ye, is this Jocelin innocent or guilty?"

There was a pause, then the notes of a chant rose to the dim rafters of the chapter house, gaining strength and power, as each monk, taking up the song, rose in place and stood ready to give verdict 'Qui tollis peccata mundi miserere nobis!' And as the last solemn note died away, the long roll was called and one hundred and ninety-nine voices answered, one after the other, "Guilty, my Lord!"

There was the sound of a fall, a cry from Mistress Mary, and the Abbot turned to see his ward in a limp heap on the floor, the maid exclaiming, "She is dead, my sweet lady, she is dead!" It was but a swoon, and when she had been borne to the cooler air of the antechamber, and ministered to, she lay, moaning, with her head on Mary's lap. An exclamation from the girl, who was eagerly listening to what went on in the chapter room, caused her to sit up, crying wildly, "What is't? Tell me, good minion!"

"Ah, Holy Mother," cried the distracted maid, "'tis torture in the Rachentege till he confess his sinful intent; then punishment at the Abbot's pleasure. The cruel, cruel Lord truly he rageth like a wolf."

"What, girl, what matter of thing is the Rachentege?"

"Wait, Madam, and I'll tell thee. List, now, Brother Tristian speaks:" and truly it was the tremulous voice of the old gardener who alone of all the brethren, dared to speak a word for the renegade monk.

"Nay, I care not for him, wench! This Rachentege—it hath a fearful sound; describe it, I command thee!"

"Why, 'tis an engine which it taketh three to carry (I've been told). 'Tis fastened to a beam, and hath a sharp iron which goeth round a man's throttle, so he can in no ways sit, lie or sleep but he beareth the weight of the iron."

Rohese drew a sobbing breath. "Mary," she demanded fiercely, "do'st believe that Jocelin came to the Gate chamber with evil intent?"

"Who can say, Madam?" answered the tire-woman. "But, as our Lord Abbot says, 'man is prone to sin!'"

But Rohese was not listening to this evasive answer. She was now intent on Brother Tristian, muttering as she strained her ears to catch every sound of his voice, "Jocelin loves me, and he meant no evil. For my sake he will be tortured—for my sake, mayhap suffer death!"

Within the chapter room Tristian was entering a broken plea for mercy on account of the offender's youth, and his erstwhile devotion to the Abbot's service. "Bethink thee, Dominie, on thy return from thy mission to Rome, when thou were gyved within the prison tower, the youth denied himself food, and risking punishment and broken bones, climbed the Abbey wall to succor thee!" They all expected the Abbot to break forth in invectives against this poor petitioner; but he answered kindly:

"Rest thee, old frere. Thou dost well to remind us of such past benefits: a good deed, however small, deserves rewarding. The decrees of the Abbot of St. Edmunds should not be variable; yet, because of this past kindness and because thou, in brotherly love, hath dared to succor the outcast, I will mix mercy with my just decree. Jocelin of Brakelond, fallen monk, brother of our household no more, when thou, by corrective torture, hast come to confess thy sin, I, Abbas Dominus, do waive the penalty of living sepulchreture which thy offence doth merit, and do sentence thee to life imprisonment in the Oubliette. We can punish the vile body, but God alone can deal with that evil spirit which hath so perverted it. May God have mercy on thy lost and ruined soul. Amen. Remove the prisoner."

At this sentence, groans rose from the lips of many, and as Jocelin was led away old Tristian, rending his garments and beating his breast, ran from the chapter room with tears raining down his cheeks, crying brokenly, "'Twas I who let the Devil loose in St. Edmunds. Culpa mea, culpa mea!" And the wondering monks exclaimed, "This dreadful happening hath turned his old brain!"

While the Abbot made his severe indictment, Jocelin stood like a statue, alike indifferent to punishment or mercy, but when the stern voice ceased and he was being led away, he seemed to waken as if from a trance, and stretched tremulous hands to the grim Judge, crying with a look of hunted fear, as he passed from sight, "Mercy, my Lord, mercy!"

'Twas then a fair, dishevelled figure sped up the aisle, with tangled locks falling about a resolute young face, and Rohese knelt at the Abbot's feet, echoing her lover's [illegible] cry: "Mercy, my Lord, mercy! Father, I will confess my fault. Torture him not, for Christ's sweet sake, for Jocelin came [illegible] mine own appointing."

Abbot Samson turned ashen, and he loosed the girl's clinging arms, and stood looking down at her, disdain, then anger and sorrow struggling for mastery. Then his face hardened; his brow lowered. "Remove thee, woman!" he cried; but Rohese laid her cheek against his silken shoe, and the Abbot, pushing her from him with his foot, unheeding poor Mary's frantic shrieks of "It is not true, Lord Abbot, let me speak!" cried, "Remove the helman," and strode from the hall.

CHAPTER XIX.

'Twas the close of a dreary wintry day; winter had now set in, for two weeks Rohese had been locked fast in the Gate chamber. The Abbot had not seen her since the day of Jocelin's trial. It seemed as if he waited for time to cool his wrath before he decided how he should punish her who had proved his favorite's undoing. So Rohese passed her imprisonment as best she might, longing, yet dreading for the hour to come when she should be summoned before the Abbot for his final decision. Mistress Mary had been sent back to Cokefield, weeping and protesting, with the rest of her lady's attendants. A surly, black-browed monk brought Rohese her scanty fare, and save for his daily coming she had been utterly alone. At first she had wept continually, more for Jocelin than for herself, but gradually the full horror of her position dawned upon her. In the chapter room on that fateful morning, seeking to save the wretched monk from torture, she had told the kindly lie, in the purity of her heart little thinking of its full import. But with many hours of lonely reflection, she had begun to ponder on the look of horror the monks' faces had worn, and the white rage and anguish depicted on the Abbot's countenance. Now she began to perceive that in the eyes of all she stood confessed a guilty thing, whose seductions had wooed a poor monk to his ruin. The trial was before her waking and sleeping, until in torture she prayed for some cord within her weary brain to break, that loss of sanity might blot out all remembrance of what had transpired.

As she sat hopelessly in the twilight, her face buried in her hands, a key turned in the door and her keeper entered. Usually surly and silent, he cleared his throat once or twice, as if to attract her attention, and as she glanced up in surprise, it seemed as if he looked at her significantly as he set down the wine and loaf which formed her daily sustenance. When he had gone, pushing them [illegible] aside, a look of surprise came over her face, and she lifted the loaf. Surely it was heavier than was its wont! On breaking it, a key and folded bit of parchment fell to the table. Rohese carried the parchment to the window, and with straining eyes read these words: "Wilt now believe the witch's prophecies, maid? I warned thee, but thou heedest not. If thou would'st save the monk from his dark prison, and thyself from the clutches of the Prioress Rosamund, for Samson will send thee thither [illegible] like a rat. God wots, let thy wit after the nocturnal bell rings (this key unlocks all doors). Go thee to Bradfield gate, unbar it and haste thee, for ere cock crow thou must be away to the [illegible]; one outside, to aid the Abbey wall through the forest [illegible] fall thee not, till thou hast run but half the distance to the prison tower. Wait thou there."

COTTON THREAD.

Its Invention Was a Case of Necessity Caused by War.

Curiously enough, it was a war that brought about the revolution in the manufacture of sewing thread. When Napoleon occupied north Germany in 1807 the supply of silk from Hamburg, which was used in making heddles, or the loom harness, in Paisley, was cut off.

Unless some substitute could be found the weaving industry of Paisley would be ruined. Peter Clark experimented with cotton warp yarn and succeeded in making thread like the six cord sewing thread used to-day. It took the place of silk in the heddles, and the weaving business went on uninterrupted by the war.

Then it occurred to another man to use the cotton thread in place of linen for sewing, and he recommended it to the women of the town. It was so much smoother than the linen that the women liked it. The thread was sold in hanks and wound by the purchaser into little balls, but the merchant soon decided to wind the hank on a bobbin of spool for his customers as an added inducement to purchase it instead of the linen.

From this beginning the cotton thread trade has grown, and now silk and linen are used only for special work.—Philadelphia Record.

Accidental Inventions.

The ancients believed that there was a certain kind of mineral substance in existence by means of which all the common metals could be turned into gold. This supposed substance was called the philosopher's stone, and the alchemists of classic times and during the middle ages spent much time and labor in search of this wonderful substance.

Of course, since nothing of the kind ever existed, it was never found, but it is worth remembering that some of the most notable inventions were discovered in this wide search. It was in looking for the philosopher's stone that the German chemist, [illegible], stumbled upon the secret of making the beautiful Dresden porcelain. Roger Bacon, in the same way, discovered the composition of gunpowder; [illegible] found the properties of [illegible]; Van Helmont discovered the nature of gas, and Dr. Glauber found the secret of making the salts which now bear his name.—[illegible]

Marrying for Votes.

Marrying for votes was a device of old time British election [illegible]. As the law stood before the reform act of 1832 widows of freemen on marrying again made their second husbands freemen and therefore voters. At election times widows were consequently paid handsomely to go through a formal marriage with a [illegible] who for a [illegible] to support the candidate. The pair were married, the man voted according to instructions, and then he and his wife, standing on either side of a tombstone, said, "Death us do part." With this literal fulfilment of the matrimonial vow they regarded their marriage dissolved. At the last election in Bristol before the reform act widows gave votes in [illegible].

SUSPICION JUSTIFIED.

It Was Not a Mouse the Master Heard in the Kitchen.

The late Rev. Mr. Wightman, sitting one night later than usual engrossed in the profundities of a great tome, imagined he heard a sound in the kitchen inconsistent with the cautiousness of a mouse; so, taking his candle, he proceeded to investigate the cause. His foot being heard in the passage, the servant began with much noise to rake out the fire as if preparing for bed.

"Ye're up late to-night, Mary."

"I'm jist rakin' the fire, sir, and gaun to bed."

"That's right, Mary. I like timely hours."

On his way back to the study he passed the coal cellar door and, turning the key, took it with him. The next morning at an early hour there was a rap at his bedroom door and a request for the key to get some coal.

"Ye're up too soon, Mary. Go back to your bed."

Half an hour later there was another knock and a similar request, in order to prepare for breakfast. "I don't want breakfast so soon, Mary. Go back to your bed."

In other half hour there was another knock, with an entreaty for the key, as it was washing day.

This was enough. He rose and handed out the key, saying, "Go and let the man out." As the preacher shrewdly suspected, Mary's sweetheart had been imprisoned all night in the coal cellar.—London Mail.

GREATLY DISCOURAGED OVER BABY'S ILLNESS

Mrs. Jos. Gaudreau, Notre Dame des Bois, Que., writes: "Last autumn our baby was sick and we were greatly discouraged. The doctor did not seem able to help him, and we began using Baby's Own Tablets, which soon made him a fat, healthy child." Thousands of other mothers give Baby's Own Tablets the same praise. The Tablets regulate the stomach and bowels, break up colds and simple fevers, expel worms, cure colic and make teething easy. They are sold by medicine dealers or by mail at 25 cents a box from The Dr. Williams' Medicine Co., Brockville, Ont.

Food Value of Cheese.

Cheese is wholesome and a very valuable food, it is rich in proteid and can be used as a substitute for meat. One pound of cheese is equal in protein to two pounds of beef. Cheese is indigestible when eaten raw. This may be somewhat overcome by cooking it and adding a small amount of bicarbonate of sodium. An admirable way of eating cheese is by combining it with macaroni. It is enjoyable served in the form of Welsh rabbit. To prepare Welsh rabbit use the following ingredients: One tablespoonful of butter, one teaspoonful of cornstarch, half a cupful of thin cream, half a pound of sharp or mild cheese (this may be preferred cut in small pieces), one-fourth teaspoonful of salt, one-fourth teaspoonful of mustard, a few grains of cayenne and toast. Melt the butter, add the cornstarch, stir until well mixed, then add the cream gradually, cook slowly for ten minutes, season and serve poured over toasted bread.

Antimony.

The use of antimony is to harden the softer metals, such as tin and lead, in the manufacture of shrapnel shells, babbit for machinery bearings, type metal and castings of all kinds. In its pure state it cannot be employed for any useful purpose owing to its extreme brittleness. Its value in alloying, however, is great, not only because it hardens metal, but because of its low melting point.

The Ostrich's Legs.

Although the ostrich has powerful legs and can kick like a mule, his limbs are very brittle and are easily broken. He has two toes on each foot, one being armed with a horny nail, which he uses as his principal weapon of warfare. When an unarmed man is attacked by one of these birds the chances are very much against the man unless he can climb a tree or jump over a five foot wall.

HABITS OF COD FISH.

Travel Far and Grow Fast—Small Danger of Extinction.

The tremendous amount of cod liver oil used annually by the world has led the Norwegian Government to a careful study of the habits of this fish, from which Norway derives no inconsiderable portion of its revenue. As a result, the director of fisheries, Dr. Johan Hjort, made some interesting experiments designed to ascertain the extent of the migrations of the cod and the rate of its growth, as well as the probable rate at which the supply is being exhausted.

In 1913 he caught 2,600 of the fish, and after marking them, returned them to the sea. Two hundred and seventy-nine of these were caught again and the same season, which showed, of course, that the drain upon the supply of cod is even larger than has been popularly supposed.

A fish marked at Henningsvaer on March 17, was caught again on Feb. 12, the year following, at Sorvaag. As both places are on the Lofoten banks, a famous codfishery, it thus appears that the fish returned to the banks from year to year.

The increase in the length of a fish marked on May 26 and caught on the 19th of the following February was considered over 100 per cent. It was shown, too, that during the period named the fish had travelled fully 1,700 miles.

As a result of his studies, Dr. Hjort is not inclined to pessimism as to the outlook for the industry. While admitting that the proportion of fish caught every year is extremely large, he feels certain that the rapidity of their growth and the extent of their migrations are factors that will prevent a too serious drain upon the supply, especially when the fisheries are properly regulated by law.

A Curious Beetle.

The little bombardier beetle because preyed upon by larger beetles of its own family has been armed by nature with what is practically a miniature cannon. When attacked the bombardier beetle turns and makes off, but if overtaken by the larger insects bang!—and an acid fluid is shot from glands situated in the tip of its tail on to the enemy beetle. The acid when ejected vaporizes upon reaching the air and thus gives the effect of a puff of smoke from a gun, while at the same time a small but distinct report, like a tiny cannon, is heard. The bombardier beetle is a rapid firer, too, for the discharge can be repeated in quick succession, and thus the little insect keeps off his large foe until he can scurry into a convenient hole in the soil or find shelter under a stone.—Atlanta Journal.

Snake Story.

Weeta is a little girl who lives in that part of Louisville at once and comprehensively denominated the West End. Ordinarily, her communications, it not rare, [illegible] in the sight of [illegible] as that of any six-year-old, but last week an incident occurred which startled her out of her accustomed decorum. After it had been dispatched and the excitement was all over, Weeta viewed the remains, ejaculating:

PRESENCE OF MIND.

It Cowed an Enraged Lion and Saved the Trainer's Life.

At Cape Town a lion tamer was going through a performance in a cage with a full grown lion that had been lately caught.

Suddenly it was seen that the brute was putting the trainer through his paces rather than being put through itself. Softly, crouching and creeping, the big cat edged itself between the thoroughly unnerved man and the door of the den, fixing its victim with two rolling yellow orbs of flaming ferocity and sawing the empty air with its tufted tail as it crouched preparatory to springing.

Many men among the audience, used to the ways of wild beasts, saw and comprehended, but only one man possessed the knowledge and the presence of mind to avert the apparently inevitable. Pursing up his lips as though were going to whistle, he emitted a hoarse, low, rasping hiss.

The beast heard and understood, for the sound was an exact imitation of the noise made by the giant constrictor when its huge body is coiled for the throw that never misses, that never relaxes, and that no beast of the field is strong enough to withstand. Again and yet again the raucous sound rasped the stillness, and the angry brute drew back its head, its great eyes grew small and dull, the hackles rose and stiffened on its back, and it cowered, whining on the floor of the cage.—London Saturday Review.

Houses in Buenos Ayres.

No building in Buenos Ayres is permitted to be higher than the width of the street upon which it is erected; hence the skyscraper will never become popular there, despite the splendid growth and wideawakeness of the city. Much as this metropolis is known, it is not generally thought of in the light of age. However, it is one of the oldest cities in the new world. The first white settlement was made just forty-two years after the discovery of America by Columbus, and the first buildings were mud huts thatched with straw. Then a brick kiln was made and later tiles and bricks were imported from Spain. The first city was of Spanish architecture, and that style prevailed for more than 200 years. Despite the great many changes which have come through the passage of time and the general building advance in the world, four-fifths of the houses of Buenos Ayres are still of one storey, although there are streets lined with six-storey palaces.—Exchange.

As the Canadian Pacific Railway is at the forefront in the consideration of their patrons. A novel feature has been introduced on their dining cars in the form of a special buffet in the dining room, on which cold meats, salads, etc., are tastefully displayed under glass covers, giving passengers an opportunity to select their salads or cuts of cold meat, which are served from the buffet by a chef in white uniform. This is the first time a cold buffet has been introduced on a dining car, but it is meeting with great success.

EXTENSION OF TIME.

The Toronto News must have some authority for making its continual demand that the life of Parliament must be extended or an election held. Where does it get that authority? Sir Robert Borden has made no sign. Perhaps the News is taking its orders from the Hon. Robert Rogers. However that may be, the News has not the support of all the Tory newspapers. The Montreal Gazette, a good old-fashioned Tory, declares that the proposal for an extension has "neither good precedent nor good judgment to support it," and it quotes the British North America Act against the proposition, and its asserts that from broad reasons the good men in Parliament, without regard to party, should object to anything that ignores the proper control of Parliament by the people. The Gazette is apparently not in such a hurry as is the News.

In fact, there need be no hurry. We have a whole year yet ahead of us, and many things may happen in that time. Let both sides pile in and do what they can to beat the Germans. When that is done we can turn round and fight each other.

AS TO NATIVE WINE.

J. V. Vincent, Deputy Minister of Inland Revenue, has issued a bulletin regarding native wine. No extensive inspection of this wine has been made by the department since 1905. Meanwhile it has been tentatively and partially defined as follows:

1. Wine is the product of the normal alcoholic fermentation of the juice of sound, ripe grapes, enat, or variously modified, and followed by a proper cellar treatment.

2. All beverages sold or offered for sale as wine shall be distinctly labelled to show the place of their production; and shall meet the requirements for wine, which are established by law in the place of their production.

3. Wine made in any part of Canada shall be labelled in such a way as to show the locality in which it has been produced. The specific name of such locality together with the names of the makers shall be held to be a legal description of the article.

The defining of types of Canadian made wines is postponed until sufficient data have been secured. The present inspection has for one chief object an attempt to secure data which might serve to classify the various types of native wines. Many of these are called ports, others evidently aim at the claret type. Most of them are merely described as wine, and a few of these are fairly dry, that is, contain but little residual sugar. It was found that a number of the manufacturers failed to label the bottles with the name of the manufacturer or the place of production.

RENTS AT THE FRONT.

It may not have struck many of our readers that the British army has to pay rent for houses its members may occupy while fighting in France. It is said that the cost of keeping the army is increasing. During the last four months, we are told, the expenses of maintaining the British armies in France has been steadily rising and is now 150 per cent. per head higher than it was at any period during the first five months of the war. One reason for this huge increase in expenditure—although it by no means accounts for it all—is the fact that property owners in France have very considerably advanced their charges for billets, and more especially for houses taken by general commanding officers for their headquarters. Last autumn houses that were being rented by various British Generals and members of their staff at $15 and $20 a week are now rented at $75 and $100 a week.

"At British headquarters alone there are from 250 to 300 houses in the occupation of the staff, the rents of which have been advanced from $15 to $60 a week, representing a total increase of about $12,500 a week. The total increase in rents charged for accommodation for all the various British Generals and their staffs must amount to at least $50,000 a week, which has flowed into the pockets of a few fortunate property owners in France. The rents of houses used for billeting soldiers have been advanced from 25 cents a day for each man to 75 cents a day, representing a total increase of some thousands of dollars a week.

We would imagine that it would be the duty of the French Government to see that landlords were not allowed to charge more than a fair rent. Mr. McKenna, while he is raising all those taxes, should see that they are economically spent. Certainly the British army should not have to pay rent of any kind while in France fighting France's battles. Have they to pay rent for the trenches they occupy? John Bull must be the easy boss.

* * *

Mayor Mitchel, of New York, who put in some weeks of Plattsburg Camp drilling, went home with the conviction of the futility of sending untrained men into the battlefield to compete with trained men. He is convinced that a soldier, much less an officer, cannot be made in a few weeks of training, and that it would be a crime against the people, amounting to nothing less than national suicide, to send into the field armies manned and officered by untrained volunteers. Mr. Bryan should be told that.

We learn that the Prince Edward Island Conservative newspapers announced that when the war was over the British West Indies, British Guiana, British Honduras, Newfoundland and Labrador would in all probability be added to the Dominion of Canada. The Islanders were told that this would be the opportunity for them to get soft situations at the expense of those countries.

The German professors who some time ago signed a manifesto demanding that the Government should annex Belgium and other territory have met with some opposition from other professors, including Dr. Hans Delbruck, Dr. Bernard Dernburg and eighty-two others. While they declare that "from purely practical considerations we adopt the standpoint that the incorporation or annexation of politically independent peoples, accustomed to independence, is to be rejected," they add: "The German nation, however, can only conclude a peace which will provide a sure foundation for the strategic requirements, the political and economic interests of the country, and for the unrestricted employment of its strength and its enterprising spirit at home, and upon the free high seas." That might mean anything. It might mean that Antwerp will be held, as well as whatever coast line the Germans may be able to seize. It could easily mean the strangling of Belgium's liberty. Of course, Germany will not be allowed to dictate the peace terms.

Suffered From Salt Rheum FOR MANY YEARS.

Salt Rheum or Eczema is one of the most painful of all skin diseases, and if not attended to immediately may become very deep seated.

Give the blood a good cleansing by the use of that grand old medicine Burdock Blood Bitters. This sterling remedy has been on the market for the past forty years, and is the best blood cleanser on the market to-day.

Mrs. William H. Fowlie, Cole's Island, N.B., writes: "I have been a sufferer from salt rheum for a good many years, and was so bad I could not do my own work. I tried a good many medicines, but they all failed to do me any good until I tried Burdock Blood Bitters. I had not taken one bottle until I found a great change, and I am most thankful for trying it. I hope that every other sufferer from salt rheum will try B.B.B."

Burdock Blood Bitters is manufactured only by The T. Milburn Co., Limited, Toronto, Ont.

Wooed By a Pauper

"Certainly; it is warm, and the Lancers are hard work," replied Sir Richard, with the highest-bred courtesy. "Let me conduct you to a cooler place."

He had won, after all. She could not avoid him.

With something approaching a frown she placed the tips of her fingers upon his arm.

Sir Richard skillfully steered Stella Newton through the crowd, and led her to a quiet little fernery, which, while it commanded a view of the glittering ballroom, was calm, quiet and restful.

"Oh, beautiful!" she exclaimed, bending over a forest tangle flag.

"Yes a great contrast is this little spot; it is like an oasis of quiet in a desert of noise. Will you not be seated?"

"No, thank you," she said, almost coldly. She did not intend to remain tete-a-tete with him, and was already trying to invent a means of escape. "I like the flowers too well," and she walked around, looking admiringly at the tinkling fountain, the fresh, graceful ferns, and the glassy pools of water that lay like mirrors between the beds of rock.

Sir Richard leaned against a rustic table and watched her.

"She is very beautiful to-night," he smiled. "Without the money she would be a prize worth having; with the money she is a prize that must not at all events be lost."

As his eye fell on her with admiring speculation she turned suddenly and shrank almost visibly at its expression.

"I think I will go back," she said, scarcely knowing what she did say. "I have not seen mamma since we came in."

"Will you not rest while I find Mrs. Newton?" said Sir Richard, drawing a chair toward the fountain.

"No, thank you—yes, I will, then, if you please," she answered, and sank into the chair.

Sir Richard murmured something about the draft, arranged the soft China crepe around her white shoulders, and mingled with the throng.

Stella waited until he was lost in the vortex, and arose quickly.

She would escape him once for all! A curtain was draped before an entrance in one corner of the recess. It might lead her to the ballroom—and to a distant part of it.

Ay, she would venture it rather than wait for Sir Richard's return, and she arose and walked quickly to the curtain, drew it aside, and passed through the opening.

The apartment she had entered was dimly lighted, and was too small even fan an ante-room.

Disappointed, she was about to return, when something white and gleaming at the further end caught her attention, and she dropped the curtain, entered the room and crossed it.

The patch of white was a statue of such surpassing beauty that in her maze of admiration she forgot everything, and stood gazing as if rooted to the spot.

Suddenly she uttered a half-suppressed exclamation of astonishment, and with a heightened color drew nearer.

Surely she must be mistaken! The dimness of the light, her too vivid imagination, must be misleading her!

A small lamp stood on an ormolu bracket. She took it in her hand, and holding it above her head gazed long and eagerly at the face of the statue. It was a sea nymph riding from a crested wave.

The waving locks were of marvelous grace, the face was sweet, passionate beauty. But it was not the beauty which so deeply attracted her, it was the weird strangeness of the fact that the face resembled hers! Resembled! Nay, was an exact reflection in all save color.

She turned to a mirror, then stared at the marble face again. Yes! She was not the sport of fancy. The face was hers!

Her face went from red to white, her lips were tremulous. She turned—and found Sir Richard Wildfang standing beside the curtained entrance watching her.

With a quick, impetuous movement she set the lamp on the bracket and confronted him.

"Sir Richard," she commenced, and there was the same ring of resolute woman courage in her voice that rang in it when she was stung into retorting upon Mrs. Newton, "Sir Richard ——"

"Ah! Here you are; why, where have you been?" exclaimed Lord Marnilon, who entered with Mrs. Newton on his arm.

"We have been admiring your latest acquisition, my dear fellow," said Sir Richard, waving his hand towards the statue as he offered the other to Miss Newton. "It is very beautiful. Miss Newton was quite struck with it."

"Were you?" Well, I don't wonder at it," said Lord Marnilon, "it's an excellent bit of sculpture, but do you know I bought it for another reason than its intrinsic worth? Can you guess?"

"No, really I can't," said Sir Richard.

"No? Well, that's strange. Surely it can't be my fancy. But do you know I thought when I saw it that it was like you," and he smiled at Stella. "Don't you think it is?"

"I—I—don't know," she replied, still faintly.

"It is a little, perhaps," remarked Sir Richard. "It is difficult to say. Who is the sculptor?"

"Oh, a new man, a young fellow named Felton—Louis Felton. Quite a character in his way. Comes of a very old family, you know, but very poor. Proud into the bargain."

"Louis Felton," murmured Stella, unconsciously.

"I beg your pardon," said Lord Marnilon.

"I did not speak," she replied, looking up at him.

He saw she was pale, and held back the curtain for her to pass out, saying as he did so:

"The next is my waltz, Miss Newton. Don't hide away anywhere. It is the last waltz."

But she would not dance any more that night. Her headache had returned and she would go.

So the Newton carriage was brought around, and attended by a train of desiring courtiers, beautiful Stella departs with that name ringing in her ears and the strange mystery of the sea nymph to haunt her dreams.

Louis Felton!

CHAPTER V.

The Vale is a country residence worthy of such wealthy and fashionable people as the Newtons.

It is a large, modern house, furnished with every convenience and surrounded by well-laid-out grounds, with all their proper stablings, outhouses, farmyards and paddocks. A park just large enough to be pleasant and small enough to be devoid of the trouble which clings to larger tracts of forest land, stretches at the back of houses away to the pleasant little river of Den.

At the end of the park, and hidden from view by the trees, stands an old house nearly in ruins.

It is a pretty, tumble-down place, empty, tenantless, and all but useless, for the owner has not been seen for years, his very name even is not known, it has passed out of the remembrance of the village folk.

Old Daniel Newton, Stella's father, wished very much to buy the old place and the land upon which it stood, but the matter was found to be entangled in so many lawyers' webs that Mr. Newton abandoned all thought of adding it to his other estate in despair and the Hut, as the people familiarly called it, was left to its natural cobwebs and dusty ruin.

The Vale was rather solitary, there being no near neighbors of its own class, but it was always well filled with visitors and country cousins, and did not feel dull.

The nearest house of any distance was a shooting-box, three miles distant.

It was let on short terms to shooting and fishing men, but was generally empty at Christmas, there being little or no hunting in its neighborhood to tempt hardriding gentlemen into becoming tenants.

It was to let now, and Mrs. Newton, sitting in her open carriage, regrets it.

"There are no neighbors; really it is quite a desert of a place," she said.

"It is rather dull," said Stella, glancing around the country, "but it is very beautiful, mamma. I have never seen any place I like better than the Vale."

"They tell me Dorewell is a magnificent place," said Mrs. Newton, softly.

Stella flushed.

"It may be, and yet I might not like it so well. The Vale is so snug and comfortable. I hope we shall always spend Christmas here."

The ladies had been for a ride, the day being beautifully fine, the roads hard and frosty, and the air bracing, and the carriage entered the Vale gates as Stella made the remark.

"Yes," said Mrs. Newton. "I suppose our visitors will arrive to-morrow. How many will there be?"

Stella counted upon her fingers.

"There's Margaret, one, Charlie Venner, two, Uncle Adolphus, three; the poor little Cummings, seven, and old Mrs. Beckett, eight. Quite a family party."

"Yes," said Mrs. Newton, with rather a dissatisfied sigh. "It was your father's wish that they should all dine here on Christmas Day, and I suppose they must."

"I am glad to see them, for my part," said Stella, cordially. "I think it is only right that a family should gather together once a year; it is so nice to see the same faces, to hear the same good wishes, and to listen to the same dear old songs."

At this point of the drive a glimpse—a very faint one only—could be obtained of the Hut. Stella caught it, and said, thoughtfully:

"I wonder no one comes to claim that pretty old place. It is just the sort of house I should like for my own. Fancy a fire gleaming through the windows, bright faces and happy voices laughing through the ivy and laurel. Have you never found out to whom it belongs?"

"Never that I know of," answered Mrs. Newton. "It is in Chancery, or some legal difficulty, I think, but I know nothing about it, or any one else. I wish we could have bought it; it is a great nuisance stuck there at the end of the park and in such a disgraceful state of ill repair. I should have thought dear Lord Heavithorne could have ordered it to be pulled down. It is on his manor."

"Oh, not for the worlds," said Stella, with a smile. "It is the foundation for all my castles in the air; do you know, mamma, I love the old place, and can't help thinking, notwithstanding it has so little romance, that there is some strange interest attaching to it. I would not have it pulled down for the worlds!"

"You are a strange girl, Stella," said Mrs. Newton, peevishly. "I don't know where you get your whims and fancies from—not from me, I'm sure, for I was always a sensible woman. I'm glad we are home again, for I'm frozen."

And with a little ill-tempered shiver the wealthy Mrs. Newton descended by the help of the footman and climbed the stone steps haughtily.

Stella leaped from the carriage, and followed her mamma with a spring that was almost a leap.

To-day she felt, now that she was miles away from Richard Wildfang, free, buoyant and happy.

Her mother could not understand her, and after staring at her a minute went off haughtily to her own room.

It was a beautiful day, she felt full of energy and high spirits. Why should she not go for a walk?

Luncheon was on the table, it was true, and that, like all other meals over which Mrs. Newton presided, must be gone through with all proper formality and solemnity.

For once Mrs. Newton sent word down by her maid that Miss Stella need not wait, and the happy girl cut herself a crust of bread and cheese and ate them with the appetite of a schoolboy.

A glass of water—there were three varieties of wine upon the table—accompanied the frugal repast, and she arose again ready for her walk.

Slipping on her hat and shawl, she took up her muff and trotted off.

Very beautiful was the park, with King Frost's diamonds sparkling in hedge and tree, and his white ermine robe spread on the wide-stretching meadows.

"Oh, lovely," murmured the girl, with all a woman's love for nature. "Lovely! It is like some grand carving in marble!"

Ah! the word brought to her remembrance that sea nymph with its strange resemblance.

A flush mounted to her face which heightened her beauty, and she went along more thoughtfully than before. The end of the park was reached, and there before her was the Hut.

Suddenly a step upon the frosty path beside her awoke her from her reverie.

She started, turned quickly around and stared; yes, positively stared.

There before her was the face which she knew so well, though she had seen it but once, and then only for a moment.

The gentleman raised his hat with a graceful reverence that was well-bred, though it had nothing of the supercilious composure of the fashionable salutation, and said, in a low clear and subtly sweet voice:

"Madam, I pray your pardon. I fear I have frightened you."

Stella flushed, lowered her eyes from his face, and answered, slowly:

"No—o, at least, not much; I had not known any one was so near."

"Nor I," returned the stranger, "until a few minutes since. I confess that when I saw you I did not like to move for fear of startling you."

Stella reclined her head again.

The stranger, whose eyes seemed as much drawn to hers as hers to his, raised his hat and passed on. Suddenly he turned again.

"Can you tell me to whom this place belongs?"

"This is the Vale Park, and belongs to Mrs. Newton."

The stranger bowed.

"And this old house is called the Hut, though its proper name is Heavithorne."

The stranger inclined his head again. There was in his look, in his voice, in his very attitude, so visible a respect and reverence for her sex and herself in particular that Miss Newton was not affronted when he continued the conversation.

ruins. Do you know why its owner does not keep it in repair?"

Stella shook her head.

"No one knows the owner, or where he is to be found. Poor old place, it is nearly to the ground."

"You admire it, ma'am?" he asked.

"Yes," she said, with a sigh, "and pity it is. Perhaps you would like to go over it; the lodge-keeper has the key."

He smiled with pleasant sadness, and glanced at the broken casements.

"A key is scarcely necessary," he said, "and I will venture to make an entry without it. Is there anything particularly worthy of notice in the interior, may I ask?"

"There are some very fine old carvings, and the remains of some stained windows," replied Stella, raising her eyes again and marvelling at the coincidence which had brought the passerby in Hyde Park Corner to the Vale.

The strange smile which had al-

"Then," he said, "as I confess to a taste for such antiquities, I think I will make a visit of inspection. Madready lit up the handsome face more than once came upon it again.

am, I thank you for your courteous kindness."

He raised his hat, placed one hand upon the dilapidated fence, and vaulted on to the weed-grown lawn.

Arrived there, he looked back with almost a boyish smile, so arch and naive was it, and, seeing Stella still looking at him, though she had turned as if about to depart, he returned to her and said:

"Do not think me impertinently inquisitive, madam, I have the owner's permission to enter here and, in fact, do with it as I please."

"The owner's," said Stella, startled with surprise.

"Surely," retorted the stranger, with a playful smile. "I am he."

"You——"

She could get no farther, and stood as if turned to stone, looking at him with a heightened color and an astonished light in her deep eyes.

"Yes, madam, I," he returned, laying his hand upon his breast, and bowing with knightly courtesy and gravity. "I, Louis Felton, madam," and there was an intense ring in the sweet voice. "Both house and owner are at your service."

Stella was too startled to utter a word.

He might have thought her rude, discourteous, uncivilized; she could not help it.

The power of speech, of everything save bewilderment and confused emotion, had left her.

She turned without a word and walked hurriedly away.

CHAPTER VI.

It is Christmas eve.

All London was alight and busy. The toy shops, the butchers' shops, the poulterers' shops, ay, all the shops were doing a roaring business, for Saint Gift's day is close at hand, and money must be spent upon him.

Up in Sir Richard's luxurious counting-house alone there seemed no excitement, no bustle.

Sir Richard was writing with calm speed, the clock was ticking with its wonted regularity.

To him Christmas was but a suspension of money-making, a sad and unnecessary waste of time.

Now he was writing quickly, because the troublesome day was drawing near and there was still work to be done.

At last the letter was written and he rang the bell.

"My hat and coat."

His valet brought him his hat and coat, and waited for further orders.

"Is everything ready at Heavithorne?"

"Everything, sir," replied the man.

"Then we will go down to-night, as arranged."

Sir Richard looked around his room to see that he had not forgotten anything, and went out, locking the door after him.

It was a cold night and a dark one.

The square seemed empty, and Sir Richard drew his coat around him and buttoned an extra button as he strode down the steps of his mansion.

It was not quite empty, for as he strode along, his face thoughtful, close and lowered, a figure came from out the darkness and caught his arm.

Sir Richard turned, angrily.

It was a woman, thinly clad, and shivering with the cold.

She turned her pale face imploringly up to him, and with her disengaged hand, forced a shrinking, shivering little child upon him.

"Richard! oh, Richard! how can you be so cruel?"

Faint, woeful! faint was the voice; it came from the depths of a broken heart.

Sir Richard started, whitened in the sickly gaslight, and drew his arm away from the grasp of the emaciated hand with an imprecation.

"Lucy!" he said, with involuntary dismay and horror.

(To be continued.)

Some people seem to have a sort of sneaking idea that they can go to heaven by proxy.

SUNDAY SCHOOL LESSON

Lesson II., October 10, 1915.

Elijah Taken up into Heaven.—2 Kings, 2. 1-12.

Commentary.—I. Elijah called to depart (vs. 1-8). 1. When the Lord would take up Elijah—The prophet's lifework was drawing to a close, and he was to enter upon his eternal reward. The events of that particular day indicate that he was still vigorous and capable of further labor. It is clear that there was still work to be done, but God's purpose called for the removal of his servant from earthly scenes. The question why God's workmen are removed to heaven in the midst of successful labor must remain unanswered until we shall know as we are known. Into heaven—Into the eternal dwelling-place of the saints. Whirlwind—A tempest. From Gilgal—In the hill country of Ephraim eight or nine miles northwest of Bethel. We learn from 2 Kings 4, 38, that there was a school of the prophets here. Elisha had been associated with Elijah for several years, in fact, since the return of the latter from Horeb. 2. Tarry here—Both Elijah and Elisha knew that the former was to be translated that day. Elijah desired to be alone when he went to heaven. Several reasons have been presented why Elijah requested Elisha to tarry at Gilgal. 1. His humility led him to avoid publicity while that great honor was being bestowed. 2. His love for solitude asserted itself in view of this, the most momentous event in his life. 3. He wished to spare Elisha the sight of his departure from earth. 4. He desired to test Elisha's devotion to him and to the work in which he was engaged. The first and the last of these views seem the most reasonable.

3. Knowest thou—The "sons of the prophets" knew what the day would bring forth, probably by a direct revelation to them, for it is not likely that Elijah had told them of his approaching departure. From thy head—Recognizing that Elijah was the chief of the prophets, they must have considered it a serious thing for him to be removed when the worship and service of the God of Israel were greatly neglected and idolatry was prevalent. Yea, I know it; hold ye your peace—This knowledge brought with it a sadness and a sense of the responsibility that must rest upon him, that made him feel that the subject was too sacred for discussion. 4. Jericho—About twelve miles southeast of Bethel in the valley of the Jordan. Here also was a school of the prophets. These schools were places where young men were trained, under the direction of a recognized prophet, for religious service. They were not necessarily the sons of prophets. Their study was principally the law of Moses. Elijah was evidently making a farewell visit to the "sons of the prophets" at Gilgal, Bethel and Jericho. 6. The Lord hath sent me to Jordan—The journey was toward the place from which he was to be taken up to heaven. It led from Gilgal to Bethel, to Jericho, to Jordan, and beyond. Elisha proved his devotion and fidelity by not allowing himself to be separated from Elijah.

7. Fifty men ... stood to view afar off—There was intense interest in what was soon to take place. Stood by Jordan—Evidently it was not at a fording place. 8. Elijah took his mantle—It was doubtless of undressed skin, and the symbol of his office, which he had worn for years. "The power of wonder working rested not with the prophet individually, but was attached to his office, of which this rough garment was the badge."—Edersheim. Wrapped it—The prophet wound the mantle tightly into a roll in the form of a staff. Smote the waters—Moses smote the waters of the Red Sea and they parted to permit the Israelites to escape from the pursuing Egyptians. Elijah smote the waters, which were obstructing his progress toward the place where he was to bid farewell to earth, and a path was opened through the Jordan. In some respects the lives of Moses and Elijah were much alike.

II. Elisha's request (vs. 9, 10). 9. Ask what I shall do for thee—If Elisha had yielded to Elijah's entreaty to tarry behind he would have missed this exalted favor. The request which Elisha would make would be a further index of his character. Solomon had been granted a similar privilege (1 Kings 3: 5). Before I be taken away from thee—Elijah's departure had now become a subject of their conversation. A double portion of thy spirit—He did not ask for twice the amount of Elijah's spirit, but his request was for the portion falling to the first-born son under the Mosaic law. He was entitled to twice as much as any other child, so Elisha wished such a portion of his master's spirit that he might be equipped for the grave responsibilities which would soon fall upon him. Elisha showed his greatness of soul in this request. 10. A hard thing—Elijah had no power to impart his spirit to Elisha, for that power must come from God.

III. Elijah taken to heaven (vs. 11, 12). 11. As they still went on and talked—Some think they approached Mount Nebo, from which Moses viewed the land of Canaan. They were making their last journey together and holding their final conversation. A chariot of fire, and horses of fire—These were creations of the spiritual world. This heavenly scene was no hallucination, but the chariot and horses of fire were a part of that vast host, the sound of whose movements David once heard over the mulberry trees (2 Sam. 5: 24), and which at a later time filled the mountains round about Elisha (2 Kings 6: 17).—Whedon. And parted them both asunder—The parting time came, but it was accompanied by glorious displays of the divine presence and power. Went up by a whirlwind—We do not read that Elijah was borne by the chariot and horses of fire, but by a whirlwind. The fiery chariot and horses may have been simply a convoy for the prophet in his flight to heaven. 12. My father—Elisha saw the chariot and the horses, and he beheld his master's ascent. He thus fulfilled the condition upon which the request he made of Elijah was to be granted. In his astonishment he called after the departing prophet, and made an exclamation as he saw the chariot and horses of fire.

Questions.—About when were the times of this lesson? How long had it been since the events on Mount Carmel? How were the schools of the prophets conducted? In what cities had such schools been established? Why did Elijah visit them at this time? What questions did the prophets ask Elisha? What was his answer? Why did Elisha refuse to leave Elijah? What request did Elisha make?

PRACTICAL SURVEY.

Topic.—Perseverance Rewarded.
I. Elijah admitted to heaven.
II. Elisha appointed to service.

I. Elijah admitted to heaven. The translation of Elijah embraces more than a mere historic statement. The theme has to do with the great scriptural doctrine of immortality. It gave to Israel a powerful confirmation of that great fact. When God would transfer one of his faithful servants to heaven and place another in his stead, he did it in a way most in keeping with the characteristic life of each. Elijah and Elisha were two of the most remarkable men in the history of the world. Both stood faithful in a faithless age. Elijah's departure was in harmony with his life. He was not destined to come to his end in weakness and decay. His entire public life and work had the character of a judge, on the one hand destroying and consuming, on the other hand reforming and constructing. His last hours were as full of service as if no change was coming. On the borders of heaven he was full of genuine humility. He displayed a spirit of calm self-possession. He had no thought of his own needs. His great desire was to leave a blessing for those remaining in service. He saw with clear vision that Elisha was the man to be considered most at that hour. The parting meant most to him. He was to continue the struggle of life. He was to stand before wicked kings and ungodly men as the messenger of God. The change which passed over Elijah which culminated in his reception into the invisible world is incomprehensible to us. We regard the entire event as a singular honor placed upon a singularly great and good man. It is an assured fact that God directed in the matter of closing a career which he had so perfectly controlled. Elijah's movements were directed by the spirit of the Lord even to the last. He moved in sublime calmness to the most solemn crisis, ever thoughtful of the interests of others. His lifelong obedience and fidelity to God and zeal for his name, made him fearless when he approached the close of life. With him there was no murmur, no unwillingness to depart, no shrinking from entrance into the unseen world. He was fully prepared for translation.

II. Elisha appointed to service. The great responsibility which was to fall upon Elisha on the departure of Elijah was the matter which weighed upon the mind of the former as the two traveled together. His master had displayed a spirit of fidelity to duty, of faithfulness in rebuking sin, of fearlessness and courage in the presence of danger and also of marked tenderness and love. Elijah's suggestion that Elisha tarry drew out the qualities of his nature which proved him capable of receiving the answer to his request. It was no vain curiosity which prompted Elisha to go with Elijah. He had a correct perception of real worth with true aspiration after it. Admiration, reverence and devotion mingled in Elisha's love for Elijah. He made the wisest choice that could have been made in view of his future life-work. As Elijah was taken from view, Elisha's experience was similar to that of Isaiah when he received his prophetic call. Hitherto he had looked to his prophetic master for direction and encouragement. Here his eyes were fixed upon the embattled might of Jehovah. He was conscious that the place was filled with God's presence. His view of the situation was unselfish and patriotic. The falling mantle was a symbol of the transference of Elijah's unfinished tasks as well as an indication of Elisha's appointment as his successor. Elisha was assured by this token that his request was granted. His prayer for spiritual endowment for his work was answered. His importunity had prevailed. He had witnessed the departure of Elijah and recognized the hand of God in his translation. A vital faith in the presence and power of God in the world was begotten. That faith had sustained Elijah in all his service. It should also become an anchor to Elisha. In the school of prophets with Elisha as their head, the influence of Elijah would be perpetuated. Through the young men the vital life of godliness should be kept alive in the world. The theocracy, which Elijah had founded, regardless of Ahab and Jezebel, would be perpetuated through the schools of prophets. Elijah had worked with a view to the future continuance of true piety in the world. Though the nation should continue in its tolerance of idolatry, and though it should at last go into captivity, there should be a body of faithful witnesses through whom God would declare His love and mercy, and through whom He could warn and admonish his people.

For 7 Years Was Troubled With Her Liver.

Milburn's Laxa-Liver Pills CURED HER

Mrs. E. L. Hurst, 61 Symington Ave., Toronto, Ont., writes: "I have been troubled with my stomach and liver for the past seven years; also have had constipation, causing headache, backache and dizzy spells, and I would almost fall down. I tried all kinds of remedies without obtaining any relief. I commenced using Milburn's Laxa-Liver Pills, and they have cured me. I have recommended them to many of my friends, and they are all very much pleased with the results they have obtained from their use."

Criminals and Clues.

Pierre Sone, the French detective, once traced a murderer within forty-eight hours with no clue save a trouser button. Such a feat seems almost incredible, yet many criminals have been brought to justice through clues much flimsier. [illegible] Bennett, of Yarmouth, was traced through a laundry mark on a piece of linen, and Orrock, who murdered constable [illegible] at Dalston in 1881, was brought to the scaffold by an initial on a chisel.

So if you want to be a criminal you had better go out naked and unarmed. Even then some special constable might take note of you.—London Chronicle.

FARMERS!

Why Metallic Roofing and Shingles are not as durable as "Brantford Slates"

Brantford Asphalt Slates

For Houses and Barns

We are making colored and plain Asphalt Slates suitable for roofing any class of building, particularly farmers' buildings.

SPECIAL OFFER We are making a special offer to roof the first house or barn in your locality at about cost price and guarantee it's lifetime for ten years against leakage.

Electricians will tell you that Asphalt, from which Brantford Asphalt Shingles are made, is an excellent insulating material, and does not deteriorate when exposed to the elements, being proof against acid, salt, alkali, rust and corrosion.

Galvanized iron is subject to all these agents of destruction, as well as other enemies, viz., rust and moisture from the inside of the barn, produced by the heating of grain, moisture from cattle, etc. It is also open to attacks from the elements without, and both processes are working toward its ruin at the same time. In other words, condensation is causing the destruction of Metal Roofing and Shingles; while Asphalt Slates retain their wearing qualities indefinitely.

Therefore, Asphalt Slates are, in the end, the cheapest roofing material you can buy, and, as they are now made, the most attractive in appearance, as well as being waterproof and practically fireproof.

LOW PRICES We have succeeded in producing them at about the same price as wood shingles. Let us figure with you at once.

There is no reason why the farmers of our country should put up with leaky roofs when we have acres of material we can supply quickly, at moderate prices.

ROOF-LEAK PAINTS (in Red, Green and Black) This splendid material is especially adapted for old Shingles and Metal and Felt Roofing of all kinds. In fact, any material that will take paint, can be made to last years longer by an application. Put up in large open-mouth cans of 1, 2, 3 and 5 gallons.

WALKERTON, OCTOBER 7th, 1915

EDITORIAL

TO TELESCOPE READERS

Mr. C. Patrick, and I have disposed of the Telescope Newspaper and Printing business to Mr. L. A. Eedy. Mr. Eedy is now in charge.

The "Telescope" has been for sale for some time and a good many would be buyers have tried to buy it. We were anxious that the ownership should be transferred to a good newspaper man.

Mr. Eedy comes from St. Marys, where he has edited and managed the "Journal" for some years. He has also had reportorial and business experience with large Toronto publications.

My regular business is with newspapers generally throughout Canada and it is necessary for me to have a close knowledge of their advertising value and standing in their community. From information obtained in this way, I know that the standing of the St. Marys "Journal" is considered by other publishers and by large general advertisers, to be one of the leading country weeklies in Ontario. This standing is due to Mr. Eedy's management. It is therefore safe to expect the "Telescope" to be one the best edited and managed weekly papers in Ontario. I think Walkerton is fortunate in securing Mr. Eedy as a citizen and having such a paper as he will produce.

VALEDICTORY

Sooner or later, and for one reason or another, the time comes in the life of every local newspaper man, when he has to call a halt, let up on the grind, and bid good-bye to his readers.

It is so in this case, I have been in charge of the Telescope now for about a year, and find some very pleasant features about it, but also a lot of work; and as I find it impossible to devote the necessary time and energy that should be devoted to it, I feel that the best thing to do is to have the business disposed of and placed in more competent hands.

In looking around for a successor we feel sure we have found one in the person of Mr. Lorne Eedy of the St. Marys Journal, who will conduct the paper from now on. We feel fully assured he will meet the requirements expected by the public of him. Now it only remains for us to again thank the many readers of the Telescope for their numerous kindnesses extended to us during our stay among them, and we will ask all our readers to bestow the same confidence and patronage to our successor and we feel sure they will not be disappointed in so doing.

C. PATRICK

SALUTATORY

The undersigned has bought the Telescope and takes over the active management of the paper this week.

We cannot hope to measure up to the reputation which the former publishers of the Telescope and other good friends in the newspaper fraternity give us, but we appreciate their kind words. We recognize the fact that the good people of Walkerton and district will judge us by what we shall or shall not accomplish in our endeavor to publish a newsy and reputable newspaper.

We have great faith in the future of the local weekly newspaper. The raiding of the rural field by the metropolitan press through rural mail deliveries has not and will not injure the worth-while country weekly one iota, and has served to emphasize the fact that the local weekly newspaper holds a distinct place, and has a peculiar and important service to perform. It cannot be displaced. And as a result of competition and better organization it is each year serving its constituency better than before.

We have great faith in the influence which a good local newspaper can wield for the social and material betterment of a community. It shall be our aim not only to reflect through the columns of the Telescope, the life of the whole community, covering as far as possible every village and hamlet of the countryside, but to have a part in advancing every good measure for the uplift or improvement of our constituency. And we shall rely upon the co-operation of every Telescope reader to help us make the Telescope all that a live newspaper should be.

We are glad to announce that Mr. P. G. Eidt will remain with the Telescope.

LORNE A. EEDY.

Do the people of Walkerton realize what a pretty town they live in?

In nine cases out of ten, where the Departmental Stores appear to have a strangle hold on a town, the town itself is to blame. Up-to-date methods and aggressive advertising in the local newspapers is the sure and effective antidote.

"London Advertiser asks if ecopied autos mean empty pews? We think it means empty gasoline tanks."—Port Elgin Times.

Brother Sayles knows. He has been burning up the mileage with a new car this summer, "Roy" is getting out one of the snappiest little local newspapers in Western Ontario. No wonder he can afford to run a car and all that sort of thing.

Talking of economy a saving of ten cents a day on the part of every person in the Dominion would mean nearly $300,000,000 in the course of a year, or more than we are spending on the war.

Prohibition is good for our soldiers—even many liquor sellers agree to that. But what is good for soldiers is also good for civilians. Our soldiers should not have a monopoly to such a good thing, especially when its general application will not make our soldiers the less happy.

The Hamilton Herald wants the extra war stamp on letters abolished as being a nuisance. It is really something worse. Designed to increase the postal revenue as a war measure, it has actually so reduced the sending of letters that postal revenue is said to be declining. Under these circumstances Canada cannot too quickly get back to the old rates of postage. On some of Durham rural routes, the number of letters posted, it is said, sometimes dwindles down to two or three daily. —Durham Review.

CONSCRIPTION, OR NOT ?

A writer in the Stratford Herald, commenting on conscription says.—Suppose that every able man on the farm in the stores, banks and factories were to go—how would our army be fed, paid, clothed or supplied with ammunition? If every eligible man went, what would become of the reproduction or developement of our race in Canada?

To call a man a "shirker" to pin a white feather upon him, to call upon ladies to boycott him, and in other ways to make his life miserable, are means which can only be stigmatized as unBritish, unChristian and intemperate. What do we know about these men individually? How dare we conclude they are all cowards?

A young man in a nearby town a few days ago enlisted. He was rejected by the doctor. His mother had kept his delicate condition from him and now he knows it and is in a poor miserable young wretch!

Take a young man of 18 to 20 at school or college studying for a profession, often the only future support of his mother. Like all boys of that age he does not well know his mind. Is every young fellow of this kind to be hounded into going. Would it be fair to the future generation Oh yes, it is easy to give away other mother's sons!

There are thousands of able-bodied men we are told; out of employment, thousands having no family ties, and undoubtedly thousands willing to go if they are calmly and carefully shown that they are needed. Why not get at these and not indiscriminately lay the sledge hammer of compulsion upon every individual man without knowing his case?

As you know sir, the writer of this is British through and through. Many of his nearest relations and friends are in the war on the land and sea, some have fallen in battle. He would like to see every man showing that "England expects every man to do his duty," and if he cannot fight, let him pay, and those who can both work and pay, let them do so, and these are some who can play for the cause—our boys who are only striplings but who can play a game of baseball or hockey and give the receipts to the patriotic purposes—they also are "doing their bit." Conscription would be a thousand times better in any other form than the ways and means that some are now adopting for recruiting purposes. Then at all events, the poor fellow who is not strong enough would be rejected and as a result perhaps left "in peace"

W. Goldstick of Hanover was knocked down by an auto driven by Harrister Telford of Durham on Monday at noon on the road in front of the Reid House. Mr. Goldstick did not hear the motor horn. Mr. Telford was not driving fast. Mr. Goldstick was bruised by the accident, but no bones were broken—Hanover Post.

Millions in Albemarle.

Toronto and Hamilton capitalists taking advantage of the present high prices of zinc and the shortage there will be for many years owing to the war drains, plan to make millions by developing the huge deposits in Albemarle township, on the Northern shore of Lake Huron. London men who also attempted to work these rich mines, but gave up owing to transportation and smelting difficulties and low prices have been approached by a syndicate. W. H. Walker, an expert from the Klondike, is now in Albemarle mines and samples are being sent to Chicago Experts sent by London men some time ago said there were millions of dollars in zinc in Albemarle.

The "Gaelic American," a weekly paper, and the "Irish World," another New York weekly, have been refused the privilege of the mails in Canada and are prohibited from circulation in Canada in any way. Persons found in possession of these shall be liable to a fine not exceeding $5,000 or to imprisonment not exceeding five years.

Rats Did It

Thieving rats caused the collapse of 500 square feet of ceiling in McKenzie & Palmer's livery stables in Woodstock. For eighteen years the rats have been stealing oats from the bin on the second floor of the building and storing them between the second floor and the ceiling below. More than 200 bushels were accumulated before the ceiling gave way.

Coroner Ball Investigated.

Miss Mary Watt, aged 28 years was found dead at the house of a relative, with whom she resided, on the outskirts of Elmwood on Tuesday evening of this week. The lady of the house arrived home in the evening after being away all day and discovered Miss Watt dead. As the case looked somewhat suspicious Dr. Campbell of Elmwood had Coroner Dr. Ball hold an investigation and as a result the decided that the deceased had died from natural causes.—Hanover Post.

Each Town to Claim Soldiers

Word has been received from Ottawa that Gen. Hughes has asked that the authorities of every town, county and even township prepare a list of the young men who have gone for service. In many cases, young men from the country have enlisted in city depots and the cities receive credit for them. If these were prepared and printed in country papers, they would form interesting historical records and would be a source of satisfaction and pride to the communities in which they were compiled.

No Boost this Time

The Ford car is made the butt of many a joke and evidently Henry Ford the millionaire auto manufacturer, considers each story about his cars is a good advertisement, for he is credited with saying, "every knock is a boost" He is reported in the daily press to have said that he would withdraw his account from every bank that had a share in the Anglo-French loan. This is one instance where a knock is not a boost for loyal Canadians will not take kindly to Mr. Ford's strongly Anti-British sentiments.

KIDNEY DISEASE WAS KILLING HIM

Until He Used "Fruit-a-tives" The Great Kidney Remedy

HAGERSVILLE, ONT., Aug. 26th, 1913.

"About two years ago, I found my health in a very bad state. My Kidneys were not doing their work and I was all run down in condition. Having seen 'Fruit-a-tives' advertised, I decided to try them. Their action was mild, and the result all that could be expected. My Kidneys resumed their normal action after I had taken upwards of a dozen boxes and I regained my old-time vitality. Today, I am as well as ever."

The Telescope invites discussion in its columns on questions of public interest. If you have any ideas to advance, or criticisms to offer, write a letter to the editor.

Mr. Caldwell Marshall, who left on Monday for London training camp was presented with an auto-strop and safety razor by the Standard Bank staff here, and with a military wrist watch by friends in Walkerton.—Durham Chronicle.

Mr. Hugh McKerrocher has arrived home from the San Francisco Exposition. He reports the Fair to be a great success, with attendance larger than anticipated by the management. He came home through the Canadian west.—Paisley Advocate.

Two more of our boys, Peter Robinson, and Abbie Fenton have enlisted and went to London last Saturday morning. On Friday evening at the Patriotic meeting each of these young men were presented with a wrist watch and $5.00. The boys made very nice replies, and hoped other of the Southampton boys would also enlist to fight for Canada and the Empire.—Southampton Beacon

Had Fingers Blown Off

On Wednesday evening of last week while picking with a pin at a cartridge he had found on the street, Everett Henderson, aged 13, son of Mr. and Mrs. Henderson of Leopold street, had the thumb and two fingers of his left hand badly lacerated. It is almost miraculous that the little fellow did not receive the force of the explosion in the face. Mr. Henderson bound up the wounded hand and medical aid was summoned. The seriousness of the injury was not apprehended until Dr. Calder arrived and dressed the wound and had the child removed to the hospital.—Wingham Times.

He Gave a Son

At Port Elgin Fair, a bevy of pretty young ladies were busy collecting money for the noble Red Cross work. One young lady approached an elderly man with the request, "Won't you please give us something toward helping our soldiers?" In an instant tears ran down the man's cheek and in tones subdued and chastened by deep sorrow he said, "My dear, I have given a good deal, I have just received word that my son had died for his country." The scene was touching and pathetic. Sympathy at once came into the face of the fair collector and she too mingled her tears of sorrow with those of Mr. Louis Mouck, of Southampton, whose boy has been reported dead.

Stanley James, Patriot!

Stanley James, one of Hanover's adopted sons on the firing line, has paid the price. The end came in an English hospital last Friday after weeks of suffering. Poor brave boy! He was only 22 years of age, last July but was old enough to realize what was meant when the war clouds broke and he was one of the first in Hanover to enlist. He went with the first contingent. A handsome, cleancut young fellow, many of us will remember when he smiled his farewell from a car window just before the train pulled out out for Owen Sound a year ago August. The memory of Stanley James soldier and patriot, will long remain green in the memory of Hanoverians.—Post.

Stay off the Track

From time to time in these columns has the public been warned to keep off the railway tracks. The advice is good and worth respecting. Anyone who walks along the railway allowance is simply taking his life in his own hands and there is no cause for complaint if he is killed while doing so. The Grand Trunk Railway Company has sent out a statement of certain facts. It shows that on its lines about 38 persons have been killed and 31 persons injured during the six months ending June 30th, 1915, all of them trespassers on the railway's property. Of this number it appears that 22 were citizens of Michigan, the State having no law to prevent unauthorized persons from walking on railway tracks.

The War's Second Winter

There will be scores of men who have weathered one winter in the trenches, but there will be thousands to whom it will be a new and bitter experience. It is to the women of the country that these men have a right in the first place to look for some return for the sacrifice. The gentlemen of Canada who sit at home in ease must bear their part. From them must come the funds to purchase wool and flannel and other things necessary for the mysteries of the sewing room. But a fire of enthusiasm must burn brightly in the heart o every woman to get work done Better by far a glut of comforts than even one soldier should shiver, lonely, neglected, forgotten, in the knee-deep half frozen mud of a trench.

Electrical Inspections.

This country is surely being killed by red tape governmental regulations. If you want to have your house wired up for electric lights now, you must apply for a permit to the district inspector at Palmerston, and when the job is completed the inspector must be notified again, and inside of 48 hours he will visit the premises, and if the work suits him he will issue a permit to connect the service wires and then charge his fee. This is one of the greatest fakes ever sprung on an unsuspecting public, and will undoubtedly put a crimp on the business of electric light companies. Next thing we know, a man will have to apply to the Government for permission to blow his nose—Mildmay Gazette.

Listening on the Line.

Recently we read of an invention by Edison of a contrivance that would detect telephone patrons who "listened on the line." Lately there has been nothing further heard about it. We wonder if it has proven a failure or is too expensive for general use. There is one sure thing, something practical along that line would be a great boon to the rural telephone service. There are those even in this district about Walkerton to whom "listening on the line has become such a common occurrence that they think nothing of it when in reality one would be quite justified in sizing such a party up as a sneak or a thief. This contemptible habit of some patrons to nose into other peoples business is doing much to hurt the rural phone service. Impressions should be made that the phone is primarily for business purposes and not for gossip and eavesdropping. Any telephone company would be quite justified in promptly removing the phones of those who are so indecent as to "take in" their neighbors conversation and it would be in the interests of the service were they to be more strict in enforcing the penalty in this regard.

Mrs. O'Connor and her daughters, Marjorie and Nora who have spent the summer at their cottage at the beach, return to their home in Toronto this week.—Southampton Beacon.

Armed airships and aeroplanes are continually flying over the birthplace of the Prince of Peace at Bethelem, according to the messenger from Zion. Soldiers are manoeuvering every day on the mount of Olives, at Golgotha and Jerusalem. The English, French, and Russian convents have been turned into barracks, and between Judea and Jericho, when transportation was by mule pack in the days when Christ came to bring "peace on earth" a road is being constructed for armoured cars. It is supposed that the concentration of the young recruits in the Holy Land is with a view to another attack upon Egypt.

East Bruce Convention.

The annual Sunday School Convention for the district of East Bruce was held in Teeswater on September 24th. There was a fair attendance of delegates and much interest was evinced in the discussion of the various Sunday School questions before the convention. In the absence of the President, who has moved out of the district, Rev. W. A. Bradley occupied the chair. Addresses were delivered by Rev. T. Wilson and Rev. D. A. Walker of Walkerton on "The Teen Age Problems" and "The Influence of the Sunday School Upon the Community" respectively. Mr. E. D. Otter, Provincial Superintendent, of Toronto gave an address, "The Rights of the Child" The following officers were elected, President, Mr. M. G. Dippel of Walkerton: vice-president; Rev. R. Burns of Mildmay; Sec.-treas. Mr. C. W. Keeling of Cargill, home department, Mr. W. Little of Teeswater; primary department, Mrs. E. P. Moore of Teeswater. The next place of meeting was left to the executive—Teeswater News

Christopher Was

Lulu McStubbins had been a bride but a short while when the startling truth was forced upon her that her young husband was not exactly a teetotaller.

One evening, a few weeks after the wedding, the strict old cold-water crank, Papa McStubbins dropped in to call. He found his daughter all alone. After a while he asked.—

"Where is Christopher?"

"Well, the fact is Christopher isn't feeling very well this evening."

"Is that so? What seems the matter?"

"Well—er—the fact is—er—Christopher is suffering from a bad attack of propinquity."

"Propinquity, propinquity," repeated the puzzled old gentleman. "Thats a disease I never heard of You must be mistaken."

"Oh, no father. Let me explain. Propinquity means nearness, doesn't it?"

"I think so."

"And to be near is to be close, isn't it?"

"Em—yes—yes"

"And when we speak of a man as being close, we mean that he is stingy. Don't we?"

"Certainly."

"And when a man is stingy, we call him tight. Don't we?"

"I believe so."

"Well" she concluded: with a sigh "that's what's the matter with Christopher.

The readers of this paper will be pleased to learn that there is at least one dreaded disease that science has been able to cure in all its stages, and that is Catarrh. Hall's Catarrh Cure is the only positive cure now known to the medical fraternity. Catarrh being a constitutional disease, requires a constitutional treatment. Hall's Catarrh Cure is taken internally acting directly upon the blood and mucous surfaces of the system, thereby destroying the foundation of the disease, and giving the patient strength by building up the constitution and assisting nature in doing its work. The proprietors have so much faith in its curative powers that they offer One Hundred Dollars reward for any case that it fails to cure. Send for list of testimonials.

OLD COUNTRY NEWS

HOW THEY WON THE V. C.

Three Gallipoli V. C.'s are among the five awards published on Wednesday. Included in the Gallipoli honors is Sergeant James Somers, the first Tipperary V. C., who had a splendid reception when he returned home to Cloughjordan, Tipperary. Somers is aged twenty-one.

One of the V. C's.—Lieutenant Boyd Rochfort—was medically rejected before he was accepted in April after undergoing an operation for varicose veins.

Second Lt. Herbert James, 4th Batt., Worcestershire Regiment.

In the southern zone of Gallipoli on June 28th, when a portion of the regiment had been checked owing to all the officers being put out of action, Second Lt. James, who belonged to a neighboring unit, on his own initiative gathered a body of men and led them forward under heavy shell and rifle fire. He returned, organized a second party and again advanced. His gallant example put fresh life into the attack. On July 3rd he headed a party of bomb throwers up a Turkish communication trench, and after nearly all his bomb throwers had been killed or wounded he remained alone at the head of the trench and kept back the enemy single-handed till a barrier had been built behind him and the trench secured. He was throughout exposed to a murderous fire.

Captain Gerald Robert O'Sullivan, 1st Batt., Royal Inniskilling Fusiliers.

On the night of July 1-2, when it was essential that a portion of a trench at Keithia should be regained, Captain O'Sullivan, although not belonging to the troops at this point, volunteered to lead a party of bomb throwers. He advanced in the open under a very heavy fire, and to throw his bombs with greater effect, got up on the parapet, where he was completely exposed to the fire of the enemy occupying the trench. He was wounded, but not before his inspiring example had led his party to make further efforts, which resulted in the recapture of the trench. On the night of June 18-19 he saved a critical situation by great personal gallantry and good leading.

Sergeant James Somers, No. 10512, 1st Batt., Royal Inniskilling Fusiliers.

On the night of July 1-2, when, owing to hostile bombing, some of our troops had retired from a sap, Sergt. Somers remained alone until a party brought up bombs. He climbed over to the Turkish trench and bombed the Turks with great effect. Later, he advanced into the open under very heavy fire, and held back the enemy by throwing bombs into their flank until a barricade had been established. He frequently ran to and from our trenches to obtain fresh supplies of bombs. By his great gallantry and coolness Sergeant Somers was largely instrumental in effecting the recapture of a portion of our trench which had been lost.

Major George Godfrey Massy Wheeler, late 7th Hariana Lancers, Indian Army.

At Shaiba, Mesopotamia, on April 12, Major Wheeler asked permission to take out his squadron and attempt to capture a flag, the centre point of an enemy group who were firing on one of our pickets. He advanced and attacked the enemy's infantry with the lance, doing considerable execution. He then retired while the enemy swarmed out of hidden ground and formed an excellent target to our Royal Horse Artillery guns. On April 13th Major Wheeler led his squadron to the attack of the "North Mound." He was seen far ahead of his men riding single-handed for the enemy's standards. The gallant officer was killed on the Mound.

Second Lieutenant George Arthur Boyd Rochfort, Special Reserve, 1st Batt., Scots Guards.

Between Cambrin and La Bassee on August 3rd, at 2 a. m., a German trench mortar bomb landed on the side of the parapet of the communication trench in which he stood, close to a small working party of his battalion. He might easily have stepped back a few yards round the corner into perfect safety, but, shouting to his men to look out, he rushed at the bomb, seized it, and hurled it over the parapet, where it at once exploded. There is no doubt that this splendid combination of presence of mind and courage saved the lives of many of the working party.

Second-Lieutenant Sidney Clayton Woodercroft, late 5th Bn. Rifle Brigade (Prince Consort's Own.)

On July 30th, at Hooge, the enemy having broken through the centre of our front trenches, consequent on the use of burning liquids, this officer's position was heavily attacked with bombs from the flank and subsequently from the rear, but he managed to defend his post until all his bombs were exhausted, and then skilfully withdrew his remaining men. He immediately led his party forward in a counter-attack under an intense rifle and machine-gun fire, and was killed while in the act of cutting the wire obstacles in the open.

Sir Ernest Hatch, chairman of the Government Commission on Belgian Refugees, attended a conference in Glasgow and thanked Scotland on behalf of the Government for the service [illegible] in the cause of the Belgian refugees. At present Glasgow is caring for nearly 12,000 refugees, said Sir Ernest. Belgium had been the [illegible] of Scottish [illegible], and hospitality to refugees [illegible] Scotland's magnificent record was a stimulant to districts where there might be a disposition to carelessness.

The first cutting of this season's grapes on the famous black Hamburgh vine at Hampton Court Palace took place last Thursday week. A consignment of the rich fruit was packed in baskets and is sent by rail to Windsor for the King's table. It is expected that some of the fruit will be sent to hospitals for wounded soldiers. The vine, although it is 148 years old, shows no sign of decay. About 250 bunches of grapes have been allowed to ripen this year, and they average 1½ lbs. in weight.

Mr. Henry Blandy, Wyse, who died on Tuesday week at his farm, Whitley, Reading, was one of the best known breeders and exhibitors of Shorthorn dairy cattle in Berkshire. A regular exhibitor at the Royal Counties Agricultural Show, he won the dairy herd championship three times and received the King's cup twice. Aged 82, he only spent one night away from his home at Whitley, where he was born, and he rose every summer morning at 4. To get up early was therefore referred to locally as "rising with the Wyse."

"Before the war a fashion set in with Cambridge undergraduates to live in college instead of in lodgings outside. This caused a depression of the university lodging-house, like Oxford. Cambridge is deserted; all the men have gone to the front but the lodging-house keepers remain. Their plight is now sad. High rented lodging-houses whose prosperity once made them liable to a double assessment, are now empty, and they [illegible] demand for a reduction of rent and assessment.

Private James Murphy fell from [illegible] at Broadstairs at midnight on Sunday week, [illegible] out of his depth while bathing on Saturday. Murphy was unable to regain the shore. A companion, Private Peers, who went to his assistance, also got into difficulties, and both men were brought ashore in an exhausted condition by their officer, Captain Webb.

Professor Gardner, Oxford, president of the Churchmen's Union speaking at the annual conference at Rugby, said men of science and learning had lost their ideals and were under the heel of the materialistic movement. It would not be impossible to build upon the basis of an international comity of [illegible] a society of men pledged to use their powers and discoveries not for destruction, but for saving life and for moderating friction between nations.

When 2nd Lieutenant [illegible], aged 22, 3rd Cambridgeshire Regiment, was riding his motor cycle near Queen Anne's Gate, Windsor Park, on Saturday evening week, he collided with a motor car driven by Mrs. Bowring, of Rose Cottage, Windsor Forest, and driven by Mr. F. Pathos bridesmaids were robed and aprons [illegible] at a wedding at Warminster, Wilts. Friends lent them silk handkerchiefs, which they tied over their heads. They were then allowed to enter. In I Corinthians, 11th chapter, the words "Is it comely that a woman pray unto God uncovered."

Autumn Flight of Birds Under Way

The great autumn flight of the birds is now at its height. Millions of them are on the wing toward the South. Some travel by day and others by night. Why are they leaving their homes in the North?

"The mystery of bird migration," as Dr. Wells W. Cooke, one of the biologists of the U. S. Agricultural Department at Washington, phrases it, "has proved a fascinating subject for speculation and study from earliest times."

Though he knows more about birds than does any other American, including John Burroughs, even having given 37 years of enthusiastic labor to their history and their habits, Dr. Cooke cannot conclusively tell why the robin in one's garden disappears in the fall, while the sparrow remains one's neighbor every day in the year.

It was believed anciently, and by scientific men, that birds hibernated in hollow trees or hid away from the cold in the mud of rivers and water streams. "Less than a century ago," Dr. Cooke told the author of this article, "it was asserted that great flocks of birds vanished in the waters of the Mediterranean to winter in its depths."

"It has been said," Dr. Cooke continued, "that the return of the birds in the spring can be attributed to the love they have for their northern and natal home. That may be so. But why do they quit the North just as soon as the nesting season is over? When the young birds are large and experienced enough to care for themselves, the old birds begin their flight to the South.

"The first to go are the upland plover, orchard oriole, redstart and yellow warbler. They leave the eastern and central regions of the United States as early as July 10. Food is then abundant, and, so far as man can see, there are no signs of coming winter.

FOLLOWED MELTING ICE.

"There is a theory that the South and not the North was the original home of the birds and that over-population and the struggle for existence caused them to follow the retreating ice at the end of the glacier era, and thus to obtain new grounds for the breeding of their young.

"The orchard orioles, for example, arrive in southern Pennsylvania the first week in May and depart early in July. They spend, therefore, no more than two and a half months in the North. It would seem, when one thinks about it, that they leave the South that they may rear their young where there is plenty of room and where there is a sufficient supply of food.

"Yet grouse, cardinals and Carolina wrens do not migrate to the South and many a Bob White is born, lives and dies without having gone more than [illegible] miles from the spot where it was hatched. Meadow larks can be seen near New York every month in the year. The blue jay [illegible] and the black headed chickadee [illegible] [illegible] during the winter [illegible] feeding [illegible].

"While some robins spend the winter in Cuba and others go to Mexico, [illegible] can be found in the southern states of the United States throughout the year. No individual robin, perhaps, is a continuous resident of any section. The robin that nests in southern Missouri may spend the winter near the Gulf of Mexico, while its hardy cousin, born in Canada, may spend the winter in southern Missouri.

"Many species of birds that nest in Canada live during the cold months in the United States. Among such birds are the tree sparrow, the junco and the snowflake. More than a hundred species, however, quit this country every fall and live in Central and South America until the following spring.

"Some of them cross the Equator and travel to the plains of Argentina and a few keep on to Patagonia. The scarlet tanager travels back and forth from Canada to Peru. The bobolink, which nests in New England, probably spends the winter in Brazil, as do the purple martins, cliff swallows, barn swallows, nighthawks and upland plovers.

WORLD'S LONG CHAMPIONS.

"The black-poll warbler that build their nests and bring up their young in Alaska live the rest of the year in South America. The [illegible] [illegible] The Kittiwake [illegible] on the banks of the rivers in Alaska goes to Argentina, 7,000 miles distant, at the approach of autumn. These are long distances, but they [illegible] are covered [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] The migration routes of these birds are even longer. Nineteen species of shore birds that nest north of the Arctic Circle winter in South America, and of these some go to Patagonia, over a route more than 8,000 miles long.

"The world's migration champion, however, is the Arctic tern. It builds its nest so far north as to be the North Pole. When the young birds are [illegible] the [illegible] [illegible] and in the course of several months arrive at the edge of the Antarctic continent.

"Thus the tern covers the 11,000 miles or more, [illegible] between the two [illegible]. This remarkable bird, no one knows [illegible] [illegible]. A few Arctic terns have been seen along the United States coast from Long Island, but the mighty flocks of Canada geese thousands [illegible] from pole to pole, have never been noted by any ornithologist [illegible] to indicate their preferred route [illegible] [illegible] migration.

"These [illegible] the [illegible] about June 15, [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] and [illegible]. Not [illegible] [illegible] but [illegible] their daily flights, and that distance is [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] their [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible]. To the [illegible] [illegible] of the birds are [illegible] of mysteries and contradictions and the mystery of their migrations is still engaging the attention of a great many naturalists.

"Do they travel by night or during the day?" Dr. Cooke was asked.

"A few migrate only in daylight, but most birds feed and rest during the day and travel at night. The day migrants include hawks, swallows, [illegible], hawks and chimney swifts. The night hawks and chimney swifts catch their food while on the wing. Their progress north and south is slow. When they come to a lake or a large pond they fly around it, instead of over it.

MAIN BIRD HIGHWAY.

"Are the routes by which they travel known?"

"Yes, they are so well known that they have been mapped. Each route, no matter how long, has probably been of slow growth from an original short flight. Fifty species of birds, which nest in New England and live the rest of the year in South America, fly inland to Florida, thence along the coast and from island to island until they arrive at their homes in Peru, Brazil, Argentina and Patagonia.

"The 150 miles between Florida and Cuba are crossed by tens of thousands of birds belonging to some 50 species. No more than half of them, however, take the next flight of 50 miles to the mountains of Jamaica. Thence southward the birds cross a stretch of ocean 500 miles wide.

"Only a third of the species reaching Jamaica venture on this long, toodless journey. Among them are the bobolinks, and they have as traveling companions to Brazil a vireo, a kingbird and a nighthawk, which summer in Florida; the chuck-will's-widow of the Gulf States; two New England cuckoos; the gray-cheeked thrush from Quebec, the bank swallow from Labrador and the blackpoll warbler from Alaska. A mixed company it is, but the bobolinks so greatly outnumber the rest that the passage across the Caribbean may be called the bobolink route.

"The main traveled bird highway, however, is from northwest Florida across the Gulf of Mexico. A larger or smaller percentage of nearly all the species bound for South America go by this roundabout course. Birds east of the Allegheny Mountains move southwest in the fall almost parallel with the Atlantic coast. Those of the Central Mississippi Valley go south to the Gulf and cross it. Birds between the Missouri River and the edge of the plains and those from Canada, east of the Rocky Mountains, travel south until they join the others in the flight across the Gulf.

STOP EN ROUTE FOR FRUIT.

"Most North American birds on the way to Central or South America take the shorter cut across the Gulf, rather than the longer land journey by way of Texas. Millions of birds cross the Gulf at its widest part. Night after night for nearly eight months in the year myriads of hardy migrants find their way over the Gulf of Mexico.

"Water birds, especially the golden plover, have a route of their own from 2,400 miles long, over the Atlantic Ocean, and is much shorter than the main route of the other birds. The golden plover, as I have said earlier in my talk with you, covers the whole distance in a single flight. No other bird, so far as known, travels that far without resting.

"The fall migration of the golden plover, from its nesting grounds, far beyond the tree line in the Arctic regions, begins as soon as the young can shift for themselves. A stop is made on the Labrador coast. Refreshing themselves on wild fruits, the birds cross the Gulf of St. Lawrence to Nova Scotia, the starting point for their amazing ocean flight.

"Migrating birds do not fly at their highest speed. Taking all the species as a whole, the average distance covered in the spring, including days spent in resting and feeding, is about 23 miles in 24 hours. Two thousand observers are sending migration notes to the Biological Survey and our field naturalists are making investigations from Panama to the Arctic Circle. We have a record showing that the purple martins traveled one spring from New Orleans, on their way north from Brazil, to Lake Winnipeg in 12 nights, which was at the rate of 120 miles a night.

"Many birds cross the Gulf of Mexico, travelling from 500 miles to 700 miles in a single flight. The black-and-white warbler, wintering in Central America, Mexico, the West Indies and southern Florida, moves south, [illegible] over land, at about 20 miles a day. The cliff swallow, leaving South America and traveling around the Gulf of Mexico, averages 25 miles a day. Its speed is increased to 50 miles, however, in its passage up the valleys of the Mississippi and the Ohio, but falls to 20 miles across the Allegheny Mountains. Thence onward to Nova Scotia it travels 60 miles a day.

"A faster bird, however, is the gray-cheeked thrush, which, wintering in South America, travels through Louisiana to northwestern Nebraska, 1,000 miles, in about 70 days. The humming-bird, and there is no bird smaller, crosses the Gulf of Mexico in a single [illegible]. The distance ranges, as I have said, from 500 to 700 miles.

"The golden plover flies from Nova Scotia to South America, a distance of 2,400 miles, and over water all the way, in 48 hours and without stopping. Less than two ounces of fuel in the form of body fat permits the bird to make this extraordinary flight.

THEY NEVER TURN BACK.

"Robins, in the spring, leisurely move northward from Iowa to Alaska, taking 78 days to travel 3,000 miles. The black-poll warbler, which spends the winter in South America, flies from the Gulf of Mexico to Minnesota at the rate of 33 miles a day. Then he throws on the high gear, and two weeks later arrives in Northwestern Alaska, 2,500 miles away.

"Though the birds have no almanacs they know when to set out for the north or the south and once their journey begins they never turn back. Among the earliest travelers north are ducks and geese. They often reach their summer homes to find the rivers and lakes covered with ice. Purple martins and bluebirds frequently appear so early in the spring that they are frozen to death. But most birds remain in the South until it is safe to travel, and the food supply en route is sufficient.

"How do birds know that it is time to wing their way north? There is no appreciable change in temperature at their winter homes in Cuba, Mexico, Central and South America warning them that the moving season is at hand. It must be a force from within, a physiological change, that impels them to set out on their long and dangerous flights. In the course of ages habits of migration have been developed so that on the average birds arrive at their nesting place at the right time."

"Do the same kinds of birds in a community go south in company?" Dr. Cooke was asked.

"No; they migrate in groups, the old ones first and then the young ones. Strange to say, some of the old ones remain until the rest are well on the way. Returning the next year, the old ones nest where they nested before, but the young ones push on to the north. So the frontier is always being extended."

"If the weather is fair, the birds pass Bermuda without halting. After resting and feeding for a short time on the northern coast of South America, they travel overland to the plains of Argentina, where they remain from September to March. Native birds they are nesting, but no bird breeding from the North ever breeds in the South.

"After its sojourn of six months on the plains of Argentina, the golden plover returns to the Arctic circle, but by an entirely different route. Crossing South America and the Gulf of Mexico, it enters the United States by way of Louisiana and Texas, and moves northward through the Mississippi Valley. The golden plover of the Pacific has a flight of 2,000 miles from Alaska to Hawaii and makes the journey without landmarks to guide it.

SOMETIMES LOSE WAY.

"How do birds find their way? you ask. By their sense of direction, I think. They do not travel haphazard. The inhabitants of the boxes in my garden will be back again next spring, though they may spend the winter in Brazil. Something more than sight has been given to them. Even heavy fogs at sea do not cause them to stray from their course.

"Yet there are times when they momentarily lose their sense of direction. Birds setting out from Cuba for Florida on a cloudy night fly with beautiful precision. If a gale sweeps the ocean, however, they are blown out of their course and many perish in their collisions with lighthouses, the lights of which lure them to destruction.

"Do the birds of Europe migrate? Yes, and they travel back and forth and in many strange directions. Most European birds winter in Africa, going by way of Spain, but some Swedish birds go to England and some English birds go to central Europe, while many central European birds pass over to Great Britain.

"Several species of birds in the United States are decreasing in numbers, but on the whole there are a great many more birds, I believe, than there were when Columbus discovered the country, notably more robins, bobolinks, blackbirds and cat-birds.

"Birds of prey have the same mates year after year. Many other birds are monogamists, at least for the season. The red-wing blackbird and jackdaw are polygamists.

"Would insects eat up the country were it not for the birds? As that is a question over which the [illegible] of the Agricultural Department disagree I shall not try to answer it."—James P. Morrow, in Philadelphia Record.

Entire Family Stricken With Cholera.

Youngest Child Died.

The chief symptoms of cholera are vomiting, and purging occurs either simultaneously or alternately, and is usually sudden and very violent, and the matter ejected by the stomach has a bilious appearance and a nasty bitter taste. On the first symptom appearing Dr. Fowler's Extract of Wild Strawberry should be taken, and the trouble cured.

Mrs. E. Slade, 376 Logan Ave., Toronto, Ont., writes: "When I first arrived in Canada, nearly four years ago, my entire family was stricken with cholera, from which the youngest child died. Soon after a friend recommended Dr. Fowler's Extract of Wild Strawberry, and acting on this advice I administered it to all who were suffering, with the most gratifying results. Since that first attack my children have been subject to stomach troubles, but on the first symptoms I resort to "Dr. Fowler's," and it always brings relief. I have immense faith in this medicine, and always keep a bottle on hand. May I never fail to recommend it to anyone who is similarly troubled."

When you ask for "Dr. Fowler's" see that you get it.

It has been on the market for the past 70 years.

Her Nerves Were So Bad Thought She Would Go Out of Her Mind.

Mrs. Holla Knox, 45 Harding St., St. John, N.B., writes: "I suffered greatly with my nerves, I could not sleep at night, nor work, and the least little thing worked on my mind and bothered me. Last winter I thought I would go out of my mind, I would screech out, and my mother really thought I was going crazy with my nerves. It was so terrible I would hold my head and cry. I tried two doctors but they did not do me any good. I thought I would tell you that to-day I am perfectly cured by using three boxes of Milburn's Heart and Nerve Pills, and I can recommend them to all sufferers from nervous troubles so you can tell everyone that they are the only thing that did me any good."

A SENSITIVE LOVER

(By Sarah Baxter).

Barnard was walking the floor. When a man walks the floor with a knit brow it is evident there is something on his mind. And there was something on Barnard's mind—a good deal, in fact. He was a worshipper of Miss Brayton, and Miss Brayton was very ill. Barnard had heard that the doctors were desirous of making the experiment of a transfusion of blood, but had not thus far found any hearty person who was willing to give up his or her blood for the purpose.

Barnard had offered himself to Miss Brayton, and she had refused him. He was now ready to give her his blood or his life, if necessary, but would not this be placing her under an obligation which might cause her to reconsider her refusal? It seemed to him like taking an unfair advantage of her; that it would be an obtrusion, and ungracious act, rendering him liable to a charge of trying to win her by unfair means. Besides, Barnard had always said four unless the girl he wanted wanted him, and that very badly, he didn't want her.

How would it do for him to give her his blood without her knowing from whom the gift came? Barnard stopped short in his walk and tugged at his mustache. Then he took up his hat, crammed it down on his head and hurried away to Miss Brayton's physician.

After an interview it was settled that the invalid should receive Barnard's blood without knowing it. This could be done by performing the operation in a room dimly lighted, with Barnard's face covered. No one but the doctor and the couple operated on need be present, and the identity of the blood giver need not be divulged.

The operation was performed, and [illegible] restored her health and strength. Barnard had the satisfaction of having saved her life, but saw no more evidence of a predisposition for him than before. Indeed, it was not long after the operation that he heard she was engaged to a man whom he had feared as a rival. This threw Barnard into despondency.

One evening at a young persons' gathering, at which Barnard, Miss Brayton and her fiance, Mortlake, were present, Barnard heard a young lady near him say that there was a very pretty romance between Miss Brayton and Mr. Mortlake. Barnard pricked up his ears, but failed to learn what the romance was. But a week later he met a friend who asked him why he had not got in ahead of Mortlake when Miss Brayton was ill and offered his blood. Thus it came out that Mortlake had saved his fiancee's life.

This was a romance with a vengeance. Mortlake had undoubtedly won the girl by claiming to have saved her life at the risk of his own.

That evening Barnard was walking the floor in a more disgruntled state of mind than before. His rival had beaten him by a lie, and he was not in a position to set the matter right. True, he had only to refer the matter to the surgeon who performed the operation, but this would be interfering between a girl and her lover—a dog in the manger business that was far beneath a man of Barnard's sensitive temper. On the other hand, what right had he to permit the girl he loved to marry a man who had lied to get her?

Barnard, being in a quandary, remained in quandary. These sensitive fellows who keep themselves in the background are usually overlooked by girls, who, did they know the facts, would most assuredly prefer them. Barnard was too refined in feeling to save either himself or the girl he loved.

But one morning Miss Brayton, being indisposed, sent for her physician. During the visit she told him that there was a certain secret which she knew he was pledged to keep, but she knew it all the same. Then she announced to him her engagement.

"I congratulate him," said the doctor. "He took considerable risk for you and deserves you."

"How he must have loved me!"

"I fancied he was doing it for love."

"It would have been ungracious for me to refuse him after the sacrifice he made for me."

"You have got a fine fellow. I took a fancy to Barnard the moment I laid eyes on him."

"Barnard!"

"Yes, Barnard. You're engaged to Barnard, aren't you?"

Miss Brayton's eyes grew as big as butter plates.

"Was it Mr. Barnard who saved me?"

"Why, yes. I thought you knew."

The cat was out of the bag.

Soon after this revelation Mortlake received a note from his fiancee stating that she must break her engagement. She [illegible] she had discovered [illegible] she could not love him.

Barnard heard that the girl he loved was free, but since she had pledged the doctor to keep mum he had no [illegible] cause of the breaking of her engagement. One day he received a note asking him to call. He did so, and Miss Brayton frankly told him that in refusing him she had mistaken her feelings. Barnard was not slow in giving her an opportunity to correct the mistake. They were married, and it was not till the day after the wedding that she told him the secret.

"Why didn't you tell me that before?" he said in an injured tone.

"Because I didn't propose that you should indulge in any more nonsense."

THE POULTRY WORLD

CULL OUT YOUR FLOCK.

Culling the flock, or rejecting all but the best of specimens, requires nerve, and because many poultry-keepers lack this essential they fail to make the most out of poultry by retaining many fowls that are not up to standard and develop into star boarders. It is then the owner keeps poultry when poultry should keep him. The keeping of fowls that do not come up to standard goes further than just the poor production of hen fruit. But when used as breeders the offspring are not up to the mark and in many cases worse than the parent stock, for in the majority of cases like begets like.

With the experienced poultry-keeper cullings begins as it should, at an early age. The weaker chicks, those not developing well, are sold for market. They are generally sold at the broiler age, when weighing from 1-4 to 2 1-2 pounds. The chicks that show normal growth for the age and variety of the breed are retained. The males with best standard qualifications are kept to head the breeding pens next year. The remainder are sold as roosters weighing then from 3 to 5 pounds. All females should be kept that come up to standard weight for the breed and show rapid maturity, rejecting all those that do not show thrift in their development from chickhood. With many up-to-date breeders these pullets are put under the trap-nest system and the practice of some of the leading breeders is to reject all pullets that do not lay from the egg onward in 200 days.

The great majority of poultry-keepers do not care to go to the extra trouble of trap-nesting the pullets, and in this case a creditable flock can be established by selecting those pullets that are strong and healthy and have developed without double trimming to standard weight at the age of maturity. By selecting these good specimens one can always rest assured with a good poultry house and well-balanced ration a profitable return can always be assured. But with a flock where no culling has been done too many of the poor specimens are retained that are but poor producers, cutting down the profits of the flock by their poor work. In other words, they are the star boarders of the flock, and the rest of the fowls must keep them. Again they may by chance of their developing in size, as the season goes on, look almost as good as some of the fastest-developing fowls and be retained as breeders, and that means more culls.

Nothing ever forward in poultry, only by selecting, and the experienced breeder recognizes the fact as a close culler. But the average poultry keeper with quantity in his mind for quantity, are too [illegible] sight of the [illegible]. Even with many of the more experienced breeders closer culling could be practiced with better results [illegible]. The money should not lose sight of the fact that the profit is derived from quality and not from quantity, but from quality.

Good management, such as housing, feeding and care, play important parts in poultry success. But without good breeding and a high grade flock of [illegible] from known producers, the greatest success cannot be obtained. With many a chicken is a chicken, and if given feed and the proper attention a profit can be made.

The day is coming when the blood lines of each strain of fowls will be known to play a big part in the profit to be derived from poultry.

The future fowl must have a reputation for productiveness, not one, but the majority in the flock, and the culling out of all poor specimens is the first step towards its improvement.

RIGHT EQUIPMENT NEEDED.

The chief cause of failure in poultry is due in many cases to underestimation of the cost in properly equipping and conducting a plant until a profit is derived. In the poultry press we see the oft-repeated statement that more money could be made for the money invested than in any other line of business, nevertheless those who have not attempted to understand this statement fully, have to their sorrow, found that while the statement was true, the expenditure of money was far greater than was to be expected from the oft-time article of the cheapness of a start in poultry. The one man plant, the plant that will enable one to make a living and something over, cannot be started on practically nothing. The proper poultry buildings and equipment must be provided. No one could run a drug or grocery business without the store and stock. So in poultry, one must have the buildings and the proper equipment to handle the business on a profitable basis. This does not mean expensive buildings, but should mean poultry houses that will give the right amount of floor space per fowl and the best of ventilation, and so arranged as to give the caretaker the least labor in caring for the poultry. This is economy in the right direction.

With the present price of lumber the average well-made house will cost $1 per bird, allowing four square feet of floor space for each fowl, which is a safe number for the average beginner to carry. This does not include the outside fencing of poultry yard. It will be seen that to house 1,000 layers which is close to in the number that one should have to attain a comfortable living from fowls, that it will cost in the neighborhood of $1,000.

Then there are the incubators, brooders, the colony, or brooder-house, in which the brooders must be placed. No amount of poultry knowledge can overcome bad poultry equipment, and each year the poultry expert realizes more and more that proper poultry equipment plays an important part.

The fact is now generally known that in the past overcrowding has caused much loss. When poultry is confined to ill-ventilated buildings and crowded together in large flocks, the results have been not always a large death rate, but loss in size and slow maturity, and with it the loss of vigor in the future breeding stock. While these [illegible] fowls may lay a number of eggs later they will never prove profitable to hold over or to be used as breeders for the foundation of one's flock. In obtaining good strong stock the running of a plant for greatest profits, poultry equipment plays a big part, and the best success cannot be obtained without it.

NOTES.

Keep the pullets growing steadily. It is these fowls that have received no check in growth due to poor handling that will lay on schedule time.

The hens that have been retained for future breeding should receive good care during the moult which is now up with the majority of hens. Too few realize the importance of giving these breeders the care that should have. Neglect now will tell in January, February or March when strong hatching eggs are wanted.

This is the season when the beginner is purchasing breeding stock for the [illegible] hatching season or pullets that are expected to lay this fall and winter. In the purchase of stock avoid the bargain counter kind, but few breeders of reputation can afford to sell stock at market prices, or but a few cents above the commercial quotations. Be willing to pay a fair price and thus obtain stock that will prove satisfactory.

Barred Plymouth Rocks are being exhibited at the different fairs in the same numbers, showing that this old strain is keeping at the head of the procession. With good utility qualities and a large number of loyal breeders, this variety will not soon be displaced by any other breed now in the standard. Any all around variety with utility qualities will always be in demand.

The turkeys should have a shady place on their range during the summer, and if part of it is low damp ground they will not [illegible] natural food.

Be sure to put the drinking dish or fountain in a shady, cool place and renew the water at least three times a day in hot weather.

[illegible] are very [illegible] to suffer from sunstroke during the hot weather unless given plenty of shade. If there are no trees, make some shade for them.

[illegible] and weather, it is best to place only a few chicks in each brood. Then there is less danger that they will crowd together and overheat, or suffocate, or both.

[illegible] the young chick is free from lice, it is useless to expect profitable growth. [illegible] for the [illegible].

Do not crowd the fowls or chicks in [illegible] but be sure that they always have clean, fresh drinking water [illegible] fountains.

All kinds of [illegible] the [illegible] breed [illegible] [illegible] and [illegible] killing [illegible].

In spite of the fact that [illegible] were [illegible] is the best [illegible] for poultry that we have and were [illegible] of [illegible] have been grown on [illegible].

The fall months are the ones to guard against [illegible]. More poultry [illegible] the dreaded roup during the fall months than any other time in the year.

Fresh eggs should command just as high a price this fall and winter as last year, and the poultry keeper with a well-matured flock, properly cared for, should make money. Like all business lines, there are the fat and lean years, and the sticker is the one who makes the most out of poultry.

WENT BY THE RULE.

But He Should Have Halted a Moment and Noted the Exceptions

It is not bewildered foreigners alone who fall into the traps for the unwary that our confusing grammar and orthography lay. Many a despairing American with no nature aptitude for spelling [illegible] or [illegible] to the dictionary long after his student days are over because although he remembers the rule, he does not remember the exceptions.

"And in our rules of spelling," protested one unfortunate professor not of orthography—"it isn't even a case of 'majority rules.' It isn't even a case of Sometimes, I'm sure, the minority of exceptions to a rule isn't beaten by the words that comply with it by more than one."

A correspondent of the New York Sun recalls an illustrative incident of his school days. His teacher was self satisfied and young, thought he knew it all—but did not.

There was in the class a young lady who rejoiced in the good Scots name of Gillies. When the class was organizing the "professor" read her name as "Jillies." The young lady protested, but in vain: "G" before "i" is soft."

Well, of course an eighth of a quart is a gill, but what of a fish's gill? And the "know it all" teacher should have been hanged on a gibbet, but even he would not have asked the hardware man for a gimlet. Not in his giddiest moment of pedagogic authority would he have said, "Jillett, fix me a fit wheeled jig," if he wanted the liveryman to supply him with a gig with gilted spokes for his holiday diversions. Not even he, snapshot arbiter of linguistic niceties, would have asked at the library for Jibbon's "Decline and Fall." And if he has a daughter will she be a Jill? But Gillies must be called Jillies because "g" before "i" is soft.—Youth's Companion.

Men in Petticoats.

It will probably be a matter of surprise to the general reader to learn that the petticoat was first worn exclusively by men. In the reign of King Henry VII. the dress of the English was so fantastic and absurd that it was difficult to extinguish one sex from the other. In the inventory of Henry V. appears a "petticoat of red damask with open sleeves." There is no mention of a woman's petticoat before the Tudor period.

FARM GARDEN

SOME BEE POINTERS.

The study of bees is interesting, and the profits of keeping them are large, considering the amount invested.

The worker bee hatches in 21 days from fresh eggs, and a drone in 24 days. The queen does not go to the fields in search of honey, but devotes her time to depositing eggs. A company of workers follow and attend to all the wants of the queen. She, therefore, does not have the hard struggles the workers have when from home, and she will live to the ripe old age of two, three and sometimes four years.

For a few days after hatching the worker bee devotes its time as a nurse in the hive, either feeding the queen or young brood, or maybe in helping to build comb, on pleasant days taking exercise flights in front of the hive to develop wing power and learning to make their home location. When three or five days old, if the bee was hatched during the honey flow, it will begin its field labor of gathering honey, making many trips per day, working night and day as if the destiny of the entire colony depended upon her, so that the life or age of such a worker bee is from three to four weeks.

In normal conditions, when a swarm leaves the hive, the old queen goes with a greater portion of the workers to make for themselves a new home in some distant tree. There is left in the hive a small colony of worker bees and an abundance of drone bees, and all the way from two or three to twenty or fifty queen cells, and the most of them nearly ready to hatch. If one bee hatches a few moments before her rival sisters, she, with attendant workers, at once begins to gnaw in the side wall of the queen cells, and when opened the outside queen can easily send her death sting into her sister. But often before all such queens are killed there will be several hatched, and when they meet there is a pitched battle, biting off each other's legs and wings, at the same time each one thrusting their sting with all their strength against their rivals until one or both are dead.

Only one queen will stay in a hive, so it often happens that there will be two or three of these young queens, who, rather than fight for life, will take a portion of the bees in the hive and go to the woods. Such second or after swarms are seldom of any profit unless returned where they came from.

All queens when four to seven days old will, if weather permits, take their wedding flight, select the drone of her choice, and while on the wing become mated, only once and for life. When several colonies of bees are near together, as in an apiary, it is not necessary to allow but a few drones to hatch in each colony. Better select the colony and raise all in that one, as the above mission is all the drone is good for. The drone bee never gathers any honey nor helps in the household duties. He is simply an extravagant eater and a loafing gentleman.

The queen, when from eight to ten days old, or three to five days after mating, will begin to lay eggs, only a few the first day, but rapidly increasing the number until during the best of the brood-rearing season 2,000 to 3,000 eggs are deposited daily.

Some bee men clip every queen as soon as she is laying. It is no damage to her. She will live as long and produce as much brood as if she had both wings, and it will prevent her from going in the woods with a colony of bees. They clip the feathery portion of both wings of one side of her body. To clip her they take her in their left hand, holding her by the waist or thorax with thumb and finger, leaving the legs and wings free. Often she is held by the left wing with thumb and finger, letting her stand on the thumb with the right wing loose, and then with small round-pointed scissors clip the feathery portion of both wings of right side of body. It is as cruel to cut the bony part of a queen bee's wing as it would be to chop off the whole wing of a barnyard fowl.

If several colonies of bees are ready to swarm, it is a great convenience to the owner on a bright morning when swarms are coming out to take their leisure time, to go to each hive where a swarm has just issued, and in the grass near the hive find a bunch of bees and the queen with them. He has no tall tree to climb to get the colony. Simply return the queen after taking out all the queen cells, and if necessary remove one or two brood combs for empty ones. In short, he does with the bees as he thinks best, and he has no bees going to the woods or trouble in getting them hived.

FARM NEWS AND VIEWS.

Alfalfa is rich in protein. So is cotton-seed cake. Corn is low in protein and something like alfalfa or cottonseed should be fed with it. Which is cheapest? Farm and Fireside thinks it depends on conditions. A test made in Nebraska shows that the use of cottonseed cake in place of alfalfa in that State increased the cost of the meat and lowered the profits of the feeder. The reason is that the alfalfa can be produced on the farm and the cottonseed had to be brought from afar. A feeding test in Alabama or Georgia might have shown opposite results. We must study our own conditions, that's sure.

The soil provides the plant not only with certain plant foods, but also with water and air; and the extent and nature of these supplies go more to determine the crop than anything else. Therefore, although manuring is often necessary, it is of vital importance that the soil should be well cultivated and properly.

CHASING THE RAINBOW.

Curious Legends That Are Told in Different Countries.

We have all of us heard stories of the treasure at the end of the rainbow. "There is a pot of gold there, you know. And if we could only walk far enough, and fast enough, we might find it and be ever thereafter happy.

That is what our nurses tell us, when we are children, isn't it?

And sometimes we learn that the rainbow is a bridge, and the thunder is the roar of the heavy wheels going over it.

These are the stories that we hear in childhood about the rainbow. Children of other lands hear many other stories.

In Greece nurses tell the children that if any one by chance stumbles over the end of the rainbow his or her sex is changed. A fine story that to tell a child! The little Greeks must run away from the ends of the rainbow instead of seeking them to find our pot of gold.

The little Turk hears from his nurse that if he can but touch the band of orange that spans the heavens in the rainbow his head will turn to silver, with rubies for eyes and teeth of gold.

In many parts of Russia the rainbow is called a pump, and in Hungary it is called "God's Pump" and "Noah's pump."

In Russia, in some provinces, the wells are covered with strong platforms, so that the water cannot be drawn from them by the rainbow, and in other provinces it is said that three angels have charge of the rainbow—one only to draw water through it from the earth, another to send water from it to the clouds and another to return the water to the earth in the form of rain.—Boston Herald.

CONSIDERATE KATE.

(New York Weekly)

"Really, Kate," said the young man in considerable agitation, "I am very sorry I lost my head and kissed you. I didn't think what I was doing. It was a sort of temporary insanity in our family."

"Well, Roy, replied the young woman, "if you ever feel any more such attacks coming on, you had better come right here where your infirmity is known, and we will take care of you."

NORTH-WEST FISH

First Car Lots Sent to Chicago From Lesser Slave Lake.

Notable developments are taking place this fall in the fisheries of western Canada. The announcement is made by the Grand Trunk Pacific authorities that White Fish is now being shipped in car lots from Lesser Slave Lake in Northern Alberta to Chicago.

The construction of the Edmonton, Dunvegan & British Columbia Railway northward from the main line of the G. T. P. has made this lake accessible and in its waters are great numbers of fish. Two companies have been formed to carry on the fishing in the lake and the Canadian Express Company is being called upon to supply special refrigerator cars to take the fish to Edmonton and thence by way of the Grand Trunk Pacific to Winnipeg and by connecting lines to Chicago.

A great distributing point for fresh fish, the Chicago Market states that it can take all the white fish that can be sent from Western Canada and the transportation companies, it is expected, will have to enlarge their arrangements next year to meet the growing traffic.

Chicago is also taking from Canada large quantities of fresh Prince Rupert halibut, and the fishing industry is very brisk at the new Pacific Coast port. Over fifteen million pounds of fish handled in the month of August was Prince Rupert's record. While the salmon end of the industry was the largest part of the business, halibut showed up well, with 2,193,460 pounds landed at this port. The salmon pack for the month represented 12,999,700 pounds of fish, representing at a moderate valuation well on for three-quarters of a million dollars. Of the salmon catch, 4,039 hundredweight was used fresh or shipped fresh. There was about 223 hundredweight that was mild cured, while the remainder was canned. In the canning process, 149,527 cases were taken care of during August. There were 11,000 pounds of cod taken and used fresh and flounders represented 1,600 pounds.

RE-INFORCEMENTS FOR THE PRINCESS PATRICIA'S, C. L. I.

The Universities of Canada have now for some time been working loyally together to reinforce that gallant regiment the Princess Patricias' Canadian Light Infantry. Three companies have already gone overseas, numbering 700 men, and a fourth company is now under formation at Montreal.

The University Companies are now known throughout the length and breadth of Canada, so that there is a continuous flow of men of the right type to Montreal. Not only do such men find entry to a famous regiment, but they are rapidly equipped and trained and sent without delay oversea to England, where they are comfortably billeted in huts at an excellent camp near the sea on the South Coast of England. Moreover, the men secure the great advantage of good comradeship with congenial spirits of similar tastes and antecedents.

The first company, under a notable officer, Captain Gregor Barclay, has been declared by regular officers of experience to be second to none compared with any company of any army in the world.

The second company was raised over-strength in seven weeks by Captain G. McDonald and Captain Prey Molson. Both companies are now in France.

The third company called eighty over strength because the newspaper publishers of Canada are good enough to make known, through their columns that the company was being formed. This resulted in such a rush of recruits that it was necessary to apply to the Militia Council of Ottawa for a special authority to increase the strength from 250 to 330 men. Each man before embarkation writes to a friend who is a likely recruit and tells him of the advantages of the Universities Company, so that even before the men have disembarked a fresh company is assembling on the McGill Campus at Montreal.

Recruits are examined locally by an Army Medical Officer and are attested by a magistrate in the nearest city, after which an application is made for transportation, which is speedily furnished from Montreal.

This system is effective and rapid, and free from red tape. There are in nearly every city representatives of the various universities, who are always ready to help forward the good work, and to give information to men anxious to enlist.

The regulations respecting enlistment, pay and separation allowances are precisely the same as those for other Canadian troops.

At Montreal, the University lends buildings for barracks, and the campus for drill ground. Affiliation with the McGill Officers' Training Corps is a great benefit, and interesting tactical work is carried out on the slopes of Mount Royal.

There is competent instruction in tactics, musketry, bayonet fighting and trench making. The C. P. R. is kind enough to lend their gallery for shooting practice. A machine gun is available and signalling, now of immense importance, is also taught.

All information can be obtained from Capt. A. S. Eve, 382 Sherbrooke street west, the headquarters of the successive companies.

The newspapers have proved themselves to be the most efficient means of raising recruits, and every reader who cannot himself go to the front can help in the present struggle by calling the attention of his friends to this opportunity.

Why Milk Sours.

We are told by those who study the ways and manners of the [illegible] microbe that he is very fond of sugar, and that he delights to gratify this [illegible] by turning the sugar in milk into an acid which sours the milk. These microbes are constantly in the [illegible] though invisible, and ready to drop into the milk when they can. If it were possible to keep the milk out the air after the cow is milked it would not turn sour. Warm milk is particularly inviting to the microbe and favorable to his operations. He does not get along well under chilling conditions, and that is why the sweetness of milk can be preserved if it is kept cold. Boiling fresh milk changes the sugar in such a way that the microbe cannot feed upon it.—Baltimore American.

DID GOOD WORK

British Railways and Their Share in Great War.

The experience of the great campaign has shown how much Germany is indebted to railways for her strategy. It is no small tribute to German railway management that it has been able to build up a railway system with special reference to means of offense and defense, without cost to the German taxpayer. In connection with both the eastern and western campaigns, Germany has been able to move large masses of men from point to point with great rapidity. The national railway has been a cardinal point in the German campaign.

In the case of Britain, an island defended by the sea, the railways have been only needed to assemble troops and supplies at ports of departure, and to move bodies of men in training about the country. These are important functions. It was altogether impossible to continue with a host of independent railway managements. It was also out of the question to enter at short space upon a scheme of nationalization by purchase. But fortunately it had been foreseen, in drafting the Regulation of the Forces Act in 1871, that occasion might arise for the Government to take over the railway services. Section 16 of that act runs that when the Crown by Order-in-Council declares that an emergency has arisen in which it is expedient for the public service that the Government should have control over the railroads of the United Kingdom, or any of them, the Secretary of State may empower any person or persons to take possession in the name of the Crown of any British railroad and to use it in any such manner as the Government may direct. Further, that the directors, officers and servants of a railroad so taken over shall obey the directions of the Government.

In accordance with this enactment the British Government, on Aug. 4, the very day on which it declared war against Germany, issued an order-in-Council declaring it expedient that the Government should have control over the railroads in Great Britain, this control to be exercised through an executive committee composed of general managers of railways which had been formed for some time, and which had prepared plans with a view to facilitating the working of the act. Thus, by a stroke of the pen, under an act of Parliament forty-three years old, the British Government took control of the railways of the United Kingdom.

The national control has been exceedingly successful. The National Executive has been able to move troops to the ports by night and to ship with few hitches. A great army, the precise number of which has not been divulged, but which is known to be enormous, has been successfully conveyed to the south coast for transport across the Channel, together with gigantic quantities of military stores, from ammunition to horses, and from food to artillery. The National Board has been in complete control of the situation. Each company has had to do what it was told and to make any arrangements necessary for the safe and speedy conduct of the abnormal traffic. The ability of a picked body of British railway managers has shown itself equal to the occasion, and gone far to prove what a very different thing can be made of the British railway service in peace if the best men in it were given a real chance to show what they could do.—L. G. Chiozza Money in the October Metropolitan.

BEAUTY IN BLACK.

Real and False Widows of Paris Know Mourning's Magic

Once a worried wife in Paris feared that her husband's affections were cooling.

She had the luck to know an extraordinary little old woman, Madame Isabelle, is shabby, shrunken, wrinkled, but she has been everything, done everything, enjoyed everything, and to-day—though you might laugh at her looks—she has a greater part than any other in the mysterious function of creating new Paris styles. I shall tell you about her some day.

"I have tried everything," said the worried wife, "beauty specialists, smart gowns and every fad and frivolity which he admires in other women."

Madame Isabelle smiled.

"Try little mourning," she said. "Watch your chance, and go into black for three months."

The W. W. went and did it, and to the success which resulted she confided the tip to her dear friends. So, later, I got to hear it. (An American girl painter whose mere ambition was just ordinary happy marriage, gave out that she was mourning for an aunt.)

"Nothing so enhances a woman as mourning," said Madame Isabelle, "It brings out the complexion and every good point. Mourning attracts by its mystery, by the piquancy of contrast, and by the chivalry which its excites. And there is a vanity in men which is flattered to turn mourning into joy."

The present phenomenon in Paris proves her wisdom.

Never were there so many real widows and so many imitations.

Real grief mourns, neglectful of dress.

Lesser grief makes the discovery of mourning's charm.

Almost everyone has lost some relative.

And the black does the rest. It softens the thoughtless, makes gentle the forward and inclines the heart to goodness.

The success is colossal, and the queer thing is they do not realize that their own souls have been sweetened—which is more than half the secret.

It is the latest work of Paris the magic of mourning.

The Firefly Is a Puzzle

Why the light of the firefly?

Textbooks do not tell, and encyclopedias can give no reason and at the Academy of Natural Sciences experts on insects admit that they do not know.

It is true that the lightning bug has unusually well developed eyes and some students believe that because of this fact the light is employed to aid sight. But there is also a belief that the flying beetle does not gather food while in the air. So why should it want to see?

Another thing that is mysterious. Observers say that the flash of the firefly generally is upward. Sometimes it is a stationary flash and sometimes it is a horizontal streak. Only on rare occasions is it bent downward.

In the suburbs just as dusk is falling and the phantom mist settles across lawns and fields, millions of tiny flashes sparkle like diamonds floating in the air. At first the earth seems carpeted with gems, while the bushes gleam in soft greenish hue. A little later the lights rise, seemingly clustering around the trees, then they swing higher and higher until the faint signals have reached the topmost branch es of the tallest oak or poplar.

Ever emitting an ascending outburst of phosphorescence it would seem that the firefly flew so far into the sky that it never came back, for no person has ever seen those millions of greenish-white streaks descending toward the earth.

As a matter of scientific fact the firefly seldom goes more than a hundred feet into the atmosphere. It does not remain in the air all night, but after a few hours returns to the trees, bushes or grass. At the Academy of Natural Sciences the nightly flights are ascribed to the mating instinct.

Female fireflies are more luminous than the males, and there are some varieties where the male is non-sparking. Also the intervals of flashing differ with different varieties and with different atmospheric conditions.

Many persons have noticed that the lightning bugs with us now seem to be larger and more brilliant than during early June. This is true. They are not the same beetles, but are a totally different variety. The glow worm which has no wings is a female of still another species. This rests in the grass and gives forth a steady light instead of intermittent flashes.

Still some more information. Why are some of the brilliant fellows seen in the suburban districts and near lawns than in the country fields? Do they like civilization? Here's why. The firefly is a beetle. When winter comes it burrows into the ground and lies dormant until late spring. Lawns and large grass plats are seldom plowed so that the beetle is not killed. On the other hand, fields have to be cultivated and that means destruction to the bugs.

Not only is the lightning bug a pretty thing, but its friends hold that it is valuable. It is carnivorous as a general thing and finds a livelihood by crawling under grass, stones and bark and eating the larvae and eggs of other insects, many of which are destructive to plant life. It is especially fond of small snails. Under no circumstances can the firefly be considered destructive to crops.

South America produces the greatest varieties of fireflies as well as the largest. When early explorers described some of the flies the world was incredulous. There are skeptics today who doubt the assertion that one species found in Paraguay carries a red headlight and a red stern light, with green lights on each side. It is called the railway beetle.

There is another which carries two yellow side lamps and a green stern light. In some part of South America women pin big fireflies in their hair as a nifty sort of decoration. Still another big beetle gives out such a steady, powerful glow that if several are placed in a glass jar they furnish enough illumination to read by.

From an economic viewpoint the light generator of the firefly is the most perfect thing known. The insect produces its luminosity without loss of heat or chemical rays. If the process could be discovered and applied industrially, the value to the world would be almost incalculable. Thus far the firefly has held its immensely valuably secret and it remains as it has been for centuries, the wonder of scientists, the admiration of nature lovers and the pretty plaything chased by children.—Philadelphia North American.

THIS STONE BENDS.

Itakolumite, of Sandy Composition, Startles Its Handlers.

A great deal of interest has been recently directed to samples of itakolumite, a stone which is found in Brazil. When flexible, itakolumite is cut into thin plates, and when examined with a microscope it is found to be composed almost entirely of fine grains of sand of peculiar shape, with indented edges, which interlock like the fingers of clasped hands. The flexibility of the material result from this interlocking of the grains of sand, of which it is chiefly composed. Although but few persons know that stone can be anything but hard, the flexible stone is not so much of a curiosity as it seems, for it is found in North Carolina, and there are specimens of it in the cases of a Philadelphia collection. The sensation of handling a [illegible] a piece of stone which bends like a piece of rubber is a strange experience. If handled too roughly the stone breaks.

Animals That Never Drink.

It would seem that water is so indispensable to life that no animals could exist without drinking. Nevertheless, Dr. Stanford asserts that the antelopes which live in the sand desert between the salt lake Chilka and the sea never drink. This has been doubted by physiologists, who deny that existence is possible in such conditions, but confirmatory evidence is now adduced by Dr. Drake-Brockman. It appears that [illegible] a species of gazelle, have lived in the small island [illegible] Din [illegible] the side of [illegible], where there is no source of water and where the annual rainfall is less than three inches, so that the gazelle cannot obtain water except after [illegible] showers.

Mr. John Irwin has bought the farm of Mr. R. Filberton Paisley of the 8 th con. of Bruce. Jack intends moving onto it in the spring.

Mr. Wm. Russel, we are sorry to report, is very low and little hope is held for his recovery.

Mr. Jno. Metcalf delivered a fine span of horses to Mr. Geo. Craig of Paisley last week.

Every-body seemed to have taken in Paisley fair. That was all could be expected. The Directors done well to get the 71st Battlion from London for attraction, the soldiers gave a few good drills and made grand showing for themselves and showed the people what a benifit it is to drill, every man drilled to every thing, one equal to the other. The machine gun fireing was the main attraction. The Germans will drop when they face the 71st. battlion machine gun. The soldiers were an orderly bunch of men, nobody seemed to know much about the rest of the show for the people stayed to see the soldiers drill and did not go to see the rest of the show.

Mr. J. E. McConnell was up from London on Friday in connection with the transfer of his interest in the Telescope to the new owner. When "Ed" McConnell was the printer's devil on this paper not so many years ago, he had dreams that some day he might rise to the exalted position of editor and publisher of the Telescope. Very soon however, his love of the business end of the game drew him away from his editorial ambitions and he is now a big figure in the advertising world. Mr. McConnell says he would like fine though to live up here among the fellows he used to play hookey with, and if he did, he would have a farm on the edge of the town and "grow" his own butter and eggs. As a matter of fact he is doing that now. He has a place at home some three or four miles out of London where he and his family enjoy the pleasures of country living.

The Captain landed in Montreal on Monday and after a visit to his home in Chesley, will return to England.

Goes to Hespeler.

The Wiarton Canadian of last week contained the following reference to a former Walkerton boy in the person of Gordon Smith. Mr. Gordon E. Smith, who has been the most efficent agent of the Grand Trunk at this point for the past three years, has been promoted and will soon assume charge of of the agent at Hespeler. Mr. Smith is a most competent railway man, and that he will do well and that the interests of the Grand Trunk in Hespler will be in safe hands there is no doubt. Hespeler is an important point and needed a good man. Just who will succeed Mr. Smith here has not been decided.

Ont. License Board Here

Chairman Flavelle Says No New Licenses Will be Granted Except For Very Strong Reasons. Commission Determined to Drive Law-breakers Out of Business.

The Ontario Board of License Commissioners sat at the Court House here on Tuesday morning and heard arguments for and against the granting of certain licenses in this license district. The members present were:—Chairman Flavelle, Vice-Chairman Dingman and Commissioner Ayearst. The Commissioners made no comment on the merits of the cases presented and will not give a decision for some time. Chairman Flavelle was very clear and outspoken in regard to the general policy of the Commission. He expressed the determination of the Board to drive the law breakers out of business, and so long as the present license system lasts, to protect those hotel-keepers who give the public good service and obey the law.

The impression of those who attended the sitting was that the number of licenses in Walkerton will probably remain the same as at present, the decision of course will rest entirely with the judgment of the Commission and it will not be announced for some time.

Temperance Deputation Heard

Messrs. C. L. Benton and James Tolton spoke on behalf of the local temperance organization, suggesting that the number of licenses in Walkerton be reduced from four to three. They stated that the community had suffered no loss through the action of the local License Board last year in cutting off two Walkerton hotels. The Commission was commended for the manner in which it is taking hold of the provincial situation and confidence expressed that it would give a fair decision in regard to the local situation.

A resolution passed by the local branch of the Dominion Alliance, was presented to the Commission, which read as follows:—"At a meeting of the Walkerton branch of the Dominion Alliance held on the above date it was resolved—That we, the executive and members of the above Alliance would submit our appreciation of the work you are doing towards the curtailing of the liquor traffic in our Province, which work causes the advance of the Temperance cause in the country, and that the action of our honorable Board meets with the approval of the Temperance people in our community. We would also beg to submit that there has not been any public inconvenience or loss caused by, or owing to the fact that two licenses had been refused by our local License Commissioners in April 1915. And further we would submit that we believe that three licenses in our town would be quite sufficient for accommodation of the public at large.

JAS. WARREN, President
JOHN MCCOOL, Secretary

Want Wiarton License Cancelled

Three Wiarton citizens appeared before the Board to ask that the license of Mr. Gladstone, proprietor of the St. Albans Hotel, be cancelled. Mr. A. E. Pickard said that the hotel was generally recognized as a menace to the community. The town has two good Commercial hotels, and one farmers hotel, which were quite sufficient to look after the needs of the public. D. V. Byers stated that three convictions had been registered the past two years, one against the bar-tender, two against the proprietor, the last conviction being in September for selling liquor to minors. Mr. Shute gave evidence of the hotel having harbored a drunken man. Mr. Gladstone said on his own behalf that he had been in the hotel business thirty years and no convictions had been registered against him until he came to Wiarton. The Commissioners called him up pretty sharply on a couple of statements he made. "When was your last conviction?" asked Chairman Flavelle. "In 1913," replied the witness. "You know better than that," replied the Chairman. "I heard in Owen Sound that you had been up in September for selling to minors." "He is a good forgetter," suggested Vice-Chairman Dingman. The witness said he kept the law as well as he could, as well as the other hotel-keepers. "There is no use your telling us that," stated Commissioner Ayearst, "for we know differently." Altogether Mr. Gladstone's chance of getting his license renewed, registered about "zero." Mr. Allen of Toronto, representing the Hotelkeepers' Association, said the business men of Wiarton, had made a pretty good case, and it might be a good arrangement to allow Gladstone to sell out. Chairman Flavelle replied that the Commission would visit Wiarton later in the day.

Barrister Alex. McNab appeared to ask for a license for the Station Hotel, which he stated would be a great convenience for farmers, shippers of cattle, and the public who frequented the G. T. R. station, which was not open at all hours. He presented a petition signed by a number of the ratepayers of the vicinity of the station, praying the Commissioners to grant a license.

David Robertson appeared on behalf of Mrs. John Klempp, proprietress of the Royal Hotel, asking that this hostelry, which had been cut off last year, be again granted a license. He stated that at the time the Royal had lost its license, the temperance people had another hotel in mind when they asked that the number of licenses be reduced by one. That other hotel was not properly conducted at the time, but had since changed hands. The Royal property was the estate left the present proprietress by her late husband, and she depended upon it for a living.

Chairman Flavelle's Address

Chairman Flavelle addressed a few remarks specially to the hotelmen and license inspectors. The tendency this year would be to restrict the number of licenses, and very strong reasons indeed would have to be advanced before the Board would consider granting any new licenses. The Commission was determined that all law-breakers should be driven out of business, and the good hotels protected, so long as the present license system lasts. Clause 70 of the Act, dealing with the sale of liquor to drunken men had been a dead letter in the past, but from now on it was going to be a very live letter. The license inspectors would be asked for monthly reports of their visits to the bars, telling who they found in the bars each time, and in the case of a few bad records the license would be suspended or cancelled. "Remember, gentlemen," said the chairman, "you will not come before any magistrate and technicalities won't count, for we are a law unto ourselves in this matter." The Commission intended to see that hotel-keepers stopped selling liquor to men who had "enough." The good hotel-keeper who gave good dining-room service, and good accommodation and who obeyed the law, would be protected so long as the license system lasted. The Commission might not catch the law-breakers the first week but they would get him. When a spotter landed in on a hotel-keeper and trapped him, he was not punished really for that offense, but for previous offenses. A spotter was never sent until specific bad reports of a hotel were received.

The Board adjourned.

Strong Red Cross Appeal

At Knox Church Sunday night, Rev Thos. Wilson dealt with the work of the Red Cross, and brought home the needs of the situation in such a way, that it should stimulate interest and support of this worthy work in Walkerton. The text was, "Be ye not weary in well-doing, for in due time we shall reap, if ye faint not." He spoke of the tendency of the public to tire after the first few appeals, and pointed out the urgent necessity of responding cheerfully and persistently until victory shall come.

Soldiers to be Billeted Here

At a meeting of the Militia Council held at Ottawa on Saturday, plans for recruiting, training and quartering of soldiers during the coming winter were discussed. The plan suggested by the Minister of Militia some days ago of making practically every locality in Canada a recruiting headquarters, with the men raised locally to be locally quartered and trained during the coming winter was endorsed at the conference, and arrangements were made for carrying it into effect. Any local centre which recruits 25 men or more for Overseas Service will be entitled to have these men billeted there for the winter and trained under the officers in charge of the local units thus raised. As over 80 recruits have enlisted at Walkerton since Sept. 4th, this town will no doubt have its quota of men billeted here for the winter.

TO RAISE $3,000 TO-DAY

Walkerton Citizens Will Endeavor To Touch That Mark For The Red Cross Today.

The Red Cross Campaign which is to be waged in every city, town and village in the British Empire on Trafalgar Day (today) was organized for Walkerton at a public meeting held at the Town Hall on Thursday evening last. Mayor F. W. Lippert occupied the chair. The attendance was not large but it was representative, and what should prove a thoroughly live organization was launched. The meeting decided to aim at raising the sum of $3,000 at least by today's canvass. The town was divided into eleven districts, and each district will be canvassed by three citizens with an auto. Every citizen will be expected to make some contribution, large or small, according to his means, and citizens who may be out of town that day may leave their contribution beforehand with the treasurer, Mr. Taylor. There will be but one collection, and all must be done in the one day. The committee has issued a circular explaining the grounds for the appeal. They urge all, in humanity's name, to give as liberally as they can to the fund, and they expect a whole-hearted and generous response.

The following canvassing committee was appointed Thursday night, and this committee has added very largely to its numbers:—Mayor F. Lippert (chairman), Rev. R. Perdue (Sec.), Messrs. Cryderman, McNab, Johnston, McConnell, sr., Rogers, Ramsey, B. Smith, Warren, Player, Hunter. The following auto owners have volunteered to assist in the canvass:—Messrs. McKay, Robertson, Vogt, N. C. McKay, George, Patterson, Whitehead, Truax, Arscott, Schumacher, McCrum and others. One point the Committee wished emphasized specially, that citizens leave their contributions at their home ready for the collector when they call.

Red Cross Catechism

Question I. What is the Red Cross Society?

Answer: It is an International Society which helps the Medical Departments of each Army and Navy to look after the sick and wounded and prisoners of war.

Question II How does the Red Cross Society help the sick and wounded men?

Answer: By providing the Army Medical Department with additional hospital stores of all kinds, from ambulance to drugs and bandages: by sending out extra nurses, orderlies and volunteer assistants: by equipping, wholly or in part, hospitals, hospital ships and trains.

Question III Why does not the Government do all this work?

Answer: Because, in common with all other civilized nations, the Empire recognizes the value of voluntary effort for the care of the wounded as permitted by the International Convention of Geneva, 1864.

Red Cross work thus relieves the taxes, and allows people to give instead of only paying: and provides a properly organized channel for personal service to the suffering men.

Question IV Why should I give my money to the Red Cross Society?

Answer: Because, if I stay at home, I can help the men who fight, through this Society, when they need help most.

Question V What will happen if everybody in Canada subscribes generously to the Red Cross?

Answer: Unnecessary suffering will be saved by a sufficient supply of all hospital stores and drugs: men will be returned to the ranks instead of being invalided and others who might never have seen home again will be returned to the arms of their families.

Auction Sale.

On Saturday morning at 10.30 o'clock, the household effects of Mr. John Pleskey, including player piano all nearly new, will be offered for sale by public auction by Auctioneer Brocklebank at Mr. Pleskey's residence, two blocks east of the Catholic church.

Thursday Morning's Fire

A barn on the premises of Joseph Yaeck, opposite the House of Refuge, was completely destroyed by fire about one o'clock last Thursday morning. The fire was first noticed by the next door neighbor, Mrs. Reiber, but it had gained such headway that it was too late for the fire brigade to accomplish anything. The building had been occupied by George Yaeck as a broom factory and had considerable stock in it, as well as tools. The loss in the stock of $300 was pretty well covered by insurance. The loss on the building was about the same amount with $100 insurance. The origin of the fire is unknown.

Town Church Ventilation

A Chicago paper remarked recently: "More people are sent to heaven through lack of ventilation than by sermons." The man who made that sensational statement, was right about the ventilation, although he may not have been in a position to speak authoratively as to the effect of the sermons or the ultimate destination of the poisoned-air victims. We believe the fault lies not with the preacher. He usually has a message worth while, if the congregation is sufficiently wide awake to grasp it. Preachers are blamed unjustly for putting their auditors to sleep. Next time you feel sleepy in church of a Sunday morning just look around and see if the building is not hermetically sealed, every window tight. We used to mingle more fresh air with our notes of praise.

Ladies' Fine Campaign

At the last regular meeting of the Walkerton Branch of the South Bruce Women's Institute, the ladies were able to announce that enough money had been collected to pay for the Field Kitchen with equipment which they had presented to the 71st Battalion. A resolution was passed thanking everyone who had contributed to this fund, thus helping to make the gift possible. The collectors made special mention of the kindness and hospitality they received as they went from home to home. There are still some districts where the collectors have not been and the ladies are in hopes by the time the ground has all been gone over the $1000.00 they aimed to raise will be realized. The remaining $500.00 is to be used to provide comforts at the front and for Red Cross work.

Jocelin's Penance

This was signed with a curious black mark as if a sooty thumb had been pressed upon the page.

"'Tis from Dame Berenice!" Rohese joyfully exclaimed. "Saved, saved, poor Jocelin from his dreary prison, and I (ah, thank the holy saints) from almost as ill an one," and she shuddered as she thought of the cruel look the Prioress had given her. Amid her rejoicing, Rohese did not think of the perils and difficulties of her undertaking, but straightway supped heartily, and almost gaily prepared for her dark and dangerous journey. Night had fallen, and she was allowed no lights, but she easily sought and selected the few jewels and treasures she desired, and though there were some hours to wait, she donned a dark hooded mantle, and sat with what patience she could muster until after the nocturnal bell had rung, and she heard the monks, attendant on the Abbot's household, go pattering down the stone passage to the chapel, and then back again to their cells.

When all seemed securely quiet, Rohese unlocked the door and slipped cautiously into the long corridor, the door of which the witch's key also opened. It moved easily, as if on greased hinges, and though a watch was set nightly all through Brakefield house, strange to say, the place seemed deserted as some ancient ruin. Quickly she passed to the great hall door. Here she paused, feeling doubtfully of the key. Surely it was far too small for that great lock! But on trying it she found (as the witch had written) it opened all doors;—for the heavy lock turned with a gentle click, and Rohese found herself speeding across the icy courtyard. The gatekeeper snored peacefully before the glowing brazier in his little lodge; the heavy bars of the gate swung back without a sound, and when she had turned and pushed it shut again, Rohese was outside the Abbey walls. Along the lonely way she ran, the far-off stars blinking coldly on her through the mist; the night wind touching her cheek with chill fingers, and the hazel coppice through which she passed casting weird shadows on her path, seeming to stretch gaunt hands to stay her. Rohese felt as if she were shut alone in some great black chamber, where gibbering, hideous phantoms crowded near. On, on she sped, terror lending swiftness to her feet. An owl shrieked from the wood like a tortured thing, and the cold sweat rose on her brow. Half way to the tower she stopped. Her breath came in gasps, and shivering with fright and cold, she leaned against the Abbey wall. All was darkness and silence, save for the occasional rustle of some branch stirred by the wind. Over her head a great hawk flew heavily and slowly, sounding his warning cry as he flew, and Rohese, knowing that up there in the wide night sky a soul was passing out somewhere into the void, crossed herself and murmured a prayer.

Just then a dark figure seemed to spring up from the ground at her side, and the shriek of terror which rose to her lips was silenced by a hand clapped roughly over her mouth.

"Milk-liver, wouldst draw the whole monkly pack howling at our heels?" and the eerie face of the witch of Ely peered closely into her own. "Old Gooseberry hath stood us well to-night, though, odds-bodkins, why should I so torment my aching bones for two young flibberjibbits? Well, hist thee now! I've done all I can or will. What yet remains to do thy young heart must dare, for by Grimalkin's eyes, though I'll sport on murky nights about the graves and pluck the shrieking man-drake in the dark, I'd venture not where thou must walk to-night. The way itself is dread and then, mayhap the tortured dead lurk there, who gnawed the living flesh from off their bones whilst starving in the Oubliette. None save I know it, so if thou 'scapest the gulf and ghosts, thou'lt find thee safe at last where thy monkly lover languisheth."

Rohese answered her in a firm voice, "Show me but the way, dame, and though I cross over dead men's bones, I'll follow it, for I fear not." And all the courage of her race was up in arms to quell her womanly fears.

"Well spoken! Thou hast thy grandsire's spirit, maid. I like thee well, my little wench, and dare say thou'lt find a way to draw the monk forth. Look ye now," and digging away the turf from near a boulder, the witch lifted an iron ring with her staff, and disclosed a narrow opening in the ground.

"Wind this rope about thy waist, put this flask within thy bosom, for it will aid the monk's escape. Pass down these steps; then pause, count thy paces carefully as thou leavest them, for if thou takest one-half step too much, there'll be no maiden heir to De Cokefeld. Count fifteen steps, then pause; press thyself close against the right hand wall ere thou takest one more, and moving slowly, pass through the darkness with great care. Best say thy prayers, for if thou movest to the left one-quarter inch thou'lt fall into a gulf none e'er hath fathomed. When thou hast at last turned corner thou'rt safe, if no dread phantom rises on thy path. Move swiftly onward until a wall obstructs thee. Lift up thy arm its full length; run thy hand along its ledge, where thou'lt find a bar; slide it back, and thou canst pass into the cell where thy monk lies in the Oubliette. Once thou hast got him out, and left the secret way, close and cover it securely, then haste thee straight to De Cokefeld; provide thyself with a chosen few and then [illegible] to thy sea-girt tower in Norfolk. There set sail for Normandy, where thy father's cousin, Edmund, dwelleth in his strong fortress at [illegible]lon. If thou wishest not the young monk's company, send him to me at Ely, where for his mother's sake, who one time served me, I'll aid him. Haste thee now. Farewell. Be brave, for all depends on thee. [illegible]"

And the witch disappeared as suddenly as she had come. Left alone, Rohese did not pause, but with wild beating heart entered the opening and descended the damp, broken steps. On the last she paused, then stepped down, and counting her paces carefully reached the wall. Pressing herself close to it, she found herself on an inclined path very narrow and slippery, [illegible] through the darkness. [illegible] the [illegible] and [illegible] to the fact that she had [illegible] the dangerous [illegible] from the bar in the wall, and with difficulty moving its rusty length backward, a portion of the wall slid gratingly aside, and Rohese passed into a cell dimly lit by the wan light of the early dawn coming through a grated window set high up in the wall. She was in the cell of the Oubliette, and going to the centre of the room, where a low stone curbing ran round a black well in the floor, she leaned over and called, "Jocelin, O Jocelin! Jocelin, 'tis Rohese calls thee!" Far down beneath her a thin, faint voice cried out in surprise and joy one single word—"Rohese!" and she knew the poor monk still lived in the depths of the Oubliette.

CHAPTER XX.

Rohese looked about her for an object to which to fasten her rope. The cell was entirely bare, save for a heap of faggots in one corner. The window was too high and far from the pit to admit of using its bars. Time was fleeting; should her escape and the attempted rescue be discovered, her punishment would be sure, and she had no doubt Jocelin's life would pay the forfeit. Rohese did not think of him now as a monk, a man, or a lover, but as a creature who, for her sake, had been condemned and left to perish by slow degrees in the Oubliette. She must not waste precious time in accomplishing her purpose, she told herself feverishly, as she felt that strength and courage which had buoyed her up through her journey faltering. So, womanlike, in her darkest hour of doubt, she leaned over the oubliette to encourage the man whose life and liberty depended upon her strength and determination.

"Jocelin," she cried, "I have come to save thee." The monk answered her but faintly, worn with torture of mind and soul, emaciated by confinement and semi-starvation (for very meagre were the portions let down to him by his jailers); his dry tongue could scarcely articulate, and his dull brain scarcely conceive the [illegible] that there was still hope for him, a forlorn hope, 'tis true, but when woman wars with unfavorable circumstances, there seems to come upon her an added sense, an instinctive perception of the thing needful. Rohese fastened her rope to the witch's wicker-covered flask, and lowering, said, "See, here is wine—drink and gain strength and courage, my poor friend."

Jocelin obeyed; Rohese heard the distant "gug-gug" of the rare Chianti as the parched mouth drank and drank, as though it would never get its fill. It was but a few seconds when Jocelin spoke, in a tone very unlike his first hoarse whisper. The wine had stimulated him and he was himself again.

"God's benison on thee," he cried. "Take my grateful thanks for coming thus, like an angel to solace the last hours of so tortured, lost and damned a creature. I know not how thou found'st the way, sweet, but I see in this a token of forgiveness, or my body would have rotted, and my soul beat itself free from its [illegible] mercy and forgiveness.

"I thank thee, Rohese. [illegible] Fare thee well! Depart now from this dreary cell, the stones are cold unto thy tender feet [illegible] found here, [illegible] Fare thee well, [illegible] I can die [illegible] thou hast [illegible] and contrite heart, and bruised, weary flesh can gain supreme forgiveness, surely my poor soul may yet attain some lowest seat in Heaven. [illegible] after years of waiting, it shall bloom [illegible] golden glory of the [illegible] Rohese, farewell!"

The voice faltered, then died away. Rohese's eyes were filled with tears, yet she dared not give way to the emotion which swayed her.

"Nay, Jocelin, [illegible] farewell, for I have with me [illegible] thy liberty. Arise—prove thyself a man, though weak and weary, shake off this lethargy. Our Lady has answered my prayers; I was shown a secret way hither, and now in but one little moment [illegible] this rope—stout fastened [illegible] to some nearby thing, an' by my troth, I'll straightway draw thee forth."

"Nay, lady, thy strength of body commensurateth not with thy heart. Stand back. I would but pull thee into this dread place, destroying that which I hold dear above sweet heaven itself."

Rohese was at her wit's end; well she knew that, unaided, she could not lift the weight of Jocelin's body, and if she did not find some way to raise him, and that speedily, from the dungeon, his stimulated strength would fail, and she would have to leave him to his fate. But how? Lifting the rope? She searched the cell in vain. Then, as she gazed with a despairing prayer upward, her eyes pierced the gloom, and she saw outlined from the intersected groins over the Oubliette, a great hook, used, no doubt, in former times by those who desired into the pit to see if their victims still suffered. But how could she reach it? And if the rope were let from thence, how could the monk, weak and with cramped muscles, ever hope to climb it? Then an exclamation broke from her, for woman's wit had solved the problem. Quickly [illegible] the faggots and began tying them, at short distances apart, along the rope. When they were all distributed thus, and she had tested each knot, she ran to the window, rope in hand, and after much scrambling up the rough stony wall [illegible]

"Now, [illegible] Jocelin take courage," and [illegible] down this strangely improvised ladder.

[illegible] "Depart, [illegible] I know not [illegible]

[illegible] hard and [illegible] to do" [illegible] growing brightness outside showed.

"Jocelin," she cried, "Jocelin, wilt break my heart and desolate my life! Come to me! I am frightened in the dark and cold," and what with excitement and despair, she began to sob, crying, "Ah, thou lovest me not, and care not if I die."

Jocelin sprang to his feet, for at that cry all the manhood in him rose, [illegible] whom he loved called him to her side. Pain racked him, and weakness oppressed him, but he called to her strongly—"Weep not, Rohese, for I come. Steady then the rope," and Rohese, her tears still flowing, threw all her young strength upon the rope and held it. Well for Jocelin of Brakelond, that no convent-bred maid stood there in that supreme hour. Her muscles, trained and strengthened by her hardy life at De Cokefeld, stood Rohese in good stead, and steadily she held the rope while Jocelin, slowly, painfully, with hoarse labored breath, drew himself up faggot after faggot. He was half way up when Rohese's trained ear caught the beat of sandaled feet upon the stones far below. She knew they were coming to see if all was well with the prisoner. If Jocelin became conscious of this impending danger the shock might cause him to loosen his hold.

"Hurry thee, hurry thee, Jocelin," she urged; and to herself she uttered—"Time, O God! Give us but time to reach the passage." Dame Berenice had said that none knew of the secret passage from the tower, and Rohese felt that they would be safe if once behind the turning stone.

"I come, beloved, I come," said Jocelin; but Rohese could tell by his voice that he grew weaker. The fact that he was in the Oubliette kept him from hearing the approach. "Time, O time!" Rohese pleaded with heaven, and "Haste thee, Jocelin, oh, for Christ's sake, haste thee."

Now they were at the prison door; now they had paused, and she could hear the faint sound of their voices; then the jingle of keys. Her arms ached; her head reeled. It seemed as if she must loosen her hold on the rope and fall fainting into the pit. Jocelin had paused for breath.

"I can come but slowly, Rohese," he panted. "I grow fainter as I climb." It seemed to Rohese as if she had stood there for hours. "Haste," she cried mechanically, straining her ears to catch every sound. The [illegible] the tower door opened [illegible]. "Ah, thank God, it seemed [illegible]." They could not open it, and tried other keys.

"Up now, Jocelin of Brakelond, for Mary's sweet sake! For my love, sweetheart me! Up, man, up!" Jocelin clambered on, [illegible] was nearing the top. [illegible] could hear another key [illegible] the rusty lock. Two, three more [illegible] far apart they were [illegible] and climber. Now Rohese heard the door creak on its rusty hinges, [illegible] they were on the stairs.

"Merciful saints, [illegible] time. Haste, O haste, my friend [illegible] to Fate, O anxious ones! It is the [illegible] feet of old Tristian [illegible] of Hennan, [illegible] Lucky chance [illegible] pause for breath on the landing, [illegible] Richard's [illegible] "Come." Two, one faggot more. The footsteps sounded in the little entry outside.

"Give me strength, Ah, Heaven!" cried Rohese, and as Jocelin reached wearily for the last faggot, she leaned forward, and bracing herself well against the curb, she lifted him bodily out of it, just as the monks paused at the door. As the lock turned with a rusty clang, she dragged the half-unconscious man across the floor, and pressing hard against the turning stone, dropped it behind her, and stood in the dark, black passage with Jocelin at her feet. Then as she drew breath, she heard the cell door open, and the loud exclamations of the entering monks.

CHAPTER XXI.

It was some moments ere Jocelin could stand, and by this time the monks within the cell, having satisfied themselves that the Oubliette was empty, had departed to bear the news to the Abbot; Richard exclaiming, "The devil has spirited away his own," and Tristian following him, mumbling thankfully, "It is the holy saints who have rescued him." Wonderful to relate, the Abbot received this startling intelligence with equanimity. "Ye have done well to inform me so readily, my sons," he calmly replied, and they departed wondering, to rehearse the tale in the chapter room. In his heart, Samson was glad of Jocelin's escape, ascribing it to some sympathizer among the brethren, who, gaining access to the prison keys, had spirited the condemned monk away. Despite his anger at the sin, the Abbot [illegible] the sinner, and since Rohese's disappearance [illegible] the monk's indiscretion. "Truly I rejoice," he said to himself, as he went forth to join the Abbey Advocate, whom he had assembled to discuss his plan of confining his wantonly inclined ward in the nearby priory, that she might be under the corrective influence of the Prioress Rosamund.

"Yea, 'twas ever thus," he muttered angrily, tugging at his beard, "Since the days of Eden 'The woman tempted me, and I ate.' By my silver cross, when I was deceived by the fair young wanton, until she spoke out brazenly before them all, without a falter, when even my rough old cheek burned with the shame of it. [illegible] By the saints! Hereafter no woman shall make his abbey, be she hag and ugly as sin, or young and fair as [illegible]."

While the Abbot went toward the audience hall, and Tristian and Richard spread the wonderful news, Jocelin and Rohese had come [illegible] narrow path [illegible] into the light; pausing [illegible] the morning light [illegible]. Then, they hurriedly closed the entrance, concealing it as best they might, and [illegible], and as soon [illegible] into the heart of the wood toward De Cokefeld.

TWO KINDS OF TYPHOID

Both Are Dangerous Although the Effect is Different.

People differ in the way they have diseases as much as in the way they do things. For instance, some people [illegible] typhoid fever and go to bed with it. Others have typhoid fever and walk around with it. We say they have walking typhoid.

The strange part about it is that the typhoid bacillus in these two classes of individuals suffering with the disease, may be the same in virulence, just as poisonous, just as active in growth, just as prompt in getting into the blood. But the effect is different.

Perhaps it may be a surprise to some people to know that it is just as dangerous to have a case of walking typhoid around the milk house as it would be if the patient were seriously ill.

Possibly some people will wonder how they are to tell when a person really has typhoid if he can walk around and still have a serious case. That's where the skill of diagnosing comes in. Most cities have laboratories now where tests can be made free of charge.

These include the blood tests, and especially the Widal test and the bacteriological blood examination. The [illegible] a drop of dried blood in a clean piece of glass.

Spanking does not cure children of bed-wetting. There is a constitutional cause for this trouble. Mrs. M. Grocers as Fighting Men.

In olden times in England the grocers' trade palyed a useful part in national defence. The Grocers' company was commanded in 1557 to furnish sixty men for "the resistance of such iniquitous attempts as may be made by foreign enemies." Further demands of the same kind were satisfied in successive years, and in 15[illegible] the company supplied [illegible] men to resist the Spanish Armada. Authority was granted to press men into the sea service, and apprentices and journeymen were called upon to leave the counter for the battlefield. Sir John Philpot, an early master of the Grocers' company, cleared the Northsea of a horde of Scottish pirates by means of a fleet equipped entirely at his own cost.—London Chronicle.

Thirteen-Hour Fight With Salmon

Mr. A. Gladwin-Errington landed a 42-pound salmon from the River Awe, Argyllshire, with a light rod after playing it for over thirteen hours—from 11.45 a.m. on one day to 12.50 the next morning.

For a great part of the fight, says Mr. Gladwin-Errington, the fish sulked and remained stationary. "A boat was brought down from Loch Awe [illegible] at 10 p.m., which caused him to move at last. Finally, by aid of a strong electric motor-car lamp, he was induced to come near the bank and was gaffed in 2 feet of water by my gillie."

The Manufacture of Plate Glass.

The casting table of a plate glass factory is about twenty feet long, fifteen feet wide and six inches thick. Strips of iron on each side afford a bearing for the rollers and determine the thickness of the plate to be cast. The molten glass is poured on the table, and the roller, passing from end to end, spreads the glass to a uniform thickness. The glass after cooling rapidly is transferred to the annealing oven, where it remains several days. When taken out it is very rough and uneven and in that state is used for skylights and other purposes where strength is desired rather than transparency. The greater part of the glass, however, is ground, smoothed and polished.

Magazines On Warships.

If there is one danger that sailors dread more than any other it is an explosion in a powder magazine. To prevent such an occurrence a device for flooding that compartment in the least possible time is fitted in most big battleships. A pipe below the surface connects the magazine with the sea. This pipe is closed by two taps, which are connected with the deck. In case of danger it is only the work of a minute to open the taps, let the sea rush in through the pipes and flood the magazine. The water is afterward drained off by means of a gutter.—London Mail.

BANANAS.

Not Only Good to the Taste, But Notably Nutritious.

Every day of the year and three times a day comes the demand of the family to the housewife for food. How to satisfy the demand is the ever-present problem. Food values are better understood to-day than ever, and we learn with new interest of the food values of the familiar foods. Many of them, readily obtained, are cheap and plentiful. In this class we find the banana. On the authority of the U. S. Government chart prepared by C. F. Langworthy it may be said that the banana contains, besides other constituents, protein 1.3, carbohydrates 22—two nutrient necessities for the building of the body.

This knowledge makes us all the more willing to use the banana; we know we combine nutrition with pleasure.

The banana is so popular, so readily carried that the picnic basket does not seem complete without it.

In eating a banana tear off the outer skin and with a blunt knife gently scrape the outside.

This removes a pithy covering that some people find hard to digest.

A dainty way to eat a banana. Take one portion of the outside skin and fold around the banana. This will save the fingers from becoming sticky.

How to Cook Roman Meal Porridge.

Invariably use double boiler, or set boiler in basin of boiling water. Have water boiling in both vessels, that in inner one salted to taste. Slowly stir in one cup Roman Meal to each two cups water. Cover, set in outer vessel, and never stir again, even while serving. For early breakfast cook at evening meal and warm in morning, using a little less Roman Meal. It's a dark nut-brown, granular, rich porridge. It nourishes better than meat, prevents indigestion and positively relieves constipation or "money back." Ask your doctor. All grocers, 10 cents and 25 cents.

Prolific Fungi.

An average sized mushroom will produce as many as 1,800,000,000 spores, and a common toadstool shaggy cap has been shown to produce as many as 5,000,000,000. Fortunately for the other inhabitants of the world, however, the probability of successful growth of any given spore is somewhat remote.

The mushroom or toadstool plant is formed by fine filamentous threads which ramify beneath the soil, and if we assume that a successful plant of the mushroom or shaggy cap produces as many as ten mushrooms or toadstools we find that the chance against successful growth to maturity is respectively about 18,000,000,000 and 50,000,000,000 to one in the two species mentioned. Even more prolific than the mushrooms and toadstools proper is the giant puff-ball, a large specimen of which has been known to produce as many as 7,000,000,000,000 spores.—London [illegible].

AMATEUR PHOTOGRAPHY

A photographic competition recently organized by the C. P. R. is highly commended by the Canadian film and camera industries. Photographic dealers say that they have not been so busy for a long time, and bless the thought of the C. P. R. Hundreds of amateur photographers will from this on be enlisted in the cause, which is that of obtaining pictures along the line of the whole system showing snapped incidentally and advantageously, and which are of much more telling than the formal ones. The C. P. R. has its own photographers of course, with Mr. Bennett in charge, but these competitive pictures will, it is anticipated, produce unstudied scenes at the summer resorts, on the lakes amid the hills and valleys [illegible] endowed with the brightness of holiday life. Those where the awards are made, will be used in the folder literature of the company, which desires bright and unstudied glimpses of the human side of things throughout the country in the [illegible] summer days, when so many of our people are in the country.

NAMES OF OUR EARTH.

It Was Called Ge by the Greeks and Terra by the Latins.

Answering the question, "Who named our planet the earth? Why could it not have had a romantic and beautiful name such as astronomers have given to the planets Jupiter, Venus, Mars or Neptune? Our planet alone has the utilitarian, but not graceful name the earth," Edgar Lucien Larkin in the New York American says:

The good Anglo-Saxon folk gave the name earthe to this our world, and the British dwindled the word down to earth. But is this not quite as romantic as the name they given to it by the Greeks, and Terra by the Latins? Ge is indeed commonplace, but Terra is highly romantic.

Classic mythology tells that Terra was one of the most ancient deities and wife of Uranus and mother of Oceanus the Titans, Cyclops, Giants, Thea, Rhea, Themis, Phoebe, Tethys and Mnemosyne. And she is the same deity as Tellus. But Tellus was the most ancient goddess after Chaos. In later mythic ages she was called by the exceedingly romantic names Cybele, Rhea, Vesta, Ceres, Tithea, Bona Dea, Proserpine and others. And when sailing under the euphonious titles she passed through many very romantic episodes. At times she got into romantic difficulties when circulating around with other goddesses and gods.

Force of Drops of Water.

It seems almost incredible that so small a thing as a drop of rain should injure the propeller of an aeroplane, but such is the case. At so great a speed does the propeller revolve—1,200 revolutions a minute as a matter of fact—that a rain drop hits it with such tremendous force as to chip a piece of the wood away. Some idea of the hardships entailed by flying through the rain at sixty miles an hour may be gathered from the fact that an aviator who recently went through such an experience, alighted with the edge of his propeller fretted as though it had been gnawed by rats. The rain drops had chipped pieces out of the blades and also bruised the aviator's face, owing to the force with which they hit against his flesh.—London Spectator.

CHAIRS.

How They Have Been Evolved Through the Ages.

It seems odd to contemplate that, with the multitude of chairs to be found in every home these days, once upon a time there were no chairs as we know them in any home. In those days benches answered the purpose now served by chairs, and when a family drew up to the table for its meals in the middle ages they sat on long benches, which had no support for the backs, instead of chairs.

From long ago there were heavy thrones on which the rulers sat, but these throne chairs were so heavy that they could not be easily moved. Later the benches were given a back, and still later the chairs as we know them to-day were evolved.

It was not until 1600, in the time of Charles I., that the average Englishman knew of chairs or had them in his house, according to those who have made a study of furniture. The first English chairs were imported from France, and the native cabinetmakers and carpenters made chairs in imitation of these.

In those days the fashion in chairs changed with the fashion of clothes. When full skirts were the style the chairs became wider, so that milady and her skirts could be accommodated on one chair. The difference in the [illegible] of chairs that we have to-day, [illegible] in imitation of old styles, comes [illegible] difference in clothes.—London Standard.

An Appeal on Behalf of the National Canadian Patriotic Fund.

We have now entered upon the second year of the war, and the end seems as far off as ever. No one imagined a year ago that by September of 1915, Canada would have sent across the Atlantic nearly one hundred thousand men, with as many more to follow if necessary. This magnificent enlistment, while primarily due to the loyalty of our people, has been, in a large measure, made possible by the Canadian Patriotic Fund.

This greatest of all the national institutions is now assisting twenty thousand families of men who have enlisted for overseas service. These men have gone forward with the full assurance that the people of Canada will see to it that during their absence, their wives, widowed mothers and little children shall be maintained in comfort. We hear that the drain upon the fund is assuming large proportions, that to meet the needs of July and August $700,000 was expended, and that the receipts are being materially decreased, and that the National Executive Committee now finds it necessary to make a [illegible] appeal to the Canadian public.

There are many funds, most of them worthy, but of them all the Patriotic Fund is the one we cannot allow to fail. It is the duty of the Government to arm, equip and maintain the troops. Not a dollar do the Federal authorities give to the Patriotic Fund. This work depends solely on the patriotism and generosity of our own people. Thousands of brave men are fighting our battles, believing that we meant what we said when we told them as they went forward: "Go, and we will care for the wife and kiddies." It would be to our everlasting disgrace if our pledge were broken.

The national organization, with headquarters at Ottawa and branches or affiliated associations in every part of the Dominion, is worthy of our most generous support in the tremendous and ever-growing task that it has undertaken.

INVASION OF CANADA.

Mr. Will H. Storer, a wealthy citizen of New York, who for many years has spent his summer holidays in New Brunswick, and who is said to be a most reputable man by the St. John, N. B. Telegraph, has given an interview in which he expresses the decided opinion that Canada is in danger of an invasion from German and Austrian reservists in the United States. He says that the number of these is probably over a million, that there are eight million Germans and five million Austrians in that country. Many of these are actually engaged in a propaganda on behalf of their own countries, that they are bitter and desperate, and the reservists well drilled and ready for anything. Mr. Storer says "I believe that Canada is in great danger of invasion at any moment by hundreds of thousands of the many millions of Germans and Austrians at present in the United States. Should the United States declare war upon Germany, Canada, and every province of it, would be as certain of invasion as that night follows day. Whether or not the United States and Germany go to war, I have no doubt that the question of invading Canada by armies of trained soldiers of Germany and Austria [illegible] in the United States is uppermost in the minds of the United States enemies of the Allies." Mr. Storer further says that "There is a tremendous [illegible] propaganda going on all over the United States, and if photographs of what German activity could be seen in the picture houses of Canada and other parts of the Empire there would be such a rush to the standard of England and her allies that the question of the war's duration would be settled in a short time. What would the people here in New Brunswick think if they were told that the German reservists in the United States had information, with photographs of fortifications, [illegible] and passenger bridges [illegible] province in the whole Dominion? What would they think if they were told that they had exact information as to whether New Brunswick could be more successfully invaded from the United States through the [illegible] counties of [illegible] Charlotte, [illegible] of the city or county of St. John? What would Nova Scotians think if they were told that the [illegible] of England's enemies had all information as to how most successfully [illegible] gain an entrance to Halifax and other chief towns and cities of that province? What would Quebec, Ontario, Manitoba and the provinces farther west think if they were told that the unfriendly Germans had exact information of every [illegible] mile of the boundary between the United States and Canada, with no protective forts almost from the Atlantic to the Pacific? Whether Germany and the United States go to war or not, would not Canada be armed to [illegible] [illegible]? It appears to me that some home defence [illegible] to a [illegible] extent."

Mr. Storer [illegible] explosions [illegible] by the States, the fomenting of strikes, the placing of infernal machines on board vessels, and [illegible] and declares that "should Germany and the United States [illegible] the invasion of Canada by German and Austrian reservists by the hundreds of thousands may be considered as certain. That will bring the war [illegible] home to you Canadians, and [illegible] people will [illegible] the [illegible] Canadians should [illegible] England's side [illegible] [illegible] rather than in [illegible] and [illegible] as [illegible] for the past [illegible] months.

Lord Kitchener's plan of raising troops by military ballot is similar to that in force during the American civil war. Had A Lame Back

FOR A LONG TIME.

Sometimes Could Hardly Turn In Bed.

When the back gets so bad and aches like a "toothache" you may rest assured that the kidneys are affected in some way.

On the first sign of a backache, Doan's Kidney Pills should be taken, and if this is done immediately you will save yourself many years of suffering from serious kidney trouble.

Mr. J. W. [illegible], Truro, N.S., writes: "I have had a lame back for a long time. Sometimes I could hardly turn over in bed, but after taking [illegible] of Doan's Kidney Pills I [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible]"

[illegible] Kidney Pills are 50c. per box, 3 boxes for $1.25, at all dealers or mailed direct on receipt of price by The T. Milburn Co., Limited, Toronto, Ont.

When ordering direct specify "Doan's."

Wooed By a Pauper

"Ay, Lucy, your once loved Lucy. Richard, look at me, and think what I was once till I loved you. Richard, I have sought you for years. I am starving, dying. Do not frown so cruelly; I did not say you knew it; I know my letter never reached you, that the servants would not deliver it. I knew that you thought me dead, or you would never have neglected your poor Lucy? Oh, no, Richard, you could not, you were too kind-hearted for that. Richard, look!"

And with a faint effort she caught the child up—a fine, beautiful little fellow—and held it before him.

"See, Richard," she continued; "he is your own! Take him and love him; I want nothing; I am too weak, too ill, too poor to take care of him. Do not think of me, but save him! Richard, I plead not for myself, but for my child!"

Sir Richard turned his head aside, pushed the child away, and, in a harsh, hoarse voice, said:

"There must be some mistake. I do not know you, my good woman. Take the child away—stay, there is a trifle."

And with a cold, faltering, cruel hand, he dropped a sovereign to the pavement.

"Richard!" cried the woman, with horror-stricken agony. "Do you not know me? It is Lucy, whom you loved—whom you wronged."

At these last two words her voice rang tragical, intense.

They touched the man for they frightened him.

Should some friend pass and find him, Sir Richard Wildfang, being quietly harangued by this this woman, what scandals would go forth! He turned, resolute and angry.

"No, my good woman; I do not know you; there is some mistake, I say. Leave go my arm. Quick!"

Then, as he heard a carriage entering the square, he flung her off, and hurried, like the fiend and the coward that he was, away.

The woman fell. She was too weak to walk or bear such violence. The child was thrown from her arms into the frosty road, and lay there for a moment, crying piteously.

With a groan the mother rose, and with pain, took the child in her arms again, and staggered weakly across the road.

The distance was short, but it was almost too far.

Her slight, fair hands clutched the iron railings and she sank upon the pavement.

The child, moaning from [illegible] to her scanty dress and called upon her name.

Wearied at last by her silence, the poor little fellow sank down beside her and nestled, shivering, against her bosom.

Half an hour passed. Carriages rattled through the square, people tramped along the frosty pavement, but the spot where the mother and child were lying so quiet was dark, and no one saw or noticed them.

Presently there came around the corner, from Oxford street a queer, ill-shapen little man, a deformed, diminutive little creature—a hunchback.

As he came round the corner at a sharp trot, his long arms swinging like a monkey's, he pressed his battered hat more firmly upon his forehead, and, striking his arms across his chest to increase their warmth, said to himself, with a gruff chuckle:

"I'll take a little quiet, I think. Ah, to think of the money as is being spent to-night in gas for all of them big shops. I never see such heaps of toys and meat an' toasting stuff. Ah! I think of the grubbery as will be going on to-morrow; the plum-puddens and the port and sherry wine! Ah, well, the more the better, says old Sam; and if he'd got chick or child, kith or kin, to jine him in a feed, he'd go in for another lively himself," and he plunged one hand into his pocket and dragged out a handful of coppers, with a piece of silver or two glittering among them.

After inspecting these with a whistle of satisfaction he trudged on again, shaking his head and muttering.

"No; I'll keep 'em. What should I do with a plum-pudden and a bunch o' colored crackers? I'll keep 'em for somebody as as a sight o' children and wants a pudden bad."

Then, with another ram of the hat, which was already quite far enough on his gnarled forehead, the little toe-shaped old fellow hurried on.

Suddenly he stumbled over something, and was precipitated with a jerk onto his head.

"Hello!" he cried, picking up his hat and rubbing its napless surface with anxiety. "Who's that lying there an' upsetting her majesty's subjects?"

A child answered him with a plaintive wail.

"Mother!"

"Whew!" whistled the old man. "A kid. Wonder which of us is killed, [illegible] or him. Here, little 'un, hold up your head. Hello!—why, mussy alive, the woman's [illegible] dead!"

He took her head [illegible] and turned it to the light. The face, [illegible] and thin, but calm and [illegible], stared up at him cold and dead.

The old man started against [illegible] a moment, then he took off his hat and wiped the perspiration from his forehead and the tear which would come from his eye.

He looked around anxiously and called for help.

For a wonder, a policeman was at hand.

With measured tread the guardian of the night crossed the road.

Hello! Tipsy?"

"No, dead!" replied the hunchback, almost indignantly.

"And a child, too," said the policeman, with [illegible] alacrity. "I must have a stretcher. Hold on there a bit, will you? The station's only around the corner; I'll fetch another man and the stretcher directly."

The dwarf motioned in acquiescence, and the policeman ran for assistance. He returned presently with another constable and the stretcher.

In silence they lifted the dead woman on to it, the child clinging to her and calling her by the only name he knew.

"Mother, mother!"

"What's to be done with the child?" asked the dwarf, huskily, as he stroked the little curly head pitifully.

"Work'us," replied the policeman, carelessly.

"No," said the dwarf, [illegible] "[illegible] little chap, it's hard lines for him. Don't cry, my little fellow. Mammy's all right; she's—she's asleep."

But the child would not be pacified, and the policemen had to drag its tiny hand away from the flimsy skirt.

"The action, though done as gently as was possible, touched the old man.

"Here," he said suddenly, "I'll take care of the little 'un. I've got no chick or child of my own, and I'd take the little 'un."

"Very well," said the policeman, "but you must come to the station and give your name and address to the inspector."

"All right," said the dwarf, picking up the child and wrapping [illegible] the bosom of his coat. "Come along, I'm Sam [illegible] old Sam [illegible] ashamed of his name. Don't cry, little 'un, anything better than the work-house. Don't cry, little 'un, [illegible] better off now than she's been for a pretty long time, and old Sam will take care o' you."

CHAPTER VII.

Christmas Day! What a host of memories, what varied emotions those words called up.

All the guests were assembled at the Vale. These were the Cunnings, the poor relations, the [illegible] gentleman whom Mrs. Newton most disliked and snubbed.

The Vale was hospitable to its connections, and they were [illegible] clustered around the Christmas fire in the drawing-room, waiting for the Christmas dinner.

Outside, on the drive, were many [illegible] footmarks, impressions of the [illegible] of [illegible] and [illegible] performers, who had come up early in the morning to sing a Christmas Carol.

They did it in kind-hearted [illegible] Newton's time, they did it now in this widow's, but not for any love of her—oh, no, their grateful voices were all for beautiful [illegible] Stella, and their eyes, one and all, were directed to her window.

[illegible] knew her in [illegible] and [illegible] and the children in the [illegible] [illegible] and sprang within [illegible]

Stella was there, [illegible] [illegible] and [illegible] like [illegible] the [illegible]

"How cold it is!" groaned the old gentleman from the corner. "I think Christmas is [illegible] I [illegible] [illegible] I'm sure."

"[illegible]" [illegible] Mrs. Newton, [illegible] and [illegible] she could make answer. "You forget that your blood has grown thinner and your limbs older since you were a boy."

"Perhaps so, Martha," sighed the old man.

"Besides the idea of your being cold with such a fire as this. It's ridiculous."

[illegible] upon the little group, which Stella broke by poking the magnificent fire violently.

"Well, mamma, it is not such a very [illegible] one, after all," she said, with a gentle laugh. "We will have a Christmas log, [illegible] and as the old man looked up and chuckled in gratitude [illegible] at a [illegible] [illegible] the bell for the log, and with [illegible] hands and eyes superintended its elevation to the top of the burning coals.

Then tossed the [illegible], Mrs. Newton stalked off to spend half an hour in [illegible] badgering the footmen and butler, and the cousins fell to talking and laughing as if a ghost or a damp blanket had stalked off or been removed from her shoulders.

All but Stella. She sat beside the old man, her hand in his, and gazed at the fire.

It was cold, very cold; and if it was cold with such a magnificent fire as that, what must it have been without one, in a home, say, without curtains to keep away the draught and merry [illegible]

Many a poor creature was in that plight, but Stella, for one, was not thinking of the poor in general, but of one [illegible] individual whom she could picture to herself as sitting not a mile from where she [illegible] shivering in the dusty, draughty, [illegible] dining-room at Heavithorne.

Now, Stella was not a reserved, secretive girl; she was open as a rose in June, and all her [illegible] have been laid bare before an inquisition of [illegible]. But, for the first time in her life—perhaps, she mused, remembering the [illegible] she had kept her own counsel.

Moved by an indescribable, shy reluctance, strange [illegible] she had told no one of her meeting with the owner of that hut, and, as that part of the park was little frequented, no one had discovered his advent.

She asked herself if she should communicate her intimation to her mamma, who would [illegible] a [illegible] servants to wait upon Mr. Felton and ask him to transfer himself to the Vale.

[illegible] but a feeling of reluctance and the doubt whether the poor [illegible] of ruined Heavithorne would [illegible] the Vale kept her undecided and [illegible]

Presently [illegible] laughter [illegible]

"Aren't you coming, Stella?" [illegible]

"[illegible]" [illegible] little maiden, [illegible] her dress and looking into [illegible]

[illegible] snatched the little one [illegible] and, dispelling her gloom by a great effort, was all as merrily as the rest.

Dinner arrived. They [illegible] a huge fire in the grandly decorated dining-room, [illegible] for the gratification of the elderly cousin.

There were [illegible] [illegible] side dishes and, glory of the [illegible]! there was the pudding.

Under its genial influence even Mrs. Newton melted into something like pleasantness, and the [illegible] was [illegible] [illegible] old man's [illegible] [illegible]

[illegible] what toasts the old man proposed, with what warmth they wished the Queen a long life and [illegible] [illegible] like [illegible] [illegible] [illegible]

[illegible] trooped back into the drawing-room [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] tucked up on the sofa [illegible] with his red [illegible] kerchief and all the available [illegible] macassars.

Mrs. Newton retired to her own room for a nap, with something more substantial than flimsy crochet as a covering, and the cousins seated themselves around the fire.

They talked as light-hearted girls only can talk until general gossip and mirth-provoking reminiscences were exhausted.

Then followed a pause.

"Stella, dear, tell us a story," said one, a school girl, who possessed an insatiable appetite for stories of every kind, but love romances in particular.

Stella tossed, and stroked the [illegible] hair with a laugh.

"Tell you a story! I don't think [illegible] tell us a story. Tersie [illegible]" prattled the mite.

And Stella, after staring at the [illegible] a half smile for inspiration, commenced:

"There was once—"

"[illegible] a love story or a ghost [illegible] [illegible] better all [illegible] said the school girl, solemnly.

Stella laughed.

"[illegible]" she said.

"[illegible] must be [illegible]" [illegible] knowingly. "[illegible] must have some love or [illegible] story at all."

"[illegible]" said Stella.

[illegible] she started off again.

"Once upon a time there lived a [illegible] who was shut up by herself in a high tower because people said [illegible]

"[illegible] she could [illegible] from the little, narrow slits of windows [illegible] the streets below and she seemed to be always waiting and watching for some one.

"Now the princess—for she was a [illegible]—was not really mad, but only labouring under a spell, and you must know, that this spell was [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] palace [illegible] [illegible] had charmed her [illegible] and left her [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] in which the King had [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] a very wicked man, who [illegible] [illegible]

"Well, one day the King, who [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] offered a [illegible] [illegible] half his kingdom to any one who could cure his daughter of the spell which had been [illegible]

"Well, plenty of [illegible] [illegible] tried, but they all failed.

"At last the King, in despair, issued [illegible] that he would give [illegible] of his kingdom to the successful man, [illegible] any who attempted and failed [illegible] be beheaded.

"[illegible] [illegible] [illegible] until one day, when a stranger [illegible] presented himself at the palace and [illegible] himself at the feet of the King [illegible] the usual offer.

"The King warned him of the penalty [illegible] and the stranger [illegible] to the turret.

"When he entered the room the [illegible] and with [illegible] that [illegible] [illegible] weary of all the [illegible] but the old man [illegible] requested to be left [illegible] with the princess for one [illegible] [illegible] on the stair on the turret.

"[illegible] No [illegible] that they shut the door than [illegible] all his [illegible] and [illegible] the [illegible] of a handsome [illegible] [illegible] that [illegible] the princess, and [illegible] [illegible] waiting; now she [illegible] and when the [illegible] [illegible] the old man [illegible] the princess [illegible] and led her to the King, saying:

"'Behold, [illegible] your daughter [illegible] [illegible]'

"[illegible] the King [illegible] his [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] his [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] to [illegible] young [illegible]

"[illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] of the [illegible] [illegible]

"[illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] the [illegible] And the King [illegible] the [illegible] young [illegible] the princess and the [illegible] [illegible] and lived happily [illegible]"

"[illegible] [illegible] [illegible]" [illegible] [illegible] "Did they [illegible]"

"[illegible]" said Stella, [illegible] strange and [illegible] [illegible] "The King [illegible] [illegible] the [illegible] young [illegible] [illegible]" said [illegible] King. The [illegible] [illegible] princess, [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible]

"[illegible] was called away [illegible] [illegible] princess again."

"[illegible]" asked half a [illegible] "What became of her, [illegible]"

"[illegible] [illegible] Stella [illegible] she went dazed [illegible] had to be taken back to [illegible] and that's the end [illegible]"

"[illegible] a [illegible] story, too," [illegible]

"That [illegible] a loud [illegible] knock" [illegible] to the hall.

All the girls—including Stella—[illegible] and [illegible] started.

SUNDAY SCHOOL LESSON

LESSON II. October 17, 1915

Elisha heals Naaman the Syrian—2 Kings 5: 1-27. (Print 5: 1-10, 14.)

Commentary. I. Naaman's leprosy (vs. 1). 1. Naaman—The name is Hebrew as well as Syrian, and means pleasant, "beautiful. captain—He was commander-in-chief of the armies of Syria. A great man with his master—He stood high in the estimation of Benhadad, King of Syria, because of his successes in war. There is a tradition, that Naaman was the man who, in the battle between Syria and Israel (1 Kings 22: 34), drew his bow at a venture and slew Ahab. Honourable—Honored. A mighty man in valour—He was possessed of unusual courage and skill. As the warrior in that age engaged in hand to hand combat with the enemy he must have physical strength to be successful, and Naaman must have been strong physically before he was afflicted with the leprosy. But—a word of wonderful significance in this narrative and in almost every phase of human experience. With all his greatness, his skill, his bravery and success Naaman was a leper. This would be his ruin. It was only a question of time with him when he would become an outcast. He was a leper—The disease of leprosy was, and is still, one of the most dreaded of all physical maladies. It was wide-spread, being found in many lands and climes. It was also considered incurable.

II. A remedy proposed (vs. 2-10). 2. By companies—Troops of Syrians entered the territory of Israel upon marauding expeditions to secure whatever plunder they were able. Brought away captive—To be held as a slave. A little maid—This young Israelitish girl was torn from her loved ones at home and taken into a strange country and among a strange people. Only those who have had the experience can realize the suffering and the heartache of such a calamity, yet this girl, trained in the religion of Israel, rose above her surroundings, and made known her faith in God. "Like Joseph in Egypt, and Daniel in Babylon, this captive girl becomes the instrument of making Jehovah known among the heathen."—Whedon. Waited on Naaman's wife—The service was far different from that required of slaves in more modern times. This girl was upon familiar terms with her mistress, and felt an interest in the welfare of her master. 3. Would God—"Would that"—R. V. Expressive of deep desire, my lord—Naaman. The prophet that is in Samaria—Elisha. The Jewish girl had been familiar with the remarkable career of this servant of Jehovah. Would recover him—Literally, "gather" him from his leprosy. An allusion to the Israelitish custom of shutting lepers out of the camp and then gathering in those who were found to be free from leprosy. 5. Go to, go—An expression calling for immediate action. The king at once opened the way for Naaman to apply to the king of Israel for relief. Departed, and took with him—He took a present to Jehoram. We can but estimate the value accurately. The money was probably weighed, and "talents," and "pieces," or shekels, were standards of weight. "A silver talent was worth $1,944, in all $19,440. A gold shekel was worth $9.75, in all $58,500."—Bible Treasury. According to this Naaman took nearly $78,000. Raiment—Doubtless it was clothing of great value. 6. That thou mayest recover him—The king of Syria considered it fitting to make the request directly to the king of Israel, who would at once be able to give Naaman all needful information. 7. Rent his clothes—In token of his distress of mind. Not only was Jehoram powerless to heal the disease, but he was not even sufficiently familiar with Elisha to direct the leper to him.

8. Elisha ... heard—No doubt the coming of the Syrian general with his retinue, and the fact that the king had rent his clothes, caused a sensation in Samaria, and the news came speedily to Elisha, who appears to have had his home in the capital city. Wherefore—A rebuke to the king for not knowing of the presence and power of the man of God. A prophet in Israel—It was to be shown that the God of Israel was the true God, not the god of the king of Israel as well as for the good of Naaman and the kingdom he represented. Jehoram had neglected the worship of Jehovah and needed to be reproved. 9. At the door of the house of Elisha—It was a magnificent retinue that halted at Elisha's door. 10. Sent a messenger—There were two reasons why Elisha did not personally appear to Naaman. He desired the captain to realize that it was by the power of Jehovah that the cure would be wrought and not by human means. He also wished Naaman to humble himself and accept the simple conditions proposed by the prophet. Seven times—"The sacred number seven was used in the Levitical observances connected with the cleansing of healed lepers."

III. The leprosy cured (vs. 11-19). 11-13. According to Naaman's idea Elisha had not shown him enough deference. He supposed that Elisha "would" use some method of cure in keeping with his office as prophet and in keeping with Naaman's high position in the kingdom of Syria. He scoffed at the idea of bathing in the yellow waters of the Jordan, while the waters of the Abana and Pharpar at home were clear. Naaman's pride had been injured and he was angry. His servants did not fully enter into his feelings. They saw the need of a cure and thought that relief from any source or by any means ought to be welcomed. The dared to reason with their master, and their argument was so clear [illegible] convincing that he was brought to think better of Elisha's directions. 14. Then went he down—He went down in a twofold sense. He got down from his high place of pride humbling himself to accept the word of the prophet, and he went down into the despised waters of the Jordan. He was clean. He submitted to the directions given by Elisha, obeyed and was healed. It was divine power that wrought the cure. It was an object-lesson [illegible] that the God of Israel was a [illegible] of power. 15-19. When Naaman realized that his cure was complete he returned to bestow a present upon Elisha but the prophet would take none. Naaman was led to believe in the God of Israel.

IV. Gehazi—In (vs. 20-27). Gehazi was base and conscienceless. He had no regard for honesty or truth and was willing to show Elisha in an unfavorable light. The prophet had refused the presents that Naaman offered, and he would appear changeable if he sent after [illegible] for what he had refused. His great sin was [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] who to this he added [illegible] and [illegible] The punishment visited upon him was severe, but not [illegible] severe for the crime.

Questions.—Who was king of Israel? Of Syria? Who was Naaman? What can you say of the leprosy? Who waited on Naaman's wife? What did this servant tell her mistress? What did the king of Syria do? Where did Naaman go? What did he take as a present? What did the king of Israel do? What word did Elisha send to the king? What did the prophet tell Naaman to do? Why was Naaman angry? What did the servants say to him? What did Naaman finally decide to do? What was the result? What was Gehazi's sin?

PRACTICAL SURVEY.

Topic.—The Divine Healer.

I. Proclaimed in heathen lands.

II. Acknowledged as God supreme.

I. Proclaimed in heathen lands. Our lesson introduces Naaman, captain of the host of the king of Syria, a great man. He was great in his position, in his possessions, in his achievements and in his authority. Besides his greatness are portrayed the circumstances of a captive Hebrew maid. She possessed two qualities that are never little or insignificant, a kind heart and faith in God. She merits the name of a great missionary. [illegible] was the [illegible] of bringing salvation to the [illegible] of her captivity, and of raising up a testimony for God, which rang through the whole land of Syria. Humble as she was, she initiated the entire series of events which form the substance of this narrative. She did the service that was nearest her. [illegible] just told where the [illegible] of health was likely to be found, to the effect that there was a remedial power in Israel equal to the emergency and that such power was delegated to the prophet Elisha. She knew that God was with Elisha, and therefore she [illegible] [illegible] [illegible]. It was no barrier in her simple, generous faith that Naaman's disease was incurable and he not of God's chosen people. It was a splendid testimony to the character and influence of Elisha that he had awakened such confidence in the soul of the little child. A few words from her moved the household of Naaman. No one could doubt the sincerity of [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] sympathy. Her words were the candid, artless statement of a truthful child. They carried conviction to all who heard them, so that the courtiers found themselves [illegible] taking Naaman's case [illegible] to disclose the [illegible] which it could be accomplished. Even the king said "Go." God turned the calamity of the captivity into blessing. He directed her life through that [illegible] [illegible] in order to do her [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible]

II. Acknowledged as God supreme. High military command, great favor at court, splendid reputation, great success and noted personal bravery were desirable accomplishments, yet no honor, no valor, no victory could place Naaman beyond the reach of his sore calamity of leprosy. Only one way promised deliverance to him. One thing could change his grief into joy. He was directed to that by a child [illegible] sought his deliverance more than captain was [illegible] upon the king of Syria, nor Joram, king of Israel, was of any real help to Naaman in his trouble. The king of Syria placed the whole responsibility of seeing that his captain was cured upon the king of Israel, supposing him to be supreme in matters of religion. Israel's king viewed his letter as a request for the impossible, as an attempt to force a quarrel, as an attack upon his insufficiency. Naaman was on the point of being sent away when Elisha interposed. His words to the king were a rebuke to his [illegible] as well as an [illegible] to him to seek help where it was to be found. Naaman's leprosy had not humbled his pride. Elisha knew what respect was due to authority and station, but just then he was dealing with Naaman, the individual, the leper, and not in his capacity as a great general. As a servant of God it was his duty to benefit Naaman's soul as well as his body. [illegible] Elisha's [illegible] of his servants Naaman would have returned [illegible] still. A second time the blessing was nearly missed. This time through his own folly and obstinacy. God designed to show mercy to Naaman for his own glory and for a testimony that the Gentiles were not outside the reach of his grace. In one sentence Elisha delivered his soldierly [illegible] a mightier soldier than Naaman. It seemed to Naaman like a studied slight put upon the rivers of his native country as an intentional humiliation put upon himself to require him to bathe in the Jordan. He showed his good sense in giving up his anger and foolish resolve. To be cured of such a disease in such a manner convinced Naaman of the power of God and that Elisha was his true prophet. [illegible] [illegible] and the [illegible] [illegible] His [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] T. R. A.

HOW PAT CASEY PUT TIM BROPHY UNDER THE TABLE

BY

DR. THOMAS O'HAGAN

A Clever Sketch of Early Life in Brant Township.

It was back in the sixties of the last century. In those days primeval nature held away in the county of Bruce, in Ontario. The early settler had built his shanty and like the Chrysalis emerging into the butterfly it was already beginning to give way to the more comfortable and stately log house. The woods were receding and the logged fallows stretching in every direction testified to the giant work of the axe and the handspike. This "Queen's Bush" as Bruce was known to the early settler, found favor with—drew to its heart—a varied and sturdy son of toil. The Highland Scotchman, whose ancestors had written their names upon the fishing sails that crowd the island ports of Western Scotland, the sons of Erin whose exiled fathers had fled the horrors of misery and famine, the German with his plain, practical and vigorous mind—all were early settlers in that long extended country, washed by the blue waves of Lake Huron and watered by the gurgling tide of aboriginal Saugeen. Each township too in Bruce had its distinction. Not only in its soil but in the character of its early settler did it stand apart. The little villages springing up recalled in their baptismal name now Scotland, now Ireland, now Germany, now England. They were historic souvenirs dear to the hearts of those who had set up their altars in the wilderness and would perhaps never again set eye upon the endearing scenes of their childhood nestling in memory beyond the seas. The religious character of the early settler in Bruce was quite as varied too as was his racial character. But all were devoted pilgrims of faith inheriting from their devout and law abiding ancestors in the old land those qualities of soul and mind that made for moral life and good citizenship. Let it be said too that the county of Bruce has a unique and enviable moral record. It has known but little crime its whole calendar for sixty-five years showing but one capital punishment.

But the early settler was human and so were Pat Casey and Tim Brophy whose fathers, hailing from Ireland, had first settled in the goodly township of Adjala in the county of Simcoe, known today for its hospitality and the warmth of its people's friendship.

We may say here that Pat Casey in character was a very foil to Jim Brophy. Both had come to Bruce in 1854, Casey recently married and Brophy single. They had settled in the township of Brant. I say settled for while both had taken up land as the term went, Brophy being unmarried was unable to set up housekeeping and so spent the first five years largely in the service of his neighbors as a hired man felling trees in winter and clearing the timber and gathering in the crop in summer. He was a superb axeman and so adroit with a scythe in a hayfield that he could almost run down a rabbit should it have the temerity to challenge his speed in his swath. An amusing incident once grew out of Tim's unusual speed as a mower. Mike McGulgan was known in the settlement as an "old skin flint" whose great ambition was to make every hired man whom he engaged do double work. Mike had a son called Patsie and Patsie was always the intermediary through whom "old skin flint" reached without pity or consideration the hired man.

McGulgan had engaged Jim Brophy for the summer and it taxed his mind night and day how he could get the most work out of Tim. Haying time came and McGulgan concluded it would be just the thing to let Patsie lead with the first swath at a rapid pace, and set Tim after him while he himself, "old skin flint" would bring up the rear. But McGulgan didn't know of Tim's speed behind a scythe. Tim's speed was simply a prophecy of the coming automobile.

Patsie led off as they say "at a good lick" and Tim buckled in after him while the old man for a moment watched the process. They had gone around the five acre field once and were starting on the second round when McGulgan observed that Tim's scythe was perilously close to Patsie's heels. On they sped and Patsie's fate in the old man's eyes seemed to grow more critical. At last he shouted to his son "Patsie arie you come and take my place and I'll take yours I haven't long to live any way."

Meantime Tim Brophy married. He had been a favorite among the girls of the settlement because of his physical prowess, his manly character and with all his "steady ways." Tim was not of a demonstrative character like Pat Casey but there was something very sincere in his work, his nature and his friendship, and there is nothing a woman admires more in man than sincerity and nothing a man admires more in woman than simplicity.

Brophy's farm was just across the road from Casey's and Pat and Tim not only exchanged work but their wives exchanged gossip. In those days a "logging bee" or a "raising" brought together well-nigh all the young men and women of the settlement. The men bantered and jollied each other and got off jibes and quips and artifices with a better and richer kernel in them than many of the jokes that pass for classical today. We speak of native wit and no where is it more native than in an Irish settlement in the country.

Tim Brophy, however, had one failing which was very common to the early settlers in Bruce. Many of his neighbors shared it, among others, Pat Casey across the way. Perhaps the gloom of the wilderness, perhaps the giant work of axe and handspike, perhaps a certain feeling of isolation invited "John Barleycorn" to every feast of toil but certain it is that in the twilight days of Bruce there was scarcely ever a gathering where the cup that inebriates was not in evidence. Yet strange to say, there was not after all in those days a great deal of excessive drinking—drinking that ruined the body and clouded the mind. This kind of drinking is usually reserved for the city and town where the plane of intelligence is supposed to be higher but the family virtues a little lower.

It may be well to state here that Pat Casey envied Tim Brophy's coolness and steadiness when subjected to the fire of "treating" whether at a "logging bee" or social gathering. Indeed Tim was in this respect the envy of the neighborhood. While others revealed their weakness under fire Tim always kept his head knowing well his capacity and fearing always to compromise with the enemy.

This commendable characteristic of Tim soon became the talk of the "Settlement" and Pat Casey told the "boys" one day that he felt certain he could and would in due time "put Tim Brophy under the table."

Pat and Tim, as I have already observed, were the closest and best of friends. Pat ran across the road to visit Tim and Tim dropped in most informally to visit Pat. One evening that Casey expected Brophy to visit him he put the kettle "down" and half filled it, not with water but whiskey. Casey knew well that Brophy had a liking for punch and by this insidious means he would be able to not only satisfy Tim's tastes but double the dose each time.

As expected Tim dropped in to have a chat with Pat. It was just before haying time when farmers have "some time on their hands" and as a Dominion election was pending with Edward Blake in the field as Liberal candidate for South Bruce, Casey and Brophy alone—for Mrs. Casey was visiting a neighbor—soon were deep in discussion threshing out the political possibilities and the prospective crop of the year. "I don't think," said Casey, "that Blake is the man for Bruce. These young lawyers are never popular with the farmers." "Thrue for you," said Tim, "besides isn't Blake already a member of the local legislature. One office ought to be enough for him." "You'll have a sup with me, Tim," said Pat as he brought the jug "The Cruiskeen Lawn" from the sideboard and laid it on the table. "Oh I'll have a drop with you" nodded Tim, "seeing that the seeding is now all through and there's the prospect of a good year ahead." "I know your taste," added Pat winking with his left eye at the cat under the table "and as the kettle is boiling I'll make you a drop of punch." "Here's to your breachy cow," said Tim, "May she break her neck the next time she jumps into your turnip patch!"

As the evening wore on and the kettle kept boiling, mingling its refrain with Pat Casey's upper notes as he sang, "Nell Flaherty's Drake" Tim began to feel the punch mounting to the lookout place in his head. As Pat was concocting the fifth round he looked out the window to see if his wife was on her way home for the moonlight had lit up everything as if it were day. He noticed that as Tim made the fifth attack he offered no toast. It was the kettle had done it all. Pat Casey had indeed succeeded in "putting Tim Brophy under the table."

A DICTIONARY OF BUILDING TRADE TERMS

The following definitions will not be found in any of the standard dictionaries, but many of them will be understood and appreciated by those who have been identified with building operations. They were compiled by W. Livingstone Larned, and published in The Building Age, of Chicago—a city the inconsistencies of whose building trades are too well known to mention. Of course the definitions could not apply to the Canadian trades without great modifications.

Architect—A man who never puts closets and windows where you want them; a gentleman of some importance—at one time "a person skilled in the art of building."

Attic—That part of house which is never quite completed.

Bills—Insistent reminders which never stop coming.

Carpenter—A gentleman of uncouth appearance who stains neat, white pine planks with tobacco juice, who is always stopping to eat his lunch, and who "strikes" just before the roof is put on.

Chimney—An arrangement for drawing smoke down and into rooms.

Chisel—An excuse for a grindstone.

Contractors—One who contracts; generally a hard-working man of limited means who is handicapped in life by the reputation of possessing shrewd cunning and great wealth; a buffer between an architect and his client; sometimes known as a "boacontractor."

Door—Big piece of wood opening the wrong way.

Hammer—An instrument of torture used extensively for purpose of crushing fingers.

Hardware—House jewelry.

Keys—Little jiggers a locksmith is compelled to bring in a hurry because the originals were lost.

Kitchen—A place where the bone of contention is cooked.

Knotholes—What they send instead of timber.

Laborer—One who stands back and silently admires what somebody else has done.

Laths—Equivalent to bones in a Shad. Long, slender planks, which permit expensive plaster to ooze through and out of sight.

Lime—What a plasterer puts on his face.

Masonry—Expensive stuff upon which to rest the house; outer "skin" of the cellar; dam used to hold water in basement when it rains.

Mortar—Long box of damp, soggy material mixed up for benefit of children in vicinity—that which a mason squeezes out from between the bricks after he has taken the trouble to put it there.

Nails—Little pieces of wire, or steel, chopped into conveniently short lengths for baby to bite on. Used extensively by carpenters to sprinkle over the ground.

"Nearing Completion"—The situation from the time the job is started until you decide to sell the place.

Night-watchman—Sound sleeper; a human machine for speedily removing all fire wood and wood blocks.

Pergola—Where the contractor makes his velvet

Plans—Diagrams of the way you do not want the house

Plaster—An ingredient employed as a floor-dressing.

Plumber—An impostor who tears down and rips out everything as soon as it is completed. (See Brigand).

Putty—Carpenter's dough. An article found one year later, in wasteful wads, beneath the back porch chairs.

Roof—The one part of a house upon which no two people agree.

Sash—Bandages for holes in side of house.

Sash Cord—Wash lines at double the price.

Sash Weight—Inside decoration.

Sawdust—Practically all of a two-by-four, except a half dozen knotholes.

Saw-horse—A convenient place for workmen to sit.

Shingles—Flat surfaces of nice smooth boards cut thin. When sliced, used by neighbors as kindling wood.

Staircase—Device for mussing up proper arrangements of rooms.

Trees—Leafy, green ornaments which must invariably be cut down on your property before building, no matter where they are.

Trowel—Irish tablespoon.

Varnish—Preparation for covering up defects.

Wainscotting—The space used by painters for practicing.

Water Boy—A small chap, carrying a bucket half filled with sawdust and water, who is always on hand when you are not thirsty.

Wife—A female person who changes her ideas every time she sees the plans.

News About Town

Taking Trip to Denver.

Mr. and Mrs. L. H. McNamara left last Wednesday morning on a sixteen days' holiday trip to Chicago, Kansas City and Denver. At the latter city Mr. McNamara will attend the Ticket Agents' Convention which is to last several days. Elaborate arrangements have been made to entertain the men and their wives at Denver, and it is expected that the visit will be a memorable one for all. At Kansas City they will visit Mrs. McNamara's relatives, and they will also spend a few days at Chicago, and at Toronto on the way home, arriving at Walkerton about the end of the month.

Leaving for California.

Walkerton is losing an old and respected resident through the removal of Mr. William Adamson, who has sold his residence opposite the hospital and purposes leaving next month with his daughter to make their home in California. Mr. Adamson has a son there, Mr. Ezra Adamson, who is engaged in business. His departure from the town will be regretted by a very wide circle of friends. Mr. Adamson has lived here 41 years, 29 years of which he carried on a large tile business successfully. He was a former member of the Town Council, and a good citizen whose loss will be felt.

✣ ✣ ✣

Johnston—Fraser.

At the home of Mr. and Mrs. F. J. Fraser, Walkerton, a pretty wedding was celebrated on October 7th, at 12.30 o'clock noon, when their youngest daughter, Miss Eva Victoria Fraser, was united in marriage to Mr. Vernon Johnston, of Stayner. The ceremony was performed in the presence of the immediate relatives by Rev. D. A. Walker, B.A., pastor of the Methodist Church, in the capacious drawing room of the bride's home which was beautifully decorated for the occasion. Both bride and groom were unattended. After the ceremony, a sumptuous repast was served after which Mr. and Mrs. Johnston left on a wedding tour to Toronto, Niagara Falls and other points. On their return they will live in Mr. Johnston's handsome new residence at Stayner, where he conducts a successful men's furnishing store. Many beautiful, as well as useful presents, testified to the high esteem in which the bride is held.

Eidt—Rennie.

A very pretty wedding was celebrated at the home of Mr. and Mrs. Frank Rennie, in Brant, on Thursday morning, October 7th, at 11.30 o'clock, when their youngest daughter, Annie Irene, was united in marriage to Mr. Frank G. Eidt, of the Walkerton Telescope. The ceremony was performed by Rev. Thos. Wilson, pastor of Knox Church, only the immediate relatives and friends being present. The bride, who was prettily gowned in white chiffon over silk and carrying a bouquet of red roses was given away by her father, Mendelsohn's wedding march being played by Miss Rotha Schwindt. The bride was attended by Miss Doris Graf, of Clifford, Ont., Mr. Leslie Huether acting as groom's man. After the ceremony a tempting repast was served, and the bride and groom left on a wedding tour to Hamilton, Niagara Falls and New York, the bride's travelling suit being of becoming brown with hat to match. On their return they will reside in T. E. Atwood's cottage opposite the Lutheran Church. Among the many beautiful and useful presents received by the bride was a handsome pearl necklace, the gift of the groom, and a splendid cheque from her father.

JOHN BULL, ADVERTISER

(Fourth Estate)

How many million dollars the British Government has spent in advertising during the first year of war no expert accountant has yet the facilities to estimate. It is a safe statement to make, however, that no nation ever spent onetenth as much on printer's ink in the same period.

The recent big war loan, the largest in the history of Government borrowings, was the occasion of another tremendous advertising campaign. Even the big advertisers who have contracts for the outside pages of the dailies were pushed inside so John Bull could ask Britons to pour their savings into the nation's till. If the public had not become accustomed to Great Britain as a big advertiser because of the proportions of the army recruiting crusade, the dimensions of this campaign of advertising for money would have seemed startling, for in itself it was altogether without precedent among nations before this war.

Now there are signs of a third big advertising movement by Great Britain in its "thrift campaign." Already the posters are urging people to eat less meat, to eat more vegetables, to insist that each loaf of bread weigh two pounds, to report a dealer trying to sell a smaller loaf and giving similar advice as to economical housekeeping. The third campaign on the part of the Empire, hitherto regarded as conservative, and not given to modern or sensational methods, has not yet reached the porportions of the other two—the campaign for recruits and the campaign for money—but it is in embryo still.

All the patent medicine and breakfast food advertisers in the United States must take a back seat compared to the British Empire now, when the dimensions, cost or character of display advertising are in question.

John Bull has become the greatest advertiser on earth.

LETTER FROM JOE FRITZ

Editor Telescope,
Dear Sir:—

Just a few lines to let you know that I am in Shaunavon now, with my brothers, Peter and George. There's quite a bunch of Fritz's in Shaunavon. There's Willie and John, sons of Lorences Fritz, North Dakota; Thomas, John and Simon, sons of Jos. Fritz, of Chepstow; Peter, George and Joseph, sons of Peter Fritz, of Chepstow. Peter has six of a family; George has five; John, one; Thomas, four. Quite a shower of Fritz's. There's sure a bumper crop here this summer. Wheat averages 40 bus., Oats 75, Barley 50, Flax 25 or better. Turnips, potatoes and all garden vegetables are as good as could be expected. The weather is rather wet this fall, and it is very difficult to get the crops threshed. There had been a heavy shower of rain all day Saturday. Sunday and Monday were sunshiny with a cold wind, but on Tuesday morning it was raining, and yesterday and today we are having a snowstorm. There will likely be threshing to do till Christmas and perhaps lots of it will not get threshed till next spring. I was surprised to hear that Dr. Sinclair died. I am in fairly good health this summer. Hoping that you are all the same. So by-by for this time, hoping to read this letter in the Telescope in the near future.

Yours very truly,
JOS. W. FRITZ.

Two Hurt in Auto Accident.

Mr. Barney Ellinghausen and Miss Agnes Zettler, of Walkerton, were the victims of an auto accident at Formosa on Tuesday of last week, which might easily have proven fatal. Through the failure of the brakes to work on a heavy grade, the auto gathered such speed that it turned turtle while rounding a corner. Miss Zettler sustained a fractured wrist and Mr. Ellinghausen escaped with a badly bruised arm and a gash over one eye. Only the lightness of the car appears to have prevented a fatality.

A MERCHANT IS HIS OWN NEWS-MAKER

The editor of a newspaper must content himself with printing, in an informing and entertaining way, the news of things that Providence has permitted to happen in the world since his last issue went to press. Sometimes this means a tremendously interesting newspaper—and now and then a more or less dull one. For the editor does not "make news." He just makes a record of it.

The merchant, however, MAKES the news of his store. He originates the things that happen there—usually. If he is alive to his opportunities his store becomes, in its way, a real news center. Things happen there which concern, directly and importantly, every reader of this newspaper.

When he decides to readjust his stocks, and for that purpose to sacrifice profits on some broken lines of goods, he has "made news" for all who await such opportunities for economies in buying.

When he secures an especially attractive line of new goods, he has again "made news" for all live and up-to-date people.

Every improvement in his store service is a matter of news interest. The arrival of new stocks is a new event. The advent of a new dress fabric has a news value all its own. In hundreds of ways a live store is a news-maker.

If, however, the merchant does not publish his store news attractively, fully, interestingly AND CONTINUOUSLY, he misses the full advantage of his position as a maker of news. If, on a dull day, he does not publish any store news at all, he will break the chain of reader-interest in his store as a place where important things occur.

The dominant merchants in every community are those who make the most of their opportunities as makers and publishers of STORE NEWS.

Visited Blarney Castle

Capt. McNalley writes home from France that he has been in the trenches since his recovery and on his last leave, visited Ireland and saw, among the interesting sights, the famous Blarney Stone which he says is now almost black with the kisses that have been showered upon it for several centuries. Whether he kissed the mystic stone himself or not, his letter does not say. He had the pleasure of meeting Sir George Coutts on whose estate Blarney Castle is situated, and was shown over the beautiful estate by him. At the time of the Chicago World's Fair, Sir George was offered a large sum for permission to have the famous Blarney Stone brought to the Fair. According to the ancient tradition, this would bring ill luck to Ireland, so permission was refused, but those who attended the big Fair, remember that a model of Blarney Castle was erected there, with an imitation Blarney Stone. Capt. McNalley stated that he returns to the trenches this week.

Home Town is Best After All

If you meet a man who is down in the mouth, who thinks that his town is all wrong, just take him aside or give him a ride and hand him this quaint littlesong. "There are fancier towns than our own little town, there are towns that are bigger than this, and the people who live in the tinier towns all the city excitement will miss. There are things you can see in the wealthier towns, that you can't in the town that is small, and yet up and down there is no other town like our own little town after all. It may be the street through the heart of our town, isn't long, isn't straight; but the neighbors you know in your own little town, with a welcome your coming will wait. In the glittering streets of the glittering town with its palace and pavement and thrall; in the midst of the throng you'll frequently long, for our own little town after all. If you live and work and trade in your town in spite of the fact that it's small you'll find that the town, your own little town, is the best kind of town after all.

CHILDEN'S "WAR PLOTS"

Potato Growing for Patriotic Purposes By Bruce School Children a Great Success.

Three hundred and fifty children in 60 schools of Bruce County have been growing potatoes this summer for patriotic purposes under the direction of Mr. N. C. McKay, of the County Agricultural Department. The crop has been a splendid success, and will probably yield between four and five hundred dollars towards providing comforts for the men at the Front. The prize-winners in the various sections were announced this week. A silver medal had been offered by Hon. James Duff, Minister of Agriculture, for the boy or girl who produced the greatest yield and showed the greatest care. As two pupils tied for the first prize, the Minister very kindly provided two first prize silver medals. The two winners are Gertrude Ashley of South Line, Brant, and Elsie Muir of No. 4, Saugeen, who each grew 197 lbs. of potatoes in a plot containing a hundred sets, sowed with 8 lbs. of seed potatoes. This would average 457½ bushels per acre. The prize winners in the Walkerton district:—1, Gertrude Ashley, No. 3, Brant, 197 lbs; 2, Annie Wilhelm, No. 2, Brant, 175 lbs; 3, Mary Hinphent, No. 2, Brant, 140 lbs; 4, Elroy Etsell, No. 2, 98 lbs. The children are beginning the marketing of the crop and are getting good prices. The moneys are to be turned in to Mr. McKay, and will be devoted to patriotic purposes.

Mrs. Hopkins of Brantford visited her sister, Miss M. Baird of Walkerton and Hanover and left for Mount Forest to visit her cousins over the week end and then return to her home.

A Duty to Perform

The man who makes money in a community has a duty to perform to that community. It may be that he has made his money by his superior business ability, and that he would have done as well anywhere. That does not alter the case. If his gifts are great his responsibility is equally as great. No man was placed on earth for the sole purpose of making money, and the man who has this as his ideal had better never have been born. It is not an act of charity, but the performance of a simple duty for the man who has made money to pass a little of it on for the benefit of the community even though he never expects to see a dollar of his contribution back.

W. M. S. Convention.

The district convention of the W. M. S. was held in the Methodist Church, Hanover, on October 13th, Miss Dirstein, the District Organizer, in the chair. Devotional exercises were conducted by the Elmwood Auxiliary. Greetings were extended by the different auxiliaries of Hanover and responded to by Miss Rolston of Walkerton. Encouraging reports were read from all over the district. Mrs. J. S. Williamson, of Chesley conducted a round table conference, in which were discussed questions relating to the work, one of which was the importance of mission study classes. Miss Marshall, missionary from China, gave two fine addresses in which she told of the increasing opportunities for work, and the eagerness of the Chinese to hear the Gospel. Rev. J. W. Cooley occupied the chair at the evening session and the presence of the choir added greatly to the interest. The Convention is invited to Elmwood in 1916.

AT THE COUNTY GAOL

High Cost of Living Problem Solved—Prisoners Thrive on Low-Priced Fare.

Gaoler D. McKechnie has made his report to the government for the year ending Sept. 30th. The report contains much interesting information. Mr. McKechnie appears to have solved the high cost of living at the county gaol. Prisoner's food costs only nine and seven-tenths cents per day. And it must not be supposed that the inmates are not properly fed. The menu includes half a pound of bread at every meal; two or three ounces of oatmeal twice a day; meat and potatoes for dinner three times a week, with soup two other days of the week. The bill of fare though not luxurious, is substantial and some of the prisoners get fat on it, which is remarkable when you consider the cost of their daily diet. Other items include:—Number of prisoners in custody during the year, male 72, female 3, Under 16 years, 3 male; for first time, 51 male, 2 female; for second time, 12 male; over three times 6 male, 1 female; total number committed, 72 male, 3 females. (Nationality of prisoners.—Canadian, 61; English 4; Irish 2; other countries, 5. Religious denominations, Roman Catholics, 16; Church of England, 11; Presbyterian, 17; Methodist, 19; other denominations, 9. Prisoners married, 83; unmarried, 37; could not read, 0; temperate, 30; intemperate, 45. Gaol expenditures for the year—food, clothing, fuel, etc. $623.72; officers' salaries, $1500; repairs, $175; total, $2298.72. Daily cost of rations per prisoner, nine and seven-tenths cents.

Offences for which prisoners were committed:—abusive and obscene language 2, assault 3, abduction 1, destroying and injuring 0, escaping from or obstructing constable 2 fraud 5 giving liquor to Indians 1, horse stealing 1, indecent assault 1, larceny 12, lunatics 7, misdemeanor 2 rape and assault with intent 2, receiving stolen goods 1, seduction 2, threatening language 1, trespassers 7, vagrancy 13, other offences 2. Demand an Inquest.

The farmers on the 8th Concession, east of Deemerton, are anxious that an inquest be held in the matter of the fire which destroyed John Niesen's barn last week. So many fires have taken place in that locality recently that were not "mere accidents" that the whole community is being alarmed and want the affair probed to the bottom.—Mildmay Gazette.

Our Farmers

The farmers have just as much to do in building up and improving their town as do the citizens of the town. It is to their interests to have up-to-date merchants, machinists and mechanics. How can they expect those conveniences if they send to all the large cities for merchandise that should be bought of the home dealer. The few cents that might be saved by buying goods away from home is injuring your community to the extent of many dollars by retarding progress and the increased valuation of all kinds of property, including your own. Stand together, and together all prosper. Divide and prosperity will flee.

Potatoes Higher in Price.

From $1.20 to $1.25 per bag is the price of Ontario and New Brunswick potatoes in Toronto, and in London the figures are higher. Wholesale buyers are receiving confirmation of the ominous reports as to the effects of rot in the Ontario tuber crop. Some dealers go so far as to say that it is almost a total failure, while others state that potatoes grown on the higher ground are in fairly good shape. One of the largest Toronto dealers stated that in his opinion the price would be around $2 per bag this winter, as against 85c last year. New Brunswick potatoes are entirely free of rot, but the yield is not more than 60 per cent of last year. The embargo against imported potatoes having been removed by both Canada and U.S., New Brunswick product will find a large market in the eastern states. In Bruce County the crop was most promising for a heavy yield of murphies, but the rot brought great dissapointment at digging time, except where spraying had been done throughout the growing season. This plan seems to be the only hope for farmers to get anything out of potato growing. The Port Elgin Fruit Growers Company raised 1000 bushels and report no rot. Spraying the tops kept the tubers from the slightest taint of the widely prevalent disease—Paisley Advocate.

COMMUNICATION

To the Editor of Walkerton Telescope.

Dear Sir:

As the busy season of the harvest has passed, and the long evenings are here, and not so much time occupied in work, it has been on the mind of the writer to try and get our young people—yes, and our old folks to, also—to use their time in the way of self-improvement. Much time can be used or spent in reading and study that would be of benefit to those who would do so, and make them useful and influencial members of Society. We have an excellent library in our town, bright and cheerful—with a good supply of books, papers and the leading magazines, which is available to all who wish to use it. This library has books on all classes of literature, science, history and the ordinary arts in general use. If our young people would take up a course on any line of reading or study for one season the student will be surprised at the amount of useful information that has been stored up, and can be followed up in their various details.

Try for one season and see how it acts.

Launcelot McGirr, 19, Durham, clerk.

Arnott C. Dewar, 22 Durham, bank clerk.

Four other men from Tobermory enlisted at Wiarton the same day:—Corp. A. Britton, Privates G. Bennett, W. G. Frances and J. Spicer.

OLD COUNTRY NEWS

LATEST V. C. HERO.

The King has awarded the Victoria Cross to the undermentioned officer for most conspicuous bravery and determination in the Gallipoli Peninsula from August 7-9:

Lieut. William Thomas Forshaw, 19th Battalion, The Manchester Regiment, Territorial Force.

When holding the northwest corner of "Vineyard," he was attacked and heavily bombed by Turks, who advanced time after time by three trenches which converged at this point, but he held his own, not only directing his men and encouraging them by exposing himself with the utmost disregard to danger, but personally throwing bombs continuously for 41 hours. When his detachment was relieved after 24 hours he volunteered to continue the direction of operations. Three times during the night of August 8-9 he was again heavily attacked, and once the Turks got over the barricades, but after shooting three with his revolver he led his men forward and recaptured it.

When he rejoined his battalion he was choked and sickened by bomb fumes, badly bruised by a fragment of shrapnel, and could barely lift his arm from continuous bomb throwing.

It was due to his personal example, magnificent courage and endurance, that this very important corner was held.

Lieutenant Forshaw is twenty-five years of age, and the eldest son of Mr. Thomas Forshaw, an official at Messrs. Vickers' works, Barrow-in-Furness. He was educated at the Westminster Training College, and for a short time took up a post at the Barrow shipyard. Afterwards he became a school teacher at Lancaster, and two and a half years ago he was assistant master at the North Manchester Grammar School.

He joined the army when war broke out and was promoted to a lieutenancy in November last. He is a fine athlete, and at the regimental sports in Cairo won a championship cup.

Lieutenant Forshaw is now in Cairo convalescent. He has received numerous telegrams expressing admiration. General Douglas has wired his own and General Sir Ian Hamilton's congratulations on his well-deserved award.

Eye-witnesses say that Lieutenant Forshaw was magnificent. He treated bomb-throwing as if it were snowballing. Lieutenant Forshaw, they say, looked thoroughly happy all the time.

Interviewed by a correspondent, the lieutenant said he was terribly excited and had never enjoyed anything better than the desperate fight. All through that time he smoked continuously for the purpose of lighting the fuses of the bombs, which were made out of jam tins.

This, coupled with the fumes of the bombs, brought on sickness and a complete loss of the voice lasting several days. Lieutenant Forshaw said, "It was a strange feeling suddenly to see huge Turks facing you. There is nothing like a revolver in such circumstances. I shot my first man as he was attempting to bayonet a corporal, a second as he was running for our ammunition wagon, and a third as he was attempting to bayonet me. All was over in a few seconds, but the Turks had fled."

When Lieutenant Forshaw came up with his half-company to the post allotted him he realized that he had to hold on at all costs to his position to save the line. Lieutenant Forshaw is shortly proceeding to England for rest.

HEROES' LAST STAND.

An officer of the Liverpool Regiment, who was attached to the staff of one of the infantry brigades during a recent battle around Hooge, has told a graphic story of the fighting to the Manchester Guardian. He said:

"At a point between the two lines a number of wounded and unwounded men had taken shelter. They numbered under a hundred, and in the afternoon, when the enemy were pressing home an attack, with the idea of flinging back our supports, these men found themselves up against a battalion of Germans who had been brought up to reinforce their fighting line.

By all the rules those men were done for, and it was only as a matter of form that the Germans called on them to surrender. The corporal who had taken command of this band of stragglers returned a curt 'No,' and in a few minutes the little band were fighting for dear life against the eager foe. The Britons put up a dandy of a fight, and time after time the enemy's attack was smashed to smithereens against that slender little force.

In the end ammunition failed, and the heroes, now reduced to one-half or less, had to withstand with the bayonet a new and furious onslaught. The Germans charged down like a hurricane, but the little line stood firm. In the end, however, brute force told, and the weary survivors died where they stood rather than surrender. Their stand, however, had saved our line at a vital point.

ANGELS AT MONS.

"I have read," says a distinguished lieutenant-colonel in a letter to Mr. Arthur Machen, author of "The Bowmen," "the admirably written legends with great interest, and I propose to tell you my experience during the retirement."

The officer then tells of the retirement from Le Cateau on August 26, 1914. The brigade to which he belonged covered the retirement of the rest of the division, "so that we had very hard work, and by the night of the 27th we were all absolutely worn out with fatigue—both bodily and mental fatigue.

"On the night of August 27 as we rode along I became conscious of the fact that, in the fields on both sides of the road along which we were marching, I could see a very large body of horsemen. I did not say a word about it at first, but I watched them for about twenty minutes.

"At last an officer asked me if I saw anything in the fields. I then told him what I had seen. A third officer then confessed that he too had been watching these horsemen for the past twenty minutes. So convinced were we that they were really cavalry that, at the next halt, one of the officers took a party of men out to reconnoitre and found no one there. The night then grew darker and we saw no more. The same phenomenon was [illegible] (man) men in our column."

SOLDIER'S PRIZE COD.

There can never have been anglers more "complete" than the hundred and three wounded soldiers who fished the sea at Deal last Thursday for a hundred and three prizes presented by the Deal and Walmer Anglers' Association.

The winner—Private O'Dell, a Canadian—caught a cod weighing 2½ lb. and no one came near to this result. Many of the other men well deserved their prizes for the great variety of the treasure they brought in.

The man who caught the smallest fish, a little sea urchin, was presented with a giant iron cross on a black chain.

NAPOLEON III.

[illegible] the British historian, gives [illegible] explanation of the origin of the title of Napoleon III., assumed by Louis Napoleon. He said that when Louis Napoleon's adherents were manufacturing public sentiment to receive him as ruler, [illegible] who was preparing a proclamation, wrote these words: "The [illegible] will be: Vive Napoleon!!!" The printer mistook the three exclamation marks for three I's, and the [illegible] was so named. This was considered a good story when it was related, but it has lacked confirmation.

Little Lands of Europe

Belgium and Luxemburg are no longer the only small states of Europe concerned in the present struggle. Andorra hopes to keep out, but San Marino has gone to war [illegible] a neutral [illegible] offering [illegible] for the war birds of Austria-Hungary. [illegible] republic of Tavolara is presumably contributing its quota to the Italian armies, and Cracow, once a tiny independent republic in the heart of autocratic Central Europe, may yet [illegible] the hands of the Russians when they have gained strength to come back.

These little lands of Europe are mostly curious political survivals of mediaeval times, and most of them, although completely surrounded by one or another great monarchy, are republics. San Marino, Andorra, Tavolara and Luxemburg have less than 1,500 square miles and less than 300,000 inhabitants between them.

Their whole armed force [illegible] not much above 2,500 men, though in San Marino almost one in ten of the whole population is a soldier. The same proportion would give the United States an army of about 10,000,000 men.

Tavolara is the smallest of the four queer little lands. It is an island of less than 2½ square miles just off the northeastern coast of Sardinia. Charles Albert, king of Sardinia and of Piedmont on the Italian mainland, good-naturedly turned over the island of Tavolara in 1836 to the Bartoleoni family, and the head of the family [illegible] as king [illegible] through the troublous European times of the next 46 years, and when he died the people of Tavolara set up a republic, in which the president is elected for ten years, and the women vote. Tavolara has attracted so little attention that that arguments from her example have been drawn by neither [illegible] for [illegible] but in that land is [illegible] which has no history, the little island republic must be accepted as [illegible] equal struggle.

San Marino, with 32 square miles of mountainous territory between the crest of the Apennines and the Adriatic coast of Italy, a [illegible] southwest of Rimini, gravely insists it is the oldest state in Europe. Its capital of the same name, said to have been founded in the fourth century, has a [illegible] from the great council of 60, elected by the people, from which council is chosen a [illegible] small executive council.

The citizens of San Marino are [illegible] in all [illegible] surrounded [illegible] Italian territory, she has no [illegible] with any [illegible] San Marino [illegible] has a frequent [illegible] a treaty with Italy [illegible] San Marino undertakes [illegible] Italy [illegible] Austria-Hungary, San Marino [illegible] from her neutrality [illegible] of the republic as a [illegible] San Marino is under mobilization as well her army [illegible] her neighbors [illegible].

Austrian [illegible] would probably extinguish the liberties of a people who [illegible] Napoleon [illegible] their independence since the [illegible] is acknowledged [illegible] in 1631.

Andorra is the only one of the tiny states of Europe likely to have no relation to the war. For more than 1,000 years this little republic, with its area of less than 200 square miles in the heart of the Pyrenees between the Spanish province of Catalonia and the French Department of Ariege, has maintained the independence which Charlemagne is said to have conferred upon it in recognition of services rendered to him when he was marching against the Moors.

There is no freer or simpler people in the world than the Andorrans. They number rather more than 6,000 souls and every male between sixteen and sixty is liable to military service. Andorra has little arable land, and has to import grain from France, but her iron mines are rich, her forests, much reduced in area within the last two centuries, are still valuable and she has plenty of pasturage for her fine herds.

Andorra's revenues are raised in part from a tax on land values. The little republic has a legislative council of 24 members chosen for four years by the heads of communities, and presided over by two officers, one chosen for life, the other for four years. In which arrangement one sees the same fear of one-man power shown by San Marino in having two ruling captains. Andorra has two criminal judges, one of whom must be a French citizen, and a civil judge appointed alternately by the French Government and the Spanish Bishop of Urgel, whose see [illegible] the republic. [illegible] may be appealed to the French court of cassation, but there is no appeal in criminal cases. [illegible] than the [illegible] republic hidden away in a [illegible] lonely valley of the high Pyrenees.

FIXED THE "BEAK."

How Late P. J. Nolan Got an Acquittal for His Client.

The late P. J. Nolan, of Calgary, whose resemblance to Hon. T. Mayne Daly was frequently remarked, was an Irishman with a spontaneous and irrepressible wit, an excellent story-teller and an original and daring practical joker. His fund of anecdotes was inexhaustible, and the number of stories told about himself was legion. Here is one of them.

Like most Irishmen, "Paddy" Nolan had a big heart. He was easily touched by a tale of distress and generous to a fault. About the beginning of the century, when Calgary was a good deal smaller than it is now, a railway man who lived in the town was killed in a wreck and left his widow penniless. His estate consisted of nothing but a gold watch. It was little it would bring, but some friends of the widow, among whom was "Paddy," sought to increase this pittance by disposing of the watch through a raffle. "Paddy" and some others undertook to sell the tickets. The affair had not gone very far, however, when an officious policeman swooped down and arrested the widow on a charge of conducting a lottery. She was haled off to court, but "Paddy" was beforehand. Approaching the magistrate who, he knew, was to try the case, and who had, at this time, heard nothing of it, he told a touching story of the woman's poverty, and departed after having exchanged two of the tickets to the raffle for a crisp five-dollar note.

The case came into court, and "Paddy," who was acting for the defence, had the woman make a clean breast of everything. Then he proceeded to lecture the bench. He told again the story of the woman's loss and the straits to which she had been reduced. He chided her ignorance of the law, and when reminded that that was no excuse, he proceeded to dilate on the danger of lotteries and raffles to a community. He painted a vivid picture of evils they might bring, and described at great length the punishments he deemed meet for anyone who, knowing the law, should dare to conduct a lottery or raffle or act as agent for it, or buy tickets in it, or have anything to do with so damnable an enterprise.

The magistrate had seen quite early in "Paddy's" speech, how things were trending and had been squirming on his bench. He [illegible] however, he cut the [illegible] short, and giving the woman a very mild reprimand, let her go on suspended sentence. Then, he called for "Paddy."

"[illegible] you!" he exclaimed, shaking his fist in the face of the laughing Irishman. "I expected every minute to hear you say, 'And your Honor has two of these same tickets in your waistcoat pocket.'"

The [illegible] is little more than hip length, is belted and pocketed of Norfolk fashion and finished, like the skirt, with a row of smoked pearl buttons down the front.

ALL WED COUSINS.

Curious Custom of Some Native Tribes of Southern India.

In some parts of Southern India the natives have a custom of marriage between cousins which is a result of a strange compromise between two opposite rules of succession. The natives are Dravidians, who have come under Brahmanical influence. Among the Dravidians the mother was the head of the family, and all descent and inheritance came through her. The Brahmanical rule of succession is through the father.

According to F. J. Richards, writing in "Man," the matrilinear community, while being unwilling to give up its traditional custom, saw the advantage of insuring to children the benefit of the natural desire of the father—the worker and provider—to provide for his offspring. Therefore they adopted the custom of a man marrying the daughter of his mother's brother, of his father's sister or of his own sister.

In this way a community in which all property is inherited through the [illegible] conforms to the patrilinear system, and so keeps the property in the family. This, according to Mr. Richards, is the economical reason for the strange custom.

Overheard In the 'Bus

"Nannie?"

"Yes, darling."

"Why are we going to see grandfather this morning?"

"Because grandfather is very sad, and mother thinks it will cheer him up to see you."

Such sweet, eager, quiet eyes in one so [illegible] face! The little fellow was three or four years old, a miniature man-o'-war's man in his dark navy serge suit with broad collar and black 'kerchief beneath, his cap with H.M.S. Good Hope in gilt thread on the ribband, a scarlet monogram on his sleeve. He was sitting on the girl's knee.

"Nannie, why is grandfather sad?" he asked.

"Hush, darling!" she said and went on reading the paper she had spread out before her.

The child's eyes went to the pair of [illegible] looking [illegible] seated along the opposite side of the 'bus. They were staring at him. He wondered why they sat there staring at him like dumb animals, why they did not talk to him or to each other, as he talked to Nannie.

The girl laid down one paper and took up another.

"Why, what for do you want two papers, Nannie?" he asked with an elfish, gleaming smile, his thoughts diverted from the people in the 'bus.

"I want to read about the battle, darling," she said.

"What battle?"

"The battle that—" Her preoccupation vanished. "See, there are some soldiers passing."

She lifted him to the window of the bus.

A regiment of the London Scottish swung past. But his eyes did not light with excitement as most children's do when they see soldiers on march.

After a moment he said eagerly: "Do you think any sailors will pass, Nannie?"

The girl did not answer. She was reading again.

"My father's a sailor," the child went on crooning to himself. "P'raps, he'll go along past the bus with lots of other sailors. No . . . I forgot . . . he's right away over the big, big sea in his ship, my father . . . and when he comes home we'll play 'bear,' and he'll say I'm a big boy . . . and when I've growed bigger and bigger, I'll go away in a ship too—like my father . . . and . . . and I've got to be a good boy now and look after mother and the twenty-weeny new baby sister until father comes home, haven't I, Nannie?"

"Yes," the girl said.

He looked at her quickly, then down at the paper she was reading to see what there was in it to make her voice s and so funny. There were photographs of men and ships on the page.

"Nannie!" he cried with a shrill scream of delight, "it's my father and his ship!"

The girl's lips were quivering.

"We won't stay long at grandfather's will we, because my father's coming home?"

He wriggled excitedly.

"But darling, he isn't!"

"That's his photograph . . . . Nannie he must be near now."

She could say no more. Her simple, kindly face wrinkled with the lines of restrained grief.

The child gazed at her anxiously searching her face.

"Why do you look like that, Nannie?" he asked, friendly, "like the Twenty-Weeny when she's going to cry." "My mother did, too, this morning. Nannie . . . why isn't my father coming home?"

"Oh, my lamb, don't ask me!" The girl rocked him in her arms.

"I'll ask grandfather."

"No, dearie!" Her voice had a frightened note. "Just be good and loving to him . . . put your arms around his neck and kiss him like mother said."

"Yes," the little fellow nodded to reassuringly. "And I'll ask him to stick pins in the ball with the sea on it to show me where father's ship is!"

"No, don't do that, darling," the girl said, distressfully.

"Why, Nannie?"

"Because . . . because . . ."

Nannie was against the storm wall again. The child's face was troubled and doubtful.

"Isn't my father coming home for a long, long time, Nannie?"

"No, darling."

"And I must look after mother and the Twenty-Weeny . . . for a long, long time . . . and not ask grandfather to stick pins in the big ball with the sea on it to show me where father's ship is?"

He hesitated a moment.

"Nannie, is that why grandfather wants me to cheer him up?"

"Yes, darling," she said, a little wearily. "You see, you're the only little boy he's got now. Father was grandfather's big boy."

Instantly she realized that she had said what she had not meant to say. That "was" carried a subtle illumination to the child's brain. His eyes flashed on her.

"Nannie!"

"Yes, darling."

The girl flinched. She saw the dreaded question in his eyes.

The nurse grasped the child's hand. They got off the 'bus, but the little face, so infantile and yet so grave, with its shadowing sorrow, turned again to her face with that question, unasked, unanswered. A dawning mind was struggling with the mysteries which began to—why father was not coming home for a long time; why a small boy must be good and look after mother and the twenty-weeny sister; why he must not ask grandfather to stick pins in the globed map of the world to show him where father's ship was; why Nannie's and mother's faces were both like the twenty-weeny's this morning. Why—the world was so great. Who to him this question of mornings—though the newspapers told the story and every one of us knew of the loss of gallant men and ships.—Manchester Chronicle.

PARIS—ART CENTRE

Its Treasures in the Louvre and Its Gems of Architecture.

In population Paris ranks third among the cities of the earth, with more people than Washington, Mexico City, Rio, Buenos Ayres and Santiago together. It is the world's capital in many respects. Its art treasures surpass those of any other city; its fashions dominate the civilized world and even influence the uncivilized; its language is the court tongue of the earth; its history is a panorama of the story of civilization from the days of the Goth and the Vandal down to the present.

In the heart of the city stands one of the world's most noted buildings—the palace of the Louvre. It is the priceless art museum of France, and there are contained within its three departments—sculpture, paintings and antiques—examples of the highest expression of human genius. The collections of the Louvre, were they offered for sale, would bring a total price so stupendous as to be unbelievable. For example, in the gallery of Apollo, among other treasures, rest the diamond-hilted sword of Bonaparte, valued at $400,000, the famous Regent diamond, valued at $7,000,000, the gems of many a beauteous queen of France, and the swords and spurs of Charlemagne.

A life might be spent in study here, and libraries might be written upon the treasure which the Louvre houses. In the hall of sculpture stands the peerless Venus of Melos, a thing more ravishing than any other vision ever hewn from a stone. In this hall there are many places of antiquity and of more modern times, the loss of any one of which would be irreparable. Yet the strange people of this city, fired with enthusiasm for a communistic theory, once raided the Louvre, poured petroleum over it, and prepared to destroy with gunpowder what it had taken the world more than 2,500 years to produce.

Paris is overrich in the possession of the beautiful, the impressive and the magnificent. Its famous buildings make an almost unending list. Richest among the world's theatres is the Paris home of opera—without an architectural delight, within, a fascinating inspiration in snow white marble, onyx, jasper, malachite and bronze. Its famed grand stairway is a fitting prelude to the highest moods that can be produced by the music on its stage.

And there is not wanting a strong element of gruesome and terrifying reminiscence in this glorious city. The traveller stands amid the wide sweep of the Place de la Concorde (Place of Peace), and he thinks that here before an assembled brutal mob the razor blade of the guillotine rose and fell untiring, while head after head, mid bitter jest and song, rolled from the gory machine into the great common basket and the quivering trunks were curded at its side. Age and youth and loveliness were sacrificed to brutish passion on this now serene square in a way that only Rome had equaled.

Every contrast is found in Paris and all varieties of excellence. Here is the world's highest structure, the Eiffel tower. This huge shaft of steel is one of the most overpowering things within the city. Forty draftsmen worked two years on the 15,000 different designs necessary for its 15,000 sections. Restaurants, shops and a theatre are housed upon its steps and within its corridors. Ten thousand people can gather here at one time.

HAD CHOLERA MORBUS.

SO BAD COULD NOT SIT UP.

Attacks of cholera morbus are caused mostly by indiscretion in diet, the use of unripe fruit and new vegetables, and usually occur during the hot summer months.

On the first sign of this very weakening trouble Dr. Fowler's Extract of Wild Strawberry should be taken.

Mrs. George Lee, Ruthven, Ont., writes: "I was taken with cholera morbus, and I was so bad I could not sit up any more than five minutes at a time. My husband said I looked as if I had been sick a month; he got me a bottle of Dr. Fowler's Extract of Wild Strawberry, and I took the whole of it in one day, and it completely cured me. We are never without it in the house for I don't think it can be beat."

When you ask for Dr. Fowler's Extract of Wild Strawberry see that you get "Dr. Fowler's," as imitators have gone so far as to imitate our wrapper both in color and style, and have adopted similar names, such as Strawberry Compound, Wild Strawberry Compound, Extract of Strawberry, etc.

"Dr. Fowler's" has been on the market for the past 70 years, and is acknowledged by all who have used it to be a sure cure for all bowel complaints.

CURIOUS ANTICS.

What Would Beasts Say After Watching Humankind.

Did you ever have a cat or a dog or a horse look at you very intently? Did you ever notice how searching that glance can be?

Did you ever stop to think how human antics might look to creatures that were not human?

Most of us are likely to think that we have all the curiosity. We look at a creature like the secretary bird in the zoo, for example, and say how human that headdress is!

Or we might turn to the philosophic chimpanzee, gorilla or most any ape.

Fancy, if you can, not being human and then watching humans go in bathing! Could anything be more screamingly funny than bathing clothes?

Fancy not being human, and then watching humans streak about in motorcars. Fancy trying to understand the fearful look of them straining against the wind in a machine that emits growls more hideous than anything known to the jungle.

But the supreme perplexity of the unhuman onlooker must be the human dance. Clutched in strange postures, strangely draped bodies cavort in movements that are neither flight nor [illegible]. These antics might be either agony or hysteria.

And then it must be appalling to unhuman beings to watch us eat. Our hunger for certain creatures while they are still alive; our eagerness to consume other creatures that went alive to the fire, our fantastic way of [illegible] the dead for the table, in eating places hung with pictures of dead bodies—these things might surely amaze a detached spectator who was not hampered by being human himself.

CHICAGO.

The word Chicago is taken from the [illegible] word "Checagou," the [illegible] word for thunder and name of the Indian thunder god. The name was given by the Indians to the "Chicago river," an inlet into Lake Michigan, and this gives its name to the city.—Indianapolis News.

Don't jump to the conclusion that a fellow has sent [illegible] because his left foot doesn't feel right.

Was Troubled With Smothering Spells.

Would Wake Up With Breath All Gone.

Milburn's Heart and Nerve Pills Entirely Cured Her.

Mrs. Wm. McElwain, Temperance Vale, N.B., writes: "I am not much of a believer in medicines, but I must say Milburn's Heart and Nerve Pills are all right.

"Some years ago I was troubled with smothering spells. In the night I would be sound asleep but would waken up with my breath all gone and think I never would get it back. I was telling a friend of my trouble, and he advised me to try Milburn's Heart and Nerve Pills, so she gave me a box which I tried, and I had only taken a few of them when I could sleep all night without any trouble. I did not finish the box until some years after when I felt my trouble coming back, and I took the rest of them and they entirely cured me."

Milburn's Heart and Nerve Pills are 50c. per box or 3 boxes for $1.25, at all dealers or mailed direct on receipt of price by The T. Milburn Co., Limited, Toronto, Ont.

RLD

…ock to …mes. A flock … during the winter slow up towards the summer, and when they begin to moult, but when the egg yield drops rapidly until it practically ceases without apparent reason, suspect vermin.

Of all the many varieties of vermin that infest fowl the red mite is the most troublesome. Unlike the ordinary hen louse, they are not as a rule found on the fowl, neither are they killed by dusting, as the ordinary body louse is. They breed very rapidly, especially during the hot weather, mainly in cracks containing filth or in dirty nesting material. They are not red in color, as is popularly supposed, but grey. It is only after they have come into contact with the fowl and have become filled with blood that they appear red. The young mites are white and have only six legs, but after casting their skins, which they do several times, they have eight legs. The mites may be seen like a white powder around the perches, this often being the first indication of the presence of mites. They are able to live and reproduce for months without animal food, the first food of the young probably being filth or decayed wood. They thrive best in dark, dirty houses, and have been found to exist in houses the following season after the fowl had been removed. They usually attack the birds at night, but are sometimes found on laying hens, and they frequently drive broody hens from the nest. They pierce the skin with their needle-like jaws, and suck the blood, after which they retire to the seclusion of the cracks and crevices of the roosts, nests and other parts of the house. They will bite man or other mammals, causing severe irritation, but they never remain on them for any length of time.

If the fowl are not doing well and are thinner than they should be, a sharp lookout should be kept for mites. At night they may be seen either on the fowl or running along the perches. In the day time examine the cracks and crevices of the roosts and walls closely, or lift the roosts and examine the cracks and places where they come in contact with the supports. If mites are found to be present, the first step in banishing them is to give the house a thorough cleaning. Remove all droppings and soiled nesting material, scrape and sweep out every particle of dirt and burn it. Then if you are so fortunately situated that you have water pressure at your command, turn on the hose with as much pressure as you can get, forcing the water into every crack. In the absence of this method, it is advisable to scrub down the walls with a brush or old broom, but in any case they should be thoroughly sprayed or painted with a good strong disinfectant. This wash should be repeated in a few days, to destroy the mites which hatch after the first application. The disinfectant may be applied with a hand spray pump, or if such is not available, a brush will do, but in either case the fluid should be used liberally and every crack flooded.

Fresh air and sunlight are wonderful disinfectants, and combined with cleanliness are preventives against most of the ills of the poultry yard.

Dissolve one pound and a half concentrated lye in as small a quantity of water as possible. It will be necessary to do this two or three hours before it is required as the lye should be cold when used. Put three quarts of raw linseed oil into a five gallon stone crock, and pour in the lye very slowly, stirring meanwhile. Keep on stirring until a smooth liquid soap is produced, then gradually add two gallons of either crude carbolic acid or commercial cresol, stirring constantly until the resulting fluid is a clear dark brown. Use two or three tablespoonfuls of the mixture to a gallon of water.

The foregoing is offered as a most effective remedy against mites; but those who regard the preparation of the mixture as too much work, may use a good strong solution of "Zenoleum" or any other creolin preparation.

Ordinary coal oil will kill mites but as it evaporates quickly the effects are not so lasting. An excellent "paint" to apply to the roosts and nest boxes is composed of one part crude carbolic to three or four parts coal oil.

Even after the house has been cleaned, the cracks in the roost and nest-boxes should be flooded at regular intervals throughout the summer either with the forementioned "paint" or with coal oil. This will go far to keep the pests in check, but it must be regarded simply as a check and the thorough or annual house cleaning described above put into effect as soon as possible.

To facilitate the ease with which this house cleaning may be done all fixtures such as roosts or nests-boxes should be made movable. If they are stationary at present, advantage should be taken of the first rainy day to change them. It will be time well spent.—Poultry Division, Experimental Farm.

NOTES.

This is one of the months when good care should be exercised with the growing stock. Many colds can be avoided if the fowls are placed in well-ventilated buildings and not overcrowded.

Winter eggs are obtained from early-hatched pullets properly grown from known egg-producers. Any other methods, such as July hatches, poorly-grown, will not prove a success. Some experienced poultry-keepers can attain success with later-hatched fowls, but beginners cannot.

The outlook for a good poultry year is poultry feed; the up-to-date poultry keeper should show a balance on the right side of the ledger. No one can make a profit in any line of business with haphazard methods, and the failures chalked up against the little Canadian hen should be laid to mismanagement.

…lecting pullets for this winter's layers it has been previously pointed out that consideration should be given to those birds that have grown rapidly and well and to those that show quality as indicated by a soft pliable skin over the breast bone and abdominal cavity. In addition to these two considerations quality is further indicated by the texture of the head parts. The comb and wattles should not only be well developed but should have a nice smooth velvety texture. A fourth consideration in selecting the prospective layer is that of capacity. A hen in action needs lots of room, that is to say, room for the digestive and reproductive organs. Such capacity is indicated by good width between the pelvic bones and also good width between these and the rear end of the keel.

ENGLISH AND AMERICAN.

Differing Forms of Speech in Great Britain and the States.

The common objects and phenomena of nature are often differently named in English and American. Such Americanisms as creek and run for small streams are practically unknown in England, and the English moor is a stranger in the United States. The Englishman is naturally but little familiar with bayou, gulch, gully, canyon, butte, divide and bluff. He knows the meaning of sound (Long Island Sound), but always uses channel in place of it.

In the same way the American knows the meaning of English bog, but almost always uses swamp or marsh (often elided to ma'sh). Foothill is an Americanism; so is cold snap; so also are prairie, backwoods, flats and neck (in the sense of peninsula). The Englishman seldom if ever describes a severe storm as a hurricane, a cyclone, tornado or blizzard. He does not say that the temperature is 29 degrees or that the thermometer or the mercury is at 29 degrees, but that there are three degrees of frost. He calls ice water, iced water.—Pittsburgh Press.

TORTURING SCIATICA

A Severe Sufferer Cured Through the Use of Dr. Williams' Pink Pills.

Fierce darting pains—pains like red hot needles being driven through the flesh—in the thigh; perhaps down the legs to the ankles—that's sciatica. None but the victim can realize the torture, but the sufferer need not grow discouraged, for there is a cure in Dr. Williams' Pink Pills. These pills make new, rich, red blood, which soothes and strengthens the feeble nerves and thus frees them from pain and restores the sufferer to cheerful activity. In proof we give the statement of Mr. Thos. D. Leinster, Wapella, Sask., who says: "I was attacked with sciatica which gradually grew worse until I was confined to my bed. For three months I had to be shifted and turned in my bed as I was unable to help myself. I suffered the greatest torture from the fierce, stabbing pains that accompanied every movement. I consulted several doctors and took drugs and medicines until I was nauseated, but without getting any benefit, and I began to believe I would be a continuous sufferer. Finally I was prevailed upon to use Dr. Williams' Pink Pills and after taking them for about six weeks I was able to get out of bed. From that on I kept steadily improving until I was free from this terrible and painful malady."

The most stubborn cases of sciatica will yield to Dr. Williams' Pink Pills if the treatment is persisted in. These pills are sold by all medicine dealers or will be sent by mail at 50 cents a box or six boxes for $2.50 by addressing The Dr. Williams' Medicine Co., Brockville, Ont.

TULLE DANCE FROCK.

A charming tulle dance frock is shown in tones ranging from gold to brown. This change of color develops from the top and deepens as it reaches the hem. The simple necked bodice is quite transparent with surplice crape front and back. Dainty folds of the silk tulle are tacked here and there, then caught at the waist line by a crushed girdle of brown satin nocturne. The skirt, a fascinating series of panier drapes, causes the satin bound edge to dip here and there.

Blissful Gravity.

In a border south town lives an elderly negro carpenter who is locally distinguished for two things—his use of large words and his abiding fear of his wife, who is both impressive and domineering. In the town a trio of young professional men kept bachelor quarters together.

Not very long ago one of the three called the darkey in to do some small repairing jobs about the apartment.

"Jim," inquired the young man, in the midst of his work, "do you white gen'l'mens live heah in a state of total depravity of de feminine sex?"

"We do," was the answer.

From the bottom of his henpecked soul the old darkey fetched up a long, deep, sincere sigh.

"Well, suh," he said, "if I wuz ez you is, I should certainly remain so."—Saturday Evening Post.

Their long acquaintance had ripened into love and he had proposed. "Dearie," he asked confidentially, "when did you first learn that you loved me?" "When I found that I became very angry when anybody referred to you as a brainless boob," she answered.—New York Herald.

Vital Healing Power Fills the System And Health Returns

A crowning curative triumph in medicine is now given to the world, and all who have been sufferers from stomach ailments, indigestion and headache can be cured by a purely vegetable remedy.

Calomel, salts and such like are no longer necessary. They are harsh and disagreeable. Science has devised something far superior, and you can go to-day with 25c to any druggist and buy a box of Dr. Hamilton's Pills, which are considered the very quickest and safest cure for the stomach, bowels, liver and kidneys.

Half sick men and women who scarcely know what ails them, will be given a new lease of life, with Dr. Hamilton's Pills. Depressed spirits disappear, headaches are forgotten, appetite increases, blood is purified and enriched, pains at the base of the spine are cured, the nerves are toned up, ambition to work is increased, and day by day the old-time health and vigor return.

A trial only is necessary to prove how beneficial Dr. Hamilton's Pills are to all who are weak, nervous, thin, depressed or in failing health.

The HouseKeeper

Before using any tins for cooking, I always fill them with cold water, adding a handful of salt, and allow them to stand several hours, then rinse well in clear, cold water, says a New York Press contributor. You will find this well worth the trouble, for nothing sticks to them.

One of the best remedies for removing the unpleasant odor from a room is to put a lump of ammonia in a common jar and pour in a few drops of any perfume on hand. The ammonia will absorb the extract. Then pour in half a teacupful or less of boiling water.

When beating butter and sugar to a cream, a perforated spoon will make the task easier.

To prevent made mustard from drying and caking in the mustard pot add a little salt when making.

Lace continually cleaned with gasoline or naphtha will turn yellow quickly.

Sponging with warm vinegar is said to remove the shine from blue serge. Sponge thoroughly, then lay a cloth over the serge and press with a hot iron.

A pinch of gum tragacanth in stove blacking will brighten the polish.

To clean a sink without injuring the hands, put a lump of washing soda in the sink and let the hot water run upon it till melted.

A little vinegar will take the tarnish off the range trimmings.

THE 'PHONE IN WAR.

Contest, Without It, Impossible as Conducted at Present.

If the telephone were not a part of the army equipment to-day the war simply could not be conducted at all along the present lines. The war thus far has been an artillery duel. Without the telephone the big guns would be useless, for the objective is rarely, if ever, in sight of the battery.

The gunners train their guns on the target by laying them at a fixed angle with some definite visible point. The captain goes to a place from which he can see the enemy, and has a telephone line run out to him from his battery. Watching the fall of the shells he telephones in the necessary corrections.

In the German artillery trenches orders and instructions are sent almost exclusively by telephone, the soldier attending it lying face downward and calling out instructions for firing, giving the range and the distance.

The perfection which has been attained in means of communication is a factor of incalculable value.

For instance, the possibility of such a departure from the front as that of General Sir John French recently would have been unthinkable in other days.

To-day, however, General French can return to England, confer with Lord Kitchener and Premier Asquith, attend councils before the king, and in the meantime hold hourly conferences over the telephone with Sir Archibald Murray at the front in France or Belgium.

A direct telephone line to the base headquarters at Saint Omer, France, from the home of General French, near Hyde Park, London, insured General French being in as close touch with conditions at the front during his three-day visit to England as if he were present at headquarters.

Not the least valuable phase of telephone usefulness, though seemingly a very minor one, is its ability to supply entertainment to the entrenched armies.

A really grave hardship of war is the entire lack of diversion suffered by the men at the front, and the strain of remaining long in the trenches without any amusement has frequently proved extremely serious.

By means of the telephone however a way has been opened to overcome this condition, for it has been found that soldiers in the front trenches can listen to gramophone concerts being enjoyed by men in camp eight miles in the rear.

The report does not specify how widely this means of diversion has been employed so far, but limited as its application must of necessity be at present, it is undoubtedly of very definite value.

In obtaining information regarding the movements of the enemy the telephone is of the greatest significance, and the multitude of adaptations and skilful manoeuvres to transmit information by telephone unknown to the enemy are practically unlimited.

Examples are manifold, but one instance warrants especial mention.

One day during a change in position the Russian troops in hundreds passed by a man in soldier's uniform lying in a ditch, where he complained of rheumatism, but refused aid.

Finally, a Cossack patrol came along and one of the Cossacks, suspecting that the man might be a spy, struck him with a whip.

At this he leaped to his feet, revealing a telephone, over which he had been telling the Germans of everything that had passed along the road.—Tit-Bits.

"FIGHTING MAC" STILL FIGHTING

Is Radko Demetrieff, the Russ General, Really Scottish Hero, Sir Hector Macdonald ?

Is Hector Macdonald—"Fighting Mac," the greatest Scottish soldier since the days of Bruce—still living? Is he playing a hero's part in the present war?

These are strange and staggering questions. But hundreds are asking them. Thousands and tens of thousands will be asking them soon.

All the world knows that in the gusty murk of a March morning 12 years ago a coffin, believed to contain the remains of the departed General, was lowered into a grave in the Dean cemetery, Edinburgh.

Britain was heavy of heart that day.

Westminster Abbey was the only resting place fit for so grand a warrior. But his amazing career had ended, not in a maze of glory, but in blackness and horror.

"Fighting Mac," the soldier's idol, the man who had climbed by sheer brain power and courage from the ranks to a Knighthood and a great command, had died by his own hand.

Thus, at least, all believed.

And now a story comes from the front and is gaining currency all over the North of Scotland, says the People's Journal, of Dundee, that the suicide's grave in that Edinburgh cemetery is empty; that "Fighting Mac" never died and was buried; that in the uniform of a Russian General he is fighting the Germans in the eastern theatre of war, opposing to Prussian weight and ferocity that great infinitude of resource, that superbly calculated strategy, that thunderbolt suddenness of action that won for Britain the battle of Omdurman, and that placed Macdonald for all time among the great military heroes of the world.

General Demetrieff, the mysterious and brilliant leader of Russian troops, whose exploits during the last few months have been of incalculable service to our great ally in the east, is said to be none other than Major General Sir Hector Macdonald, K.C.B.

Demetrieff bears an amazing facial resemblance to the great Scottish soldier, whose grave lies in Edinburgh. This fact was commented on again and again by Scotsmen travelling in Russia before the war.

When, therefore, Demetrieff drew sword against the Germans, and began to display military abilities of the highest order, small wonder the rumor arose that here indeed was Macdonald himself.

No one who compares in detail the portraits of Demetrieff and Hector Macdonald can fail to be convinced of the striking likeness that the two faces bear to each other. "They're photographs of the same man taken at different ages!" is the thought that immediately springs to the mind.

THE FEATURES COMPARED.

Head and brow are of the same massive cast. The deepset eyes hold the same bright, dauntless expression. The nose, straight and broad, and big-nostrilled—the nose of the born fighting man—is common to both; so is the pugnacious chin hewn out of granite, so even the ragged moustache, and the firm, generous mouth.

In the case of the heavy jaw, there is some slight divergence, but no more than twelve years of life might well account for.

Compare a present-day photograph of Kitchener with a portrait taken of him at the close of the Boer War, and you will see that the jaw line has altered in precisely the same degree as the difference between the jaw-line of Hector Macdonald and that of General Demetrieff.

In fact, one might truthfully say that the Kitchener of to-day differs no more from the Kitchener of 1901 than does the present-day face of Demetrieff from the face of "Fighting Mac" as we knew and loved it.

Demetrieff is said to resemble Macdonald as much in military characteristics as in feature. He is a leader of extraordinary dash and daring, and from the time of the first Russian invasion of Galicia last autumn he has been a continual thorn in the side of the Prussians.

His strategic powers are declared to rank with those of the Grand Duke Nicholas, while no Cossack horseman excels him in courage and nerve. His soldiers worship him.

If Hector Macdonald be living today, as so many believe, he is 62 years of age.

It was in the year 1853 that he first saw the light, in the little village of Rootfield, near Dingwall, Ross-shire, his birthday being on the 13th of April. It was on the 25th of March just 50 years later that the world received the dumbfounding news that he had blown out his brains in a Paris hotel.

But suicide was the very last fate one could have imagined for Hector. He was far too virile and healthy a man for that. And there are scores of people, including many old soldiers of the Highland Brigade, who fought under his leadership, who for years have resolutely maintained "Mac's no deid."

"He was just fed up wi' the treatment he was gettin'," these old soldiers will tell you, "so he took himsel' off quietly to some place abroad, where he knew he'd get better appreciated. Sma' blame to him, either."

VICTIM OF MALICE.

Certainly an insult of the grossest character was offered to Macdonald, when shortly after his appointment to command of the troops in Ceylon he was summoned to appear before a court-martial of his brother officers and answer charges alleging misconduct of the foulest description.

The threatened court-martial would never have been allowed to cast its shadow upon Macdonald had he been a man of high social influence instead of a soldier who had risen from the ranks.

That the charges were without foundation was amply proved some few weeks after Hector's death had been announced, … [illegible] his innocence could have had no compelling motive for an exit from the world. But the ingratitude, snobbery and insidious malice, which numbers of his superiors in birth had long served out to the one-time plowboy and ex-draper's assistant, must at last have thoroughly disgusted a man of Macdonald's temperament, and one can quite imagine fierce disdain prompting him at this final insult to act in the way that the old Highland soldiers hint at and dramatically sever himself from a society in which the system of caste ruled with so much arrogance.

In the days when Macdonald left the Inverness drapery counter to become a Gordon Highlander, the army was generally regarded as the proper sphere for ne'er-do-weels and winna-works. The dividing line between the soldier and the officer was much more drastically defined than it, happily, is to-day. To rise without influence to commissioned rank was a task more difficult than to climb the Matterhorn without rope or guides.

HOW "BOBS" WAS SAVED.

But Macdonald was determined to achieve the impossible. He meant to be a general some day.

His first great chance came when the Kabul Field Force, with "Bobs" in command, advanced into Afghanistan with the 92nd Gordon Highlanders, constituting part of the First Infantry Brigade.

"Bobs" and his staff were pushing forward through a dark and frowning Afghan defile, when the little party of Sikhs, who formed the advance guard, discovered an ambush of 2,000 Afghans.

The Afghans had determined to capture "Bobs" and his staff, and they would in all probability have succeeded in this audacious plan had it not been for "Fighting Mac."

Dashing forward with a handful of Highlanders, the young color-sergeant—such was the rank he had attained—unhesitatingly attacked the Afghans though they outnumbered his own little force more than twenty to one!

The foe was taken by surprise, and after a short, sharp fight they fled. It was an amazing victory.

At the Battle of Kandahar Macdonald again distinguished himself in dramatic fashion. His deeds of valor against the wild Ghazees that day were worthy to rank with the deeds of Richard the Lionheart against the Saracens.

At the end of the campaign Hector was offered his choice between the Victoria Cross and commission. He chose the commission, and was thereupon appointed to a second lieutenantship in the Gordons, the regiment he had joined as a private nine years before.

"Fighting Mac" will go down to posterity as the only man who ever refused the V.C.

IMMORTAL DEEDS.

Immortal is the story of Macdonald's deeds on the grim day of Majuba, when with a force of 18 men he held for seven hours the position allocated to him and declined to surrender when even the last of his heroic Highlanders had fallen.

Taken prisoner, he fought with his clenched fists the Boers who attempted to deprive him of his sword, and he would have been shot down in cold blood but for the interference of a commandant, who cried, "Don't kill such a brave man!"

Immortal, too, is the tale of how at the critical moment of Omdurman Col. Macdonald, as he then was, turned the tide in favor of Britain by the dazzlingly original fashion in which he led his Soudanese troops.

"Had the brilliant, the splendid deed of arms, wrought by Macdonald been done under the eyes of a sovereign or in some other armies," wrote Bennet Burleigh, the famous war correspondent, "he had surely been created a general on the spot. If the public are in search of the real hero of the Battle of Omdurman, there he is ready made!"

But it is not for these feats, or for the many brilliant ones he accomplished in the South African War, that the memory of "Fighting Mac" is so beloved by the rank and file.

He was a great man as well as a great soldier. His heart was as warm and impulsive as his brain was machine-like and cold.

And if the story of his changed identity be true, if it be proved eventually that that noble, generous heart is not dust but is living and beating still, then a thrill of joy far beyond the power of words to express will pass through his native land.

What deeds the Highland troops would do if Hector were with them now!

Simplicity of Modern Home.

In place of the restless, overfurnished, overdecorated rooms that were in vogue a few decades ago, our homes are growing more gracious with the beauty of simplicity. Elimination blowing like a refreshing breeze through open doors and windows, is sweeping away that which was needless or ugly, leaving the useful, the comfortable and the beautiful behind.

That this is the general trend to-day and that permanence, simplicity and individuality are becoming more and more widely the American homemaker's idea we know not only from observation, but from practical experience. We have found that those who come to us for advice about their home problems are seeking not for the novel or the unusual or the fashionable, but for the thing that is appropriate for their special needs, that expresses their personal taste in design and color, that will bring comfort as well as beauty into the home, and, above all, that will last. They have had enough of temporary furnishings, of objects that were made to endure only as long as the fad or fashion that deceived them. And today they are seeking wall and floor coverings, finishes, furniture and fittings that, once installed, will become satisfying and permanent elements of the home.—Craftsman.

"Hey, Mike, and phwat do ye t'ink of these new sanitary drinkin' cups?" "Sure, Pat, and soon we'll have to spit on our hands wid an eye dropper!"—The Gargoyle.

GETTING THE GOOD FROM THE SOIL.

Plant food in the soil is an important study, especially the available and unavailable plant food, and the dependence of plant life upon the soluble portion of the fertilizing constituents present.

Plants are composed of two classes of chemical substances, the organic or volatile compounds, which are destroyed by burning; and the inorganic, or fixed elements, which remain in the ash after burning. The importance of inorganic or fixed elements to plant life rests in the fact that no matter what sort of a soil is under cultivation, a healthy plant carries away about the same amount of these constituents which it obtains from the soil for the building up of its structure. At the same time, while the same species of plant when matured may yield to analysis very similar qualities of elements, different species will show different results as to kind and quantity; and the more remote the natural affinity of the species to each other the wider will be these differences.

Perfect plants cannot be produced, much less can fruits, on soils where one or more important constituents is absent. The most valuable materials are phosphoric acid, potash, nitrogen and lime. Accordingly, where soils have been exhausted by the growth and carrying away of crops, to a point below that of remunerative cultivation, they may be restored to fertility by making a judicious return of the ash or mineral constituents along with the element nitrogen. This last named, the nitrogen, belongs to the organic class of plant foods.

While it is true that some alluvial soils possess vast stores of plant food, both of nitrogenous and of mineral substances, so as to be regarded as practically inexhaustible, yet by constant cropping, without a suitable return in manure, they will in time become unproductive.

Now the greater part of the plant food constituents necessary to profitable crop cultivation are locked up in an inert condition, in which state for the most part they remain until unlocked with a solvent supplied as manure. For example, in one of the experimental plots of the late Sir John Lawes, at Rothamsted, England, to which no manure whatever was applied for 50 years, the soil at the end of that period was found, on analysis, to contain in the top 9 inches, as much as 3,000 pounds of potash per acre and 2,000 pounds of phosphoric acid per acre. Of this very large amount of plant food in the soil, only 21 pounds of phosphoric acid per acre were in soluble condition and available to plants. The addition of three hundred-weight of superphosphate per acre to this same soil, on an adjoining plot, increased the solubility of the plant food to 165 pounds of potash per acre, and to 1170 pounds.

Having by this means brought the very mineral constituents into a condition of solubility, the addition of nitrogen in the form of ammonia salts as manure to this same land raised the produce from 12 to 41 bushels of barley grain per acre, and the straw from 11 hundredweight to 24 hundredweight per acre.

The plant grown in exhausted soil is therefore starving, with mineral elements everywhere in the soil, and organic elements everywhere in the atmosphere, and none available for use.

Thus the chief office of manure is to furnish assimilable food for the immediate use of growing crops, and to combine with and supplement the natural food supply existing in the soil. When it is said that certain constituents in the soil are lacking it does not always mean that the soil does not contain them, but that it does not supply to the growing plants as much as they need. It is not so much, therefore, because soils have been worn out of plant food, but rather because the food is locked up in such combinations that the plant roots cannot get at and use it, that an artificial supply of soluble food in manure becomes necessary.

It is believed that the beneficial effects of commercial fertilizers are due as much to the timely supply as to the amount of nourishment they contain. This timely supply enables the plants to enlarge their root system, whereby they are able to secure more nourishment from the soil over and above that furnished by the fertilizer than they could have secured without such supply. If this be so, it is seen that the use of concentrated manures in small quantities may not only largely increase the yield of crops, but may also serve to deplete the soil of some of its elements of plant food more rapidly than would the same kind of crop and treatment without their use.

FARM NEWS AND VIEWS.

The Rural New Yorker, commenting on the possibility of getting potash fertilizers from new sources and the necessity for taking good care of the barnyard manure, which contains a fair percentage of this substance, says: "The liquid portion of manure carry most of the potash in animal excrements. Except in the case of pigs, the liquids contain five or more times as much potash as the solids. With cattle, 53 per cent. of the potash is found in the liquids. For every 1000 pounds of cattle there will pass each year in the liquids about as much potash as we buy in 225 pounds of muriate." This year somehow we have a stronger argument than ever before for concrete floors, full bedding and anything that will save the liquids. Remember, too, that in our grains most of the potash is found in the straw and stalk rather than in the seeds. So use all available straw as bedding and in the manure pile.

Clover can be used as a silage crop, but has an objectionable odor that taints milk. Hollow-stemmed plants are not best for the silo.

The easiest time to wash dairy vessels is immediately after they are used. The albumen has not then congealed on the surface.

Cows do not become great producers "just so." They must have the blood of good producers in them.

It's a waste of feed to winter stunted fall pigs. And it's a waste of pigs to let them go stunted. Keep the little fellows growing, and sow a patch of rye to turn them on next spring. There's money in fall pigs if they are handled right.

It is hard to churn cream at too low a temperature. Keep it cool after separating it, until some time before churning. Then expose it to an ordinary room temperature, about 70 degrees, until it sours.

When on your rounds with the currycomb and brush, do not forget the calves. No animals in the barnyard will respond more readily to good care than the calves. They are your future dairy cows.

RENOVATING CARPETS

Floor Coverings Brightened Up by Dyeing or Washing Them.

Perhaps you were planning to buy new rugs or to re-carpet the floors and perhaps you have changed your mind about it and decided that the old rugs and carpets will do until the cost of living isn't quite so high.

But this won't be so bad after all if you invest in a little dye, which fortunately is not expensive and brighten up the faded floor coverings. To do this successfully you must first scrub the rug and then rinse it. Mix the dye and keep it well stirred in the vessel, so that the color will be even. While the rug is still wet, apply the dye with a clean whitewash brush. It colors evenly this way. If the rug is dyed on the floor, place a great many newspapers under it to absorb the moisture. It should be thrown double over a line to dry, or else allowed to dry on the floor. It will shrink slightly.

For a cotton rug which turns a dirty white use such colors as dark green, mahogany, red and delft blue. Jute rugs may be dyed in a similar manner, but the dye in this case should be applied to the rug.

If a carpet is almost all wool, the color may be brightened or wholly restored if washed with a pail of water containing three gills of ox gall. If necessary to use fresh ox gall, procure it at the butchers, cut it into small pieces, cover with warm water and allow it to soak for several hours. Dilute the liquid and wipe the carpet off with it. It makes a lather and should be rinsed off with clear water.

Found the Missing Brooch.

Detective work, following faint clues, dark hints and the like, is not the only method by which robberies may be solved. The wife of a prominent officer in the marine corps, who resides in Baltimore and has a country place in Virginia, is authority for the statement, and offers the following little story in proof of her contention.

It seems that while she was at her Virginia place, she one day missed from her jewel box a valuable diamond brooch. She had the servants search high and low for the trinket, but it could not be found. All of her servants except one had been with her for years, and were absolutely trusted by her. The one exception, a mulatto girl, persistently urged upon her mistress the possibility of the brooch being at her Baltimore town house.

"Tain't 'round heah, Mis' Alice," (not the real name of the mistress, of course), "I know dat it ain't eround heah," persisted the girl.

Whatever suspicions the mistress may have had she kept to herself. After a while she returned to Baltimore, bringing her servants with her.

"Is you found it, Mis' Alice?" asked the mulatto girl, after a search of the house had been concluded.

Her mistress shook her head.

"No," said she, "I have not found it, Mary, but," lowering her voice and speaking impressively, "I have no cause to worry."

"Ain't you?" enquired the girl.

"No," continued her mistress. "You see, I went to a fortune teller to-day. She told me that whoever had the diamond would die shortly, and that the brooch would be found among their effects. I only have to wait for their death to know who took my brooch."

"Mah gracious!" breathed the mulatto girl. "Did dat voodoo woman say dat?"

"She did," replied her mistress, solemnly.

Breaking it Gently.

"If you please, mamma," said Benjamin, aged ten, "will you kindly lend me a pencil?"

"But," said his mother, "I left a pen and ink for you to do your lessons with on the nursery table. Why don't you use that instead of a pencil?"

"Well, you see," Benjamin explained, "I want a pencil because [illegible]"

"There is plenty of room at the top," quoted the Wise Guy. "That's because all the people who think they ought to be there aren't," added the simple Mug.

Notice of Dissolution of Partnership

NOTICE is hereby given that the partnership heretofore subsisting between us, the undersigned, as printers and publishers in the Town of Walkerton, in the County of Bruce, under the firm name and style of the Telescope Printing Company, was on the 1st day of October, 1915, dissolved by mutual consent.

Dated at Walkerton this [illegible] day of October, 1915.

The Telescope enjoyed a pleasant call from an old newspaper friend, Mr. W. S. Dingman, vice-chairman of the Ontario License Commission. Mr. Dingman was for many years prominent in newspaper work, being publisher of the Stratford Daily Herald, and a past President of the Canadian Press Association. He fills his present important position with dignity and good judgment. It is worth noting that many of the big positions in public life the last few years are being filled by newspaper men. They are now proposing to recognize journalism as a profession at the University of Toronto.

Work Among the Sailors.

The work of the Mission to Sailors on the Great Lakes was well presented to thoroughly interested audiences at the Presbyterian and Methodist Churches on Sunday by Mr. George Speedie, one of those zealous missionaries who are ministering to the spiritual welfare of the twenty five thousand sailors on inland waters. On Monday evening a large audience saw his lime light views of the work, at the Methodist Church. Mr. Speedie, also gave his lecture on Germany, a Country in which he spent over seven years as missionary. He is a great admirer of the rank and file of the German nation, but says that they will soon discover that they have been betrayed by the military classes. Rev. Mr. Walker presided, and Rev. Mr. Wilson showed the slides with his lantern. A very pleasing solo was given during the evening by Mr. Royce.
